The Hiſtory of the JEWS, and their Monarchical Government.

ABOUT this time the good old prophet Samuel died [a], in the 97th or 98th year of his age, greatly lamented by all true Iſraelites, and was buried at Ramah in his own houſe, or rather, perhaps, in his garden. He had judged Iſrael twenty years from Eli's death, and had lived about forty-eight more from his anointing Saul to the regal dignity. As for David, whether he had any intelligence of Saul's relapſe, or whether his own fear ſuggeſted it to him, he removed further from the neighbourhood of Engedi towards the wilderneſs of Paran near to Maon, or Carmel, which was alſo in the tribe of Judea. It ſeems, that David kept his men under ſuch ſtrict diſcipline, that, inſtead of plundering the neighbouring places, as was generally done by ſuch men, they were rather a ſafe-guard to them, ſo that it was uſual for them to expect ſome refreſhments from the inhabitants, as a gratification for their watchfulneſs and forbearance. Here then David, according to cuſtom, ſent a civil meſſage to a wealthy Carmelite named Nabal, who was then makeing a feaſt to his ſheep-ſhearers, and deſired him to ſend him and his men ſome portion of his good cheer; but the man, who was rightly called Nabal, being naturally proud and brutiſh, ſent them away with a churliſh anſwer, that he had ſomething elſe to do with his proviſions, than to ſend it to ſuch a company of vagabonds. David, who could not but reſent ſuch ingratitude, was juſt upon the point of making ſome dreadful havock in Nabal's family, but, by good fortune, his prudent wife hearing of it made ſuch haſte to bring him an elegant ſupply of refreſhments that ſhe prevented all further miſchief, and David was ſo charmed with her prudent and modeſt behaviour, that he conceived a real affection for her. Abigail returned to her huſband, and on the next day, when ſleep had diſſipated the fumes of his wine, acquainted him with the danger which his brutiſhneſs was like to have brought upon him; and as he was of too baſe a nature to think David generous enough to forgive him, the dread which then ſeized him did, in few days, break his heart, which as ſoon as David heard of, he ſent for her and married her. As for Michal, Saul's daughter, ſhe had been given to another during his exile [b].

He was forced ſoon after to retire from Maon into the deſart of Ziph, and the Ziphites failed not to acquaint Saul with it; who having by that time forgot all that paſſed at their laſt interview, came out againſt him with 3000 choſen men, and gave him a freſh opportunity of evidencing his innocency. The two armies were encamped, the one by the ſide of the hills of Hachilah, and the other in the wilderneſs over-againſt him. David therefore ſent out ſome ſpies, to know whether Saul was come in perſon, and being informed that he was, he took Abiſhai with him, and came in the dead of the night into Saul's camp, where they found them all faſt aſleep; Saul in his tent, with his ſpear ſtuck into the ground by his bolſter, and Abner his general, with the reſt of his officers, encamped round his tent. Abiſhai began then to inſiſt ſtrenuouſly, that providence had brought his enemy once more into his hand as a victim to the ſlaughter, and that if he miſſed ſo fair an opportunity

portunity of ſticking him to the ground with his own ſpear, he might in vain bewail his folly; but David ſoon ſtopped his hand, and contented himſelf with carrying away his ſpear, and the pitcher of water that lay under his head, which he did unperceived by any of Saul's men, God having thrown them all, as the text expreſſes it, into a deep ſleep [c], and ſoon after reached his own camp. Early on the next morning, he got up on the top of a high hill over-againſt them, and having called Saul's general to him, he rebuked him ſharply for being ſo negligent of his maſter's perſon, as to ſuffer his ſpear and cruſe to be taken away by thoſe, who might with the ſame eaſe have taken away his life. Saul, who was ſoon appriſed of it, came out, and, in the mildeſt terms, acknowledged himſelf indebted a ſecond time for his life, to his generous, though much injured, ſon-in-law. David had then a fair occaſion to upbraid him with his injuſtice and cruelty, which he did; however with expreſſions full of duty and humility: he repreſented unto him, how much beneath a king of Iſrael it was, to hunt after a poor harmleſs flea, or a partridge, who meant not the leaſt harm againſt him, and begged of him to deſiſt from perſecuting a man to death, who was not only innocent, but who ſhewed ſuch a tender regard for his life when it was in his power. Saul could not reſiſt ſo ſtrong an evidence of his ſon's ſuperior virtue, which he muſt have admired even in an enemy. But though he ſhewed, at that juncture, all the tokens of remorſe, acknowledged his folly and injuſtice, and promiſed never to ſeek his life any more, yet David had ſo little reaſon to truſt to ſuch forced repentance, that as ſoon as they were parted, though with ſome tokens of the ſincereſt love and friendſhip, he reſolved to go far enough out of his reach [d]. He retired therefore once more to Achiſh king of Gath, deſigning to abide with him, till providence ſhould give a better turn to his affairs. The hoſpitable reception he met with from that prince has been ſeen before *; but here though he found ſo generous a friend and protector, yet an unexpected misfortune befel him from another quarter, which was like to have proved as fatal to him, as if he had fallen into his enemy's hand.

A ſecond inſtance of David's mercy.

DURING his abode at Ziklag, the place which the Gathiſh king had allotted him, which was a year and four months, there repaired unto him ſome of Saul's kindred, and

and multitudes of valiant men and commanders out of the tribes of Benjamin and Judah, and some from that of Gad, which ventured to pass the Jordan to come to him, even at the time when it overflowed its banks (M), besides some of the tribe of Manasseh [e]. With these he used to make incursions into the countries of the Geshurites, Gezrites, and Amalekites (N) unknown to the king *, who was made to believe, that he made them into the land of [e] See 1 Chron. xii. 1. 15, & seq. * See before, Vol. II. p. 253.

(M) The book of Chronicles observes of these Gadites, that they could handle the shield and the buckler, that their faces were as stern as those of lions, and that they were as swift of foot as the wild roes (93). The same author takes notice, that when David saw such numbers of the Benjamites, especially of Saul's kindred come to him, he was apprehensive they came with a design to surprise and carry him off. It seems even by what he said to them, that in such a case, he was not able to oppose them with his six hundred men. For, says he, if you are come with a friendly design to succour me, my heart shall be knit with yours; but if your intent be to betray me to my enemies, I leave it to God to punish you for your treachery (94). But they soon dispelled his fears, by assuring him, that they were entirely in his interest, and resolved to share his fortune, and to be under his command.

As to the time of David's abode at Ziklag, though we have followed our English version and archbishop Usher, the original says only, that he continued there ימים וארבעה חדשים days and four months, which some think to imply some days above, rather than a year and four months; because David came thither after Samuel's death, and left it immediately after that of Saul, and they reckon but seven months between the death of those two persons (95).

(N) We beg leave to observe here, against those who condemn David as guilty of a great breach of hospitality, that none of these three nations were Philistines. The two former were the remains of the old Canaanites (96) and the Amalekites, the descendants of Esau (97), and all the three under the divine anathema. Notwithstanding which, David might think it proper to tell the king, that he made his inroads into the land of Israel, that he might think himself the more sure of him; and this is the very reason assigned in the text for his using that pretence (98).

of Judah; and this gained him ſuch confidence, that he had taken him and his army to go with him againſt Saul [f]; but whilſt they were gone, the Amalekites came and took Ziklag, and burnt it, and carried away all their women, children, cattle, and all the plunder of the place. When therefore they were returned from the Philiſtine camp, from which they had been diſmiſſed by the jealous princes of that nation, and found what a terrible deſtruction had been made of their city, they filled the air with their cries. Their deſtroying of men, women, and children, in all their former incurſions, gave them no room to doubt, that their own had undergone the ſame fate; ſo that their grief and deſpair roſe to ſuch a height, that David was like to have become the victim of it. The men began to talk of ſtoning him, as the cauſe of this miſchief; when he, ſtill confiding in God, called Abiathar to conſult the Lord for him, whether he had beſt purſue after that troop; and upon his being anſwered that he ſhould do it with ſucceſs, he took 600 men with him, overtook, and deſtroyed the Amalekitiſh band, and recovered all that had been taken from them, as we have ſeen elſewhere †.

AFTER this ſignal deliverance David's affairs began to take a better turn, and the death of Saul, which happened immediately after, not only rid him of an inveterate enemy, the cauſe of all theſe troubles, but opened a fair and eaſy way to the crown, at leaſt over his own tribe. The particulars of this ſignal defeat, which coſt Saul and his three ſons their lives, and among them the brave and generous Jonathan, need not to be repeated here ‡. One or two circumſtances however preceded it, with relation to that unhappy monarch, which made his condition ſo deplorable and deſperate, that we could not with juſtice omit them. He ſaw himſelf on the eve of being attacked by a powerful army, whilſt a great number of his own, eſpecially the chiefs, were gone over to David, and perhaps he had alſo intelligence of his being come with the Philiſtines againſt him: he had killed all the prieſts except Abiathar, who was alſo fled to David, ſo that he could not conſult the Lord by Urim: Samuel was dead, and not a prophet left to adviſe him. In this ſtreight, he would gladly have ſought for counſel from witches or wizards, but he had long ago baniſhed them all out of his dominions. At length, with much enquiring, they found him out a woman at Endor, who had a familiar ſpirit, to whom he went diſguiſed in the night; and, having promiſed her ſecrecy, prevailed upon her to raiſe him up Samuel. She did ſo accordingly; but when ſhe ſaw him appear, either in a different manner than ſhe had been uſed to (O), or in ſuch a manner as gave her to underſtand, that it was Saul himſelf that had ſet her on work; ſhe gave a ſhriek, and complained, that ſhe had been impoſed upon. Saul bid her go on, aſſuring her ſhe ſhould be ſafe, and aſked what ſhe had ſeen; ſhe anſwered, gods, angels, or judges, (for the word may ſignify any of theſe) aſcending out of the earth. She deſcribed one, who was an old man covered with a mantle, whom Saul underſtood to be Samuel, and to whom he bowed himſelf to the ground. Here the apparition, or, as the text expreſſes it, Samuel, aſked him the reaſon why he had diſturbed and called him up; and Saul owned to him that the diſtreſs he was in from the Philiſtine army, being deſtitute of council from God, had obliged him to take that way to obtain his advice, what he ſhould do under thoſe difficulties. But Samuel anſwered, Why doſt thou aſk my advice, ſeeing thy diſobedience to God's commands have alienated him from thee, and that thy kingdom is given to David? And now, continued the viſion, the Lord

Saul conſults the witch of Endor.

(O) It is not eaſy to ſay, whether her fright proceeded from the extraordinarineſs of the apparition, or from the fear ſhe was in, that Saul had only ſet her to work, that he might have occaſion to puniſh her for it. The latter ſeems the moſt probable, by what ſhe ſaid to him in her fright, and yet it is not impoſſible, that ſhe was alſo ſurpriſed at the ſtrangeneſs of the ſight. The text doth not ſay how ſhe came to know the king by it; and the notion of the Jews, that the ſpirits, which ſhe raiſed by enchantment, uſed to riſe out of the earth with their heels uppermoſt, and that Samuel came up upon his feet, by which ſhe knew that it was Saul that wanted to conſult him (99), is altogether ludicrous; but if it was the real apparition of that prophet that ſhe ſaw, as we ſhall at leaſt make it probable in the next note that it was, ſhe might eaſily ſuppoſe, that he would not have appeared in that extraordinary manner to any but to the king of Iſrael. For as to the notion that it was all done by legerdemain and ventriloqui on the woman's part, and by ſtrength of fancy and fear in Saul's, we cannot by any means come into it, and ſhall give our reaſons for diſſenting from it in its proper place.

(99) Vid. Munſt. in loc.

Lord is going to give up the Iſraelites into the hands of their enemies, and thou and thy ſons ſhall be with me to-morrow (P). At theſe laſt words the frighted king, who had eaten nothing all that day, fainted away, and fell flat on the ground,

(P) There is hardly a paſſage in the Old Teſtament that has been more canvaſſed and tortured, by authors of all ages, than this we are upon; and when a man has read them all, he will be forced to own, that there are difficulties in whatever ſenſe he takes the hiſtory of Samuel's apparition. We have therefore taken that which ſeems the moſt natural and obvious, and ſhall now give our reaſons for preferring it to the reſt.

Firſt then, as to the notion of its being performed by ventriloqui, juggle, or confederacy; beſides that it doth too great a violence to the text, and would be a kind of burleſque upon its author; it is not likely, that a woman, cunning enough to carry on a trade of this nature, would have been ſo impolitic as to give Saul ſuch a dreadful anſwer; though we ſhould grant that ſhe was ſo well acquainted with the bad circumſtances of that prince, that ſhe might foreſee that it was likely to prove the caſe; ſuch people are rather apt to flatter thoſe that conſult them, and the fear ſhe was in, when ſhe knew Saul, would no doubt have put her upon this rather than the former. Add to this, that ſuch a terrible denunciation, would only have proved the moſt effectual means of putting Saul upon any expedient to avoid it, whether by flight, or any other way, rather than by engaging the enemy.

This laſt argument is equally ſtrong againſt thoſe who think, that the devil took the ſhape, and acted the part, of Samuel, unleſs we could ſuppoſe him ſo well acquainted with futurity, that he was ſure Saul would ruſh into his own deſtruction, notwithſtanding he was ſo ſignally forwarned of it. Again, though we grant that he might foreſee, that the enemy would be too ſtrong for Saul and his army, yet he could not neither be ſure that he would ingage them, eſpecially after ſuch a dreadful diſſuaſive, nor, if he did, that he would certainly be killed, he and his three ſons. The Iſraelites had won many a more unlikely victory, and, at the worſt, they might have eſcaped by flight. We need not obſerve farther, how unnatural and abſurd it is to ſuppoſe, that the inſpired writer, would have expreſſed himſelf as he doth, and have introduced the dead prophet as raiſed from the dead, and ſpeaking to Saul, if the devil had been the ſole actor in his ſhape; neither do we think it at all probable, that the devil, if it had been he that ſpoke to Saul, would have played the ſaint ſo far, as to reprove him for his wickedneſs and diſobedience, but eſpecially for making uſe of an art to raiſe him up, which he was too fond of to diſcountenance in ſuch ſevere manner.

ground, and remained ſpeechleſs for ſome time. His men, at length, came and raiſed him up, and the old woman beſought

It is indeed urged here, that there were two falſities in this pretended prophecy, which none therefore but either the father of lies, or a juggling old woman, could be the author of. The firſt is, that the viſion ſays to Saul, thou and thy ſons ſhall be with me—Now ſay they, Saul died like a reprobate by his own hands, and could not be, where Samuel was, in the manſions of the bleſſed. But who doth not ſee that it meant no more than thou ſhalt be dead, or in the other world as I now am. The other is, that the viſion ſays to-morow, whereas the battle was not fought on the next day, but a day or two after. But though this were granted, it doth not follow, that the word מָחָר Mahar doth poſitively imply here that very next day following, it doth often ſignify ſhortly, and ſometimes hereafter, in proceſs of time; as when Moſes ſays, when thy children ſhall ask thee Mahar, hereafter, what meaneth ſuch a ceremony or feſtival, and ſo on—We ſhall for once diſpenſe with mentioning the numerous authors of theſe two laſt opinions, to avoid filling up near a whole page with quotations.

Upon the whole then we think, with the far greater number of authors, antient and modern, that it was really Samuel that appeared to the woman, and foretold Saul's death and Iſrael's defeat. This appears likewiſe to have been the opinion of the ancient Jews, from what we read in the book of Eccleſiaſticus (100), where it ſaid, where it is ſaid, that after his death he [Samuel] propheſied, and ſhewed the king his end; that he lift up his voice from the earth in prophecy, to blot out the wickedneſs of the people. This, we have already obſerved, is the moſt obvious and natural ſenſe of the text. We can ſee but two objections that can be made againſt it, and though we have premiſed, at the beginning of this note, that every opinion hath its difficulties, yet we hope we ſhall leſſen theſe ſo far, that they will appear inconſiderable, in compariſon of thoſe we have urged againſt the other two.

The firſt objection is, that it were abſurd to ſuppoſe, that the devil has ſo much power over the ſouls of the dead, eſpecially of the ſaints, as to make them appear viſibly at the deſire of a conjurer: to which it may be anſwered, that there is no neceſſity for ſuppoſing here any ſuch extraordinary power in the devil, but rather, that God did cauſe Samuel to appear to Saul, to reprove him for his former, and for this laſt ſin in particular, of ſeeking for helps from wizards, contrary to his expreſs commands; and to bring him thereby, if poſſible, to ſuch a ſenſe of his faults, as might prevent his making ſuch a deſperate exit; and that all this happened

beſought him, in the humbleſt terms that he would take ſome ſuſtenance before he went away, to which after long importunity he conſented. She then went and dreſſed a fatted calf, and ſet it before them, and as ſoon as they had refreſhed themſelves they went their way, and reached their army before break of day [g]. A dreadful battle ſoon enſued, which fulfilled all that had been foretold to Saul, whoſe fear of being taken alive and ill uſed by his enemies, His death.

happened contrary to the woman's expectation, who could not be ignorant that it was above the power of her art to evocate the ſouls of the bleſſed, and wanted only to impoſe one of her familiar ſpirits upon him, and to ſupply the reſt by policy. It is therefore no wonder, that ſhe was ſo terribly ſurpriſed, when, inſtead of one of her imps, ſhe beheld the real apparition of that venerable prophet.

But here it will be objected again, that it is very improbable, that God who had refuſed to anſwer Saul, either by Urim or by prophets, ſhould now do it, at leaſt ſeemingly, by the miniſtry of a wicked woman. But here it muſt be obſerved; 1. That the text doth not imply, that the Lord refuſed to anſwer him by Urim or by prophets, but he had not the means of conſulting by them; for how could he conſult by Urim, when the high-prieſt was with David in the Philiſtine army? 2. Were it true, that God had refuſed to anſwer him in the ordinary ways of Urim and the like, yet it doth not follow, that he might not do it in an extraordinary one, in order to make the greater impreſſion upon him, whoſe character is to have been but too regardleſs of God's commands, when communicated to him by the prophet: he might likewiſe be ſuffered to ſeek for counſel from a witch, to make him ſenſible, what degree of impiety he had brought himſelf into; ſo that God's ſending Samuel to reprove him for it was a ſignal way of diſcountenancing ſuch a wicked and forbidden practice.

However, we do not pretend to remove all difficulties that can be raiſed againſt this opinion, but only to ſhew, that it is attended with fewer, and leſs, than the other two. For this reaſon we ſhall carry our enquiry no farther: whether it were the real ſoul of Samuel, or an angel aſſuming his ſhape: whether Saul ſaw, or only heard him ſpeak; and many others, concerning which we ſhould loſe ourſelves in a labyrinth, almoſt as dark and intricate, as thoſe do, who ſuppoſe, that two ſuch remarkable events, as the death of Saul and his two ſons, and the total defeat of the Iſraelitiſh army, could be foretold ſo poſitively and exactly, either by a juggling woman, or by the devil, or indeed by any but an omniſcient power.

mies, rather than the wounds he received from them (Q), made him rush upon his own sword, to put an end to his unfortunate life. Here the victorious Philistines could not forbear venting their resentment on his dead body and those of his sons; they mangled and hung them upon the walls of Bethshan; which, being near the field of battle, had been probably abandoned by the inhabitants, as many others were after this defeat. But the grateful Jabeshites, remembering how Saul had saved them formerly from losing their eyes and liberty, did soon after send some of their bravest men to rescue them; which was no sooner done, than they gave them an honourable burial, and kept a seven days fast in memory of their deaths[h].

Year of the Flood, 1944. Year before Christ, 1055.

David had been returned from the slaughter of the plunderers of Ziglag about two or three days, when he received the news of Saul's and Jonathan's death by an Amalekite, who also brought him Saul's crown and bracelets. How glad soever David might be to hear of his enemy's death, yet that of his beloved Jonathan touched him to the heart, and the great defeat of the Israelites caused a general mourning and fasting in his whole army. As for the messenger, he, having unadvisedly pretended to have given Saul his last wound at his desire, was ordered to immediate death, for having lifted up his hand against the Lord's anointed. David did greatly mourn the unhappy fate of the father and son, and their deaths inspired his poetic genius with one of the finest elegies that ever were penned, which he caused to be transmitted to future ages[i].

As

(Q) Notwithstanding what has been said elsewhere †, of Saul's receiving several wounds before he fell upon his sword, for want of attending more to the original than to ours and other versions; we beg leave to observe here, that in this place and in the Chronicles, where the account of Saul's death is repeated, the root of the verb is חול Chull, which signifies to be in dread, in pangs, and alludes to the travail of a woman, &c. and not חלל Challal, to wound. So that it doth not appear, that he was at all wounded, but only in the extremity of fear, when he saw himself so thick beset with enemies, that there was no way to escape (1).

† Vol. 2. p. 254. (1) Vid. chald. paraphr. Munst. & al. in loc.

As ſoon as they had done mourning for Saul, he conſulted the Lord which way he ſhould ſteer his courſe next; and being commanded to remove to Hebron, he brought thither his two wives, his relations, and army. Here he was again anointed king over Judah by thoſe of that tribe, who came to him in multitudes; whilſt Abner, Saul's general, took his ſon Iſh-boſheth, who was then forty years old, and proclaimed him king of Iſrael at Mahanaim. Thus was the kingdom divided between theſe two, each enjoying his own ſhare quietly, without moleſting the other, during the ſpace of two years (R), the tribe of Judah cleaving to David, and the reſt, at leaſt the moſt part, to Iſh-boſheth. The firſt popular thing David did after this was, to ſend a meſſage of thanks to the inhabitants of Jabeſh-gilead, for the regard they had paid to the bodies of the deceaſed king and his ſons. After which he married Maacha, the daughter of Tolmai, king of Geſhur [k], by whom he had afterwards Abſalom and Tamar [l]. But we cannot think, with our learned Uſher, that he contracted an affinity with that prince to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt his rival *; that being expreſly forbid by the law of Moſes. It is more probable, that he took her priſoner in one of his excurſions againſt that country, as we ſhall ſhew in a following note. At the end of two years, Abner having repaſſed the Jordan with his army, came and incamped on one ſide of the pool of Gibeon; and Joab, the ſon of Zeruiah, David's general, came and incamped over againſt him on the other ſide. Iſh-boſheth ſucceeds him.

HITHERTO there had paſſed no hoſtilities, nor any war being declared between the two monarchs; and their ſubjects on both ſides being all Iſraelites, there was a neceſſity of making ſome kind of hoſtile overture, which might bring on an engagement; the two generals, therefore, bethought themſelves of the following ſtrange one. They agreed agreed to ſend twelve brave men out of each army, to meet in a proper place between them, under pretence of performing ſome warlike exerciſe; but they were no ſooner come within reach of one another, than each man took his antagoniſt by the head, and ſheathed his ſword in his body; ſo that they were all killed upon the ſpot. In memory of this bloody feat the place was called Halkath Hatzurim, the field of the ſtrong men. There needed no more to ſet the two armies on fighting, and a dreadful battle immediately enſued, in which Abner's army was totally routed, and himſelf forced to fly for his life. Joab had two brave brothers with him, one of whom, named Azahel, was exceeding ſwift of foot, and he purſued after him with uncommon ſpeed, with a deſign to take him priſoner. Abner was ſoon aware of it, and, turning about, adviſed him once and again to deſiſt from his purſuit, and ſo content himſelf with a priſoner of leſs note; but Azahel ſtill perſiſting, Abner was forced to run him through the body with the hinder part of his ſpear. The ſight of his dead body cauſed ſuch a general ſtop in the flying remains of his army, that he was forced to cauſe it to be removed out of the road, and covered with a garment, that his men might have time to ſhun Joab's victorious hoſt, who were following cloſe at their heels. The purſuit laſted till ſun-ſet, by which time they were got as far as the hill of Ammah, within ſight of Giath, along the wilderneſs of Gibeon. Here the Benjamites rallied themſelves again under Abner, and poſted themſelves on the riſing of the hill, reſolved to make a ſtout defence; but their general, who was weary of fighting, called to Joab, and deſired him to put a ſtop to the ſlaughter of his brethren, whoſe deſtruction could not but cauſe bitterneſs in the end. Joab hearkened to him, and cauſed the trumpet to ſound a retreat; after which, Abner and his men took the way of Mahanaim, and Joab returned to Hebron. There were but nineteen men killed on David's ſide, beſides Azahel, but Benjamin loſt 360. Azahel's body was carried to Bethlehem, and buried in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors [m]; and from that time David grew ſtronger every day, and Iſh-boſheth weaker and weaker; but the war between thoſe two did not end but with the death of the latter, which happened ſhortly after.

(R) At leaſt this ſeems to be the ſenſe of thoſe words, and Iſh-boſheth reigned two years (2); for it is plain he reigned much longer, but not peaceably. Much the ſame was ſaid in the beginning of Saul's reign (3). Abner alſo might think it proper to take him to Mahanaim, which was beyond Jordan, that being free from the Philiſtines, he might have time to recruit his ſhatter'd army.

In the mean time, Abner, who had uſed all his endeavours to ſtrengthen his maſter's party, did ſet ſuch value upon upon his own ſervices, that he made no ſcruple to have a criminal intercourſe with one of Saul's concubines, named Rizpah; and when he was reprimanded for it by Iſh-boſheth (S), he reſented it ſo highly, that he ſwore, that he would from that minute become a friend to David, and bring all the tribes under his obedience. He delayed not to make his words good, by ſending meſſengers privately, firſt to David, and then to the elders of Iſrael, to contrive a revolt; after which, he found out the following pretence for going to David unſuſpected. That monarch had ſent to Iſh-boſheth, to deſire of him to ſend him his wife Michal, whom Saul, during his exile, had married to another; and Abner, having obtained an order from him to demand her of her huſband, took upon him to convey her ſafe to David. Whether Iſh-boſheth had any ſuſpicion of him, or not, yet his circumſtances were ſo tottering, that he dared not refuſe him any thing; ſo Abner went, accompanied with twenty men, and preſented Michal to David, and was graciouſly received by him. But as he was returning home, Joab, unknown to David, ſent for him back to Hebron, under ſome friendly pretence, and killed him as ſoon as he was come to the gate of the city, under pretence indeed of revenging his brother Azahel's death; but much more likely to rid himſelf of ſo powerful a rival. As ſoon as David heard of it, he proteſted his innocence of that bloody deed, and vented his reſentment in imprecations againſt the author of it; after which he cauſed Abner to be decently buried, and accompanied his corpſe to the grave, with all the tokens of ſorrow and reſpect [n]. However, as he knew himſelf as yet too weak to diſoblige Joab, whoſe power among the people might eaſily have turned the ſcale againſt him, he was forced to ſuppreſs his grief and reſentment for the treacherous murder of ſo conſiderable a perſon.

(S) It appears, by the ſequel of the Jewiſh hiſtory, that it was a very high crime, amounting to no leſs than treaſon, to marry a king's widow (4); much more muſt it have been ſo to debauch her, as Abner did Rizpah. So that Iſh-boſheth, notwithſtanding his obligations to that general, could not well avoid reſenting ſuch an affront being offered to the royal dignity, as came little ſhort of an attempt upon his crown.

(4) Vid. 1 Kings ii. 13, & ſeq.

Iſh-boſheth did ſoon hear of his death; and, as he had been the main ſupport of his kingdom, both he and his men began to fear, that David would ſoon be too ſtrong for him. This inſpired two of his captains, brethren of the family of the Beerothites, Baana and Rechab, to conſpire againſt his life, in hopes of recommending themſelves to David by it. They took the opportunity of the heat of the day, when he was lain down on his bed, to come into his houſe, under pretence of fetching their allowance of corn; and to enter into his chamber, where they barbarouſly murdered him; and having cut off his head fled away with it, unperceived, to Hebron, and preſented it to David, congratulating him upon the death of his competitor. It was hardly to be expected, that David, who had puniſhed the young Amalekite with death, for barely pretending to have killed Saul, could forbear expreſſing a much greater horror at this more inhuman regicide, or inflict a milder puniſhment upon the authors of it, whatever advantage his affairs might reap from it. Accordingly he commanded them to be immediately put to death, and their hands and feet to be cut off, and hung up over the pool of Hebron. As for the head of Iſh-boſheth, he cauſed it to be buried in the ſepulchre of Abner, which was alſo in the ſame city [o].

Iſh-boſheth murdered.

DAVID by this time had reigned over Judah in Hebron about ſeven years and half; and when the reſt of the tribes heard of Iſh-boſheth's death, they aſſembled themſelves, and came to anoint him king over all Iſrael, and to pay their homage to him. Theſe are reckoned, in another place [p], to have amounted to the number of 32,000 men and upwards, all ready armed, and expert warriors, out of all the twelve tribes, except part of that of Benjamin, which did ſtill ſtick to the houſe of Saul. David received them with joy, and feaſted them at Hebron during three days; all that time, not only his own and the neighbouring tribes, but even ſome of the more diſtant ones, pouring in plenty of proviſions upon them [q].

David reigns over all the 12 tribes.

ON the next year, David went and beſieged Jeruſalem, a place of ſuch ſtrength, that it had ſtood out till that time againſt the united force of Judah and Simeon. Here Joab ſhewed ſo much bravery and conduct, that he was made head head general of Iſrael [r]: he beat the Jebuſites that defended it, and carried the fortreſs of Sion, or Zion, by aſſault †, which David made his reſidence from that time. He inlarged and fortified it from Millo inward round about, and called it the city of David, whilſt Joab rebuilt the reſt of the city, and ſurrounded it with a ſtrong wall [s]; and from that time it became the metropolis of Judea.

But it was impoſſible for him to carry on ſuch a work, without alarming the jealous Philiſtines, who could not be ignorant either of the ſtrength of his army, or of his now reigning over all Iſrael without a competitor. They came, therefore, ſo ſuddenly upon him, that they took Bethlehem, and put a gariſon into it, before he could make any reſiſtance, whilſt he was forced to retire to the cave of Adullam for preſent ſafety [t]. It was here, that, having expreſſed a longing deſire for ſome of the water of the well of Bethlehem, three of his chief worthies ventured thro' the enemy's hoſt, which was encamped along the valley of Rephaim, and fetched him ſome water from thence. However, when they brought it to him, he choſe rather to ſpill it upon the ground than to drink it, ſeeing, as he ſaid, they had procured it at the hazard of their lives [u]. He then enquired of the Lord, whether he ſhould fall upon the Philiſtines; and having received a favourable anſwer, he diſcomfited them ſo effectually, both at this time, and upon a ſecond attempt of theirs, that they were never more able to make head againſt him, or any of his ſucceſſors [w]. David finding himſelf thus ſtrengthened, his army numerous and well diſciplined, under the conduct of more than thirty worthies, who had all ſignalized themſelves by ſome extraordinary exploits, and his enemies ſo thoroughly weakened, made a firm alliance with Hiram king of Tyre, by whom he was furniſhed with cedars and other woods, and with expert workmen, to build him a palace in his own city. He likewiſe increaſed the number of his wives and concubines, by whom he had a conſiderable number of children born at Jeruſalem, beſides thoſe that were born to him him in Hebron (T); all which did not a little contribute to his grandeur as well as happineſs.

His gratitude.

SUCH a ſeries of ſucceſſes, and the univerſal peace which then reigned through the whole kingdom, inſpired that pious prince with the higheſt ſentiments of gratitude and religion, and with a deſire of making his city the center, as it were, of God's worſhip, by tranſporting the ſacred ark thither, which had continued almoſt fifty years at Kirjath-jearim (V), and placing it in one of the beſt apartments

(T) David is recorded to have had ſix wives in Hebron, beſides Saul's daughter, who was then with another huſband. He is ſaid to have had a ſon by every one of the ſix former; by which is hardly meant that he had but one by each, but that the text mentions only their firſt-born (5). As for Maachah, the daughter of the king of Geſhur, the Jews affirm, that David had taken her captive, and forced her to embrace the Jewiſh religion; becauſe it was forbid by the law of Moſes to contract any affinity with the heathens. Either of theſe is far from improbable, becauſe we read of his making ſome excurſions againſt the Geſhurites during his abode at Ziglag (6); but nothing of his contracting ſuch a forbidden affinity with their king. Neither, indeed, is it likely, that ſo zealous a man, as David was, would have married her before ſhe had renounced her idolatry. But as to what they add, of his forcing her to turn Jew againſt her will, and that the ill hap of her two children, Abſalom and Tamar, the former of whom turned rebel againſt his father, and the latter was raviſhed by David's eldeſt ſon, was inflicted on him as a puniſhment for that violence (7), we ſhall not venture to affirm any thing about it.

How many wives and concubines he took, after he came from Hebron, the text doth not ſay, but mentions only, that he had ten ſons by them; by which the Talmudiſts gather, that he had ſixteen in all, beſides Michal, who being barren, was to be excepted out of that number. Hence they have paſſed it into a law, that a king ought to have no more wives than eighteen (8); and they believe, that all Solomon's miſcarriages were owing to his venturing to exceed that number.

(V) Archbiſhop Uſher reckons, that it was on the firſt ſabbatical year that it was brought from Gilgal to Shiloh, and that it was likewiſe upon ſuch another year that it was removed from Kirjath-jearim to the city of David; and that the 68th pſalm was ſung by the people who accompanied this ſolemn proceſſion (9).

ments of his new palace. He conſulted the elders and chiefs of Iſrael upon it, and being anſwered with the univerſal approbation of the aſſembly, he diſpatched meſſengers through the whole kingdom to invite all the prieſts and Levites, and as many of the people as were ſo diſpoſed, to come to the ſolemnity. The ark was accordingly ſet upon a new cart, and brought from Abinadab's houſe to Jeruſalem, accompanied by David and his court, by multitudes of prieſts and Levites, who ſang and played upon various inſtruments, and by a numerous concourſe of people from all parts of the kingdom. But their joy was ſuſpended by an accident, which filled the king and aſſembly with wonder and fear. The ark was come to Nachon's threſhing-floor (W), when the oxen that drew it, ſtarting at ſomething, were like to have overſet the cart; to prevent which, Uzzah, one of Abinadab's ſons, who drove it, clapt his hand upon the ark in a ſurpriſe, and was for his preſumption ſmitten with immediate death (X). David

(W) Though we have followed our verſion, it ſeems to us more probable, that the word נכון Nachon, is rather a participle than a proper name, and ſignifies ready fitted, or proper, becauſe we find that David ſtopped at proper diſtances to offer ſacrifices; and this ſeems to be one of them; and perhaps alſo might it be either the killing of the victims, or ſomething relating to thoſe ſacrifices, that made the oxen to ſtart. There was moreover a very great irregularity in placing the ark upon a cart; which, according to the law of Moſes, ought to have been carried by the prieſts upon their ſhoulders. This accident, therefore, made him ſo ſenſible of his error, that the author of the book of the Chronicles obſerves, that he acknowledged it to the prieſts at the next removal of the ark, and cauſed them to bear it upon their ſhoulders to his houſe.

(X) This ſudden and ſevere puniſhment upon Uzzah for his indiſcreet zeal, which David himſelf could not forbear being much ſurpriſed and diſpleaſed at (11), has given ſo much offence to ſome interpreters, that they have ſought for a quite different ſenſe of the words, in order to make his crime greater than is commonly apprehended. It is true, that the original runs literally thus, and Uzzah ſent and ſeized the ark, for the cattle ſhook. From which they would conclude, that he rather offered ſome indignity to it, than endeavoured to prevent its falling. But, beſides that this is contrary to all the antient verſions and to the book of the Chronicles, where this fact is more clearly related, it is certain, that could not forbear expreſſing a more than ordinary grief at this ſeverity, which made him call the place Perez Uzzah, that is the breach or puniſhment of Uzzah, and reſolved to have the ark depoſited into the houſe of Obededom, the ſon of Jeduthun [x], ſurnamed the Gittite, probably, becauſe he was a native of Gath-rimmon, a city allotted to the tribe of Levi [y], where it continued about three months. David, finding ſoon after, that God had bleſſed that Levite in an extraordinary manner, ever ſince the ark had been under his roof, reſolved to procure a ſhare of thoſe divine bleſſings by removing it to his own houſe. However, he took care to have it performed in a more regular manner, by preparing a ſumptuous tabernacle for it, by aſſembling the prieſts, and cauſing them to bear it according to God's command, by offering ſacrifices at every ſix paces (Y), and by ſhewing an uncommon joy upon that ſolemn occaſion. For he put on a linen ephod, and danced before that if that had been the caſe, David would have expreſſed his reſentment againſt him, and not againſt God for puniſhing him. Uzzah, being a Levite, ought to have remembered, that it was forbid, under pain of death (12), to any, but to the prieſts, to touch the ark; and even theſe were only to touch the ſtaves by which it was carried, which for that reaſon were never to be taken from it. It may alſo be, that Uzzah was the contriver of this new way of carrying the ark upon a cart, inſtead of the prieſts ſhoulders. However, if his puniſhment ſhould ſtill ſeem too ſevere, one may ſuppoſe, that God ſuffered it to be ſo, in order to inſpire the people with a greater reſpect and awe for that ſacred ſymbol of his preſence, than they were naturally inclined to.

(Y) This we take to be the meaning of the text here (13), though it only ſays, that when the bearers had proceeded ſix ſteps, he offered a bullock, &c. But ſome think that Uzzah having been ſtruck dead within ſix yards of his own houſe, David cauſed theſe ſacrifices to be made at the firſt ſix ſteps of the prieſts, to intreat the Lord to be more favourable this time (14). But we find in the Chronicles *, that they repeated the ſame ſacrifices when they came near David's houſe, in thankfulneſs, that God had before the ark at the ſound of a great number of inſtruments, inſomuch, that Michal, who ſaw the proceſſion through a window, could not forbear deſpiſing and reflecting upon him, for acting, as ſhe thought, ſo far beneath a king of Iſrael. As ſoon as the ark was depoſited in the tabernacle, he offered a large quantity of burnt and peace-offerings; and having feaſted the great concourſe of people who came to the city, he diſmiſſed them to their own homes [z].

THE ark being thus fixed in its repoſitory, his next care was to appoint the claſſes of prieſts and Levites to officiate before it, according to their ſeveral functions. He alſo choſe a number of ſingers and players upon muſical inſtruments to celebrate the praiſes of God in their turns, to ſet ſuch pſalms and hymns as he, or any other inſpired perſon, compoſed, in order to have them ſung upon feſtivals and other ſolemn occaſions. The author of the Chronicles has preſerved us one of them in words at length, which he then compoſed as an euchariſtical canticle, and delivered to the muſicians to be ſung upon the removal of the ark to his houſe [a]; which may be juſtly eſteemed one of the ſublimeſt pieces of poetry extant, whether for its elegancy, or for the ſtrain of piety and gratitude that runs through the whole.

SOON after this, he ſent for the prophet Nathan, to conſult with him about the building of a temple of the Lord, telling him, that he could not, with any eaſe, dwell in a ſumptuous palace, whilſt the ark was only under a tabernacle. The prophet applauded his pious deſign, not doubting, but God would ratify and proſper it; but God, who appeared to him that night, directed him to go to the king, and to tell him, that though his intentions were highly acceptable to him, yet, foraſmuch as he had ſo often had helped the Levites to bring the ark to the place appointed for it, without any accident.

It may be wondered at, that David choſe to erect a new tabernacle for the ark, inſtead of ſending for that which Moſes had cauſed to be made in the wilderneſs. It may be ſuppoſed, indeed, that the precincture of his palace was not capacious enough for it, but whatever the reaſon be, it is certain, that it continued ſtill, with the altar and all its other ſacred utenſils, at Gibeon, till Solomon, having built his temple, cauſed them to be brought and depoſited in it, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place.

ten defiled his hands with blood, he did not think him a proper perſon for ſuch a work, but that he would raiſe him up a ſon and ſucceſſor (Z), whoſe reign he would bleſs with a profound peace, with extraordinary wiſdom, affluence, and proſperity, and that he ſhould build him a temple. He added, that it was upon him that he would ſettle the throne of Iſrael unto the end, and proſper him and his ſucceſſors in proportion to their obedience to him; and that even the moſt ſtubborn diſobedience ſhould not bring upon them a total dereliction, but only ſuch fatherly chaſtiſements as might bring them to a filial repentance. David, full of the ſenſe of all theſe gracious promiſes, went and proſtrated himſelf before the Lord, and, in the humbleſt and moſt pathetic terms, acknowledged his extreme unworthineſs of all theſe promiſed mercies, and his reliance on his omnipotent goodneſs for the fulfilling of them in his own good time [b].

FROM that time, he applyed part of his care in makeing preparations for that ſumptuous building, and in laying up for it immenſe quantities of gold, ſilver, copper, precious ſtones, woods and other materials. For in thoſe ſucceſsful wars which he had againſt the Philiſtines [c], Moabites [d], Amalekites [e], the kings of Zobah, Syria [f], and Edom [g], of which the beſt account has been given in their ſeveral hiſtories that could be got out of the ſacred records, he

(Z) From the words in the text, the ſeed or ſon that ſhall proceed out of thy bowels (15), the Jews infer, that the crown could devolve neither to Ammon, Abſalom, Adonijah, nor to any of thoſe ſons that were born before this promiſe (16); but as the future is often uſed for the perfect tenſe, according to the genius of the original, the argument is no way concluſive, unleſs we throw into the ſcale the objection which is urged againſt the father, being equally ſtrong againſt thoſe ſons, who, being all warriors, had no doubt, embrued their hands in blood; from which Solomon was to be altogether free. This exception is not indeed mentioned in the book of Kings, but we find it urged in the book of Chronicles, as an argument, why God did not think David pure enough to erect ſo ſacred an edifice to him (17).

he got ſuch a prodigious quantity of the richeſt ſpoil, part of which he never failed to dedicate to this deſign, that the wealth which he left his ſon at his death is almoſt beyond belief. His œconomy was not inferior to his ſucceſs; he found, that the keeping of a numerous army would either exhauſt his treaſury too much, or cauſe too great a ſhare of his ſubjects lands to lie uncultivated; to prevent which he appointed twelve bands, each of 24,000 men, with proper officers over them, to ſerve each their reſpective month in the year; after which, they were diſmiſſed to their own private affairs during the other eleven months. He likewiſe appointed twelve expert perſons over his finances (A), under Aſhmaveth and Adoram; and judges in every tribe, to adminiſter juſtice to the people; beſides thoſe of his great council, who had the affairs of religion and ſtate under their care; the former under the two high-prieſts, Zadok the ſon of Ahitub and Ahimelech the ſon of Abiathar (B); and the latter under proper

(A) Theſe are ſuppoſed to have been of two kinds, either ſuch as were exacted from his ſubjects, or thoſe that accrued from his own hereditary lands or conquered dominions. Each kind of tribute, whether paid in money, grain, or other produce, were collected by their particular officers (18).

(B) We have already taken notice, that theſe two were, the one, namely Zadok, of the eldeſt, and Ahimelech of the youngeſt, branch of Aaron's family, and that the high-prieſthood had ſhifted from the one to the other †, but that one of each branch ſhould exerciſe that function at the ſame time, is what is not to be met with either before or ſince. It is probable, that Saul after he had killed all the prieſts in Nob, except Abiathar who fled to David, might ſet up Zadoc to officiate in that dignity in Iſrael, as Eleazar did in Judah, and that when David came to be king of all the twelve tribes, he did not think fit to deprive either of their office, but ſuffered them both to continue in it; but whether alternately, or ſubordinately, whether the one at Gibeon, where the tabernacle ſtood, and the other at Jeruſalem, where the ark was; or laſtly, whether the one in the tribe of Judah, and the other over the other tribes, we will not venture to determine. Certain it is, that they are ſtill mentioned together upon ſeveral other occaſions (19) till the beginning of Solomon's officers, among which Joab was general of the army; Jehoſhaphat was chief ſecretary, Serajah recorder, Benajah over the Cherethites and Pelethites (C); whilſt ſome

lomon's reign, when Zadok's competitor was diveſted of his dignity, for having gone over to the party of Adonijah (20).

(C) It is not eaſy to gueſs who theſe were. The Chaldee paraphraſt renders theſe words by archers and ſlingers; and the Rabbies underſtand by it, abſurdly enough, ſome the Urim and Thummim, and others the grand Sanhedrim, deriving the firſt word from כרת Careth, to break ſhort, as if they had been גבורתום דברי׳הם men that broke their ſentences ſhort, or ſpoke ſuccinctly and with authority, and the other from פלא Phele, wonderful (21); and if we have no better helps, we may remain in the dark long enough. But we have already obſerved elſewhere, that the Cherethites were Philiſtines *, and we ſhall now give ſome further proofs of it.

When the Amalekites had burnt Ziklag, and David, in purſuit of them, met with an Egyptian; that youth informed him, that they had made an incurſion into the ſouth of the Cherethites and ſo on (22); from which it is plain, that they muſt have been either Philiſtines, or ſome people that dwelt among them, as the Geſhurites did; unleſs we will ſuppoſe with Tremellius, that they were a colony of Iſraelites that took poſſeſſion of that country, after the Philiſtines had been driven out of it, which we ſee no grounds for admitting. For we find the prophet Ezekiel joining the Cherethites and Philiſtines together, either as ſynonymous, or at leaſt cohabiters, in theſe words, Behold I will ſtretch out mine hand againſt the Philiſtines, and cut off the Cheretims, and deſtroy the remnant of the ſea-coaſt (23). Another prophet expreſſes himſelf much after the ſame manner, Woe unto the inhabitants of the ſea-coaſts, the nation of the Cherethites, the Lord is againſt you, O Canaan the land of the Philiſtines (24). Thus far concerning the Cherethites.

As for the Pelethites, we meet with nothing concerning them, except their being joined with them in this place, and in ſome chapters after, where they are both mentioned as accompanying David when he fled from his ſon Abſalom (25). But whether theſe two people were captives of war, auxiliary troops, or a kind of life-guard, we will not venture to determine.

Gratitude to Jonathan's ſon.

BUT neither the cares of ſtate, nor his uncommon proſperity, could make him forget his affectionate engagements to his late generous friend Jonathan. He ſought out his only ſon Mephibosheth, who was lame of his feet, and under the care of one of Saul's ſervants named Ziba; he ſent for him to court, and after he had ſhewed him all poſſible tokens of friendſhip and tenderneſs, he cauſed all the lands of his royal grandfather to be reſtored to him, commanding Ziba to improve them to the beſt advantage for his maſter, and appointed him a table in his own palace, and among his own ſons; which he enjoyed to the day of his death [i].

HIS gratitude to the king of the Ammonites did not meet with the ſame returns: Nahaſh, from whom David had received ſome ſignal favours, being dead, he ſent a congratulatory embaſſy to his ſon, with offers of mutual friendſhip, but that weak prince, unjuſtly ſuſpecting the ambaſſadors were come upon ſome baſer deſign, treated them in a ſhameful manner and ſent them away. This affront, however, turned to David's advantage; Joab was ſent to revenge it at the head of a powerful army, and that

And it is plain, that in ſeveral other places, particularly thoſe quoted in the margin (26), the word is generally taken in that ſenſe. Several learned Jews indeed, to extol the piety of David, underſtand by Cohen here the diſciples of the prieſts, from which they would infer, that that pious monarch cauſed his ſons to be educated under them (27). If that were true, it is certain, that ſome of them did not much credit their maſters; but the text ſays nothing of it: on the contrary, the author of the firſt book of the Chronicles tells us, that Jonathan, David's uncle, a perſon of conſummate wiſdom, was the perſon who was intruſted with that important buſineſs (28).

that victorious general gained a complete victory againſt the Ammonites and their confederates, and returned to Jeruſalem. The Syrians, however, one of thoſe confederates, came again the next year with a freſh army: Shobach, general of Hadadezer, or Hadarezer, king of Syria Zobea, who was at their head, came and encamped at Helam; but David made ſuch ſpeed over Jordan with a powerful army, and gave him ſuch an overthrow, that they were glad to clap up a peace with him, and to become his tributaries. The Ammonites were likewiſe ſo weakened by theſe defeats, that they would have been glad to have remained quiet; but David was too exaſperated and too ſucceſsful againſt them, not purſue his victory to the utmoſt, by ſending Joab to invade their country, which that general did with that valour and ſeverity, as reduced them to the loweſt ebb *.

WHILST Joab was taken up with the ſiege of the metropolis of the unfortunate children of Ammon, a place of ſuch ſtrength that it held out two years againſt him; David, wholly relying on his valour and conduct, was ſolacing himſelf at home, and became unfortunately enamoured with a beautiful woman, whom he had, from his terrace, obſerved waſhing herſelf one evening in her garden. Upon enquiring who ſhe was, he was informed, that ſhe was the daughter and wife of two of his braveſt captains, Eliam and Uriah (E), who were then with Joab at the ſiege; but his paſſion proved too violent to admit of any check from reaſon or religion, or even of a delay. The fruit of their unlawful commerce was her ſudden pregnancy, and the danger danger ſhe was in of being put put to death for it, according to the law of Moſes. The king bethought himſelf of an expedient to prevent the latter, by ſending for her huſband from the ſiege, under pretence indeed of informing himſelf how it was carried on, but in reality, in hopes of his ſpending a night or two with her; but whether Uriah had any ſuſpicion of the wrong done to him, or whether, indeed, he thought it beneath the bravery of a captain to go and ſolace himſelf at home, whilſt his general and fellow-ſoldiers were expoſed to the fatigues of a ſiege; he made this laſt his excuſe for not going home to his wife, and contented himſelf with lying at the gate of the palace, with the reſt of the king's guard. The king, thus diſappointed reſolved to try him a ſecond time; he made him eat at his table, and at ſupper plied him ſo well with wine, that he did not doubt, but he would, in that merry humour, have gone home to his wife; but Uriah, drunk as he was, ſpent that night alſo with the guards; and the king who by this time could not but ſuſpect, that he had ſome more private reaſon for abſenting himſelf from home, reſolved to ſacrifice his life to that of his faithleſs wife. Accordingly, on the next morning, he diſpatched him with a letter to Joab, wherein he ordered that general, who was the fitteſt perſon for ſuch a bloody deed, to expoſe that brave officer to ſome imminent danger, and to leave him to the fury of the beſieged. This was accordingly done; and David having received the news of his death, ſent and acquainted Bathſheba with it, who put herſelf in mourning for him, and was ſoon after ſheltered from danger by being married to the king [k]. We have ſeen elſewhere, the ſucceſs of this long ſiege, and the hard fate of the conquered Ammonites *: all we need to add here is, that what is ſaid there of their monarch's crown, that it weighed a talent of gold, that is upwards of 113 pounds, is rather to be underſtood of its worth than its weight, that is, that the gold and precious ſtones, with which it was adorned, was equal in worth to a talent of gold (F) [l].

(E) At leaſt we find one Eliam in the number of David's worthies, who was the ſon of Ahitophel (29), and is ſuppoſed to have been her father, and that the affront offered to her cauſed that great politician to join in the conſpiracy of Abſalom. As for her huſband, he is ſurnamed the Hittite, probably, becauſe he was of that nation, and a proſelyte to the Jewiſh religion, though ſome will have it, that he is ſo called, only becauſe he was either born or had dwelt amongſt them, or upon ſome warlike exploit he had atchieved againſt them (30). Joſephus neither mentions this as a ſurname, or as that of his nation, but only ſays, that he was Joab's armour-bearer (31).

(F) It were indeed abſurd to underſtand it otherwiſe, for what man could bear ſuch a weight, though we ſhould even underſtand it of the common talent of 60 pounds. as Kimchi doth. Some Jews and others do indeed fancy, that it was only hung over the monarch's

In the interim, God, highly provoked with David for two ſuch heinous crimes, made choice of the prophet Nathan to go and denounce his ſevere judgments againſt him, at the time when that monarch, inſenſible of his guilt, was hugging in his arms the fruit of his adultery. The prophet, who knew his generous and upright heart, in any caſe wherein this new and criminal paſſion was not concerned, accoſted him with a parable of a wealthy man, who had ſpared his own numerous flocks, and ſeized upon an only favourite lamb of a poor neighbour, to feaſt an hungry gueſt. He dreſt his ſtory with ſuch aggravating circumſtances, that the king in anger pronounced ſentence of death againſt the perſon who had been guilty of ſuch an unnatural violence. The words were no ſooner out of his mouth, than Nathan made him ſenſible, that he had pronounced it againſt himſelf, by telling him, with a prophetic boldneſs, that he was the guilty perſon, and much more guilty than that in the parable, in that he had not only defiled the bed of a faithful captain, but had murdered him by an enemy's ſword, that he might take the adultereſs into his boſom. He then recapitulated to him all the aggravations of his double crime; particularly his ingratitude to his divine protector and benefactor, and the occaſion he had given to his enemies to blaſpheme (G). He concluded with monarch's head, like the top of a canopy (32); but this is contrary to the plain meaning of the original, which did not want words to have expreſt that circumſtance, had it been fact. But we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew, that the word משקל Miſhkal, doth often ſignify the value, though properly and generally the weight, of a thing (33).

(G) This expreſſion of the prophet inclines us to think, that David had not been able ſo to conceal his crime, but that it had taken wind among the neighbouring nations, who could not forbear reflecting upon the God of Iſrael, for favouring a monarch who could be guilty of ſuch horrid crimes, as themſelves perhaps were ſtrangers to.

David, however, was ſo ſenſibly touched with his guilt, that he ceaſed not compoſing pſalms, full of the ſtrongeſt expreſſions of humility and repentance. Some of them ſeem even to intimate, that God had ſmitten him with ſome very grievous and painful with denouncing the effects of the divine reſentment againſt him, that Uriah's murder would prove an endleſs ſource of bloodſhed in his own poſterity, and that his adultery, how private ſoever, ſhould be expiated by the open defilement of his own wives and concubines, by thoſe of his own family, and in the face of the ſun.

THIS terrible ſentence brought David to ſuch a deep ſenſe of his guilt, that his heart, too full of it, could only ſay, I have ſinned againſt the Lord; but the ſincere remorſe with which it was uttered obtained an immediate alleviation of the puniſhment. However, the unhappy ſon of Bathſheba was doomed to death, and David tried in vain to obtain a reprieve for him, by prayers, and tears, by faſting, ſack-cloath, lying on the ground, and other marks of repentance. As for the other part of the ſentence, which related to his wives, it was ſoon after fulfilled by his unnatural ſon Abſalom, as we ſhall ſee anon. The child being dead, according to the ſaying of the prophet, David comforted his new wife for the loſs of it, ſoon after which ſhe found herſelf pregnant, and he called the ſon that ſhe then bore to him Solomon, a name ſignificative of his future peaceful reign, to which Nathan added that of Jedidiah, or beloved of the Lord [m], ſuch as he proved indeed, at leaſt during the former part of his glorious and ſucceſsful reign.

BUT it proved far otherwiſe with the remainder of that of his father, who, what hopes ſoever he might have conceived, from the birth and promiſed glory of this new ſon, and from his victory over the Ammonites, that his repentance had happily diſarmed the divine anger; never ceaſed feeling ſome of the ſevereſt and moſt ſenſible ſtrokes of it, to the laſt period of his life: not indeed from his enemies without, from whom it doth not appear that he received the leaſt moleſtation, but from thoſe of his own family, even from his own children. Ammon his eldeſt ſon, was ſcarcely painful diſeaſe, as a puniſhment for his ſin (34); but it is poſſible, that they may be altogether allegorical, and ſignificative only of his exceſſive grief and remorſe for it. Among his other penitential compoſitions, the 51ſt is ſuppoſed to have been writ immediately after Nathan's ſevere reproof.

ſcarcely eighteen years of age, when he layed the foundation of all the domeſtic troubles of his too indulgent father, by an unnatural inceſt with one of his own ſiſters. David had had two children by Maachah, the princeſs of Geſhur, Abſalom and Tamar [n], whoſe beauty became the unhappy cauſe of this unlawful paſſion. Ammon was obſerved to pine away ſecretly, aſhamed to diſcover the cauſe of his trouble, when a near relation, Jonadab, the ſon of Shimeah, David's brother, having pumped the fatal ſecret out, not only encouraged him, but furniſhed him with means to perpetrate the deed. According to his helliſh advice, Ammon, pretending that his diſeaſe had now confined him to his bed, obtained an order from his father, that Tamar ſhould come to him, and make him ſome kind of confectionary meat, to pleaſe his palled appetite; which that innocent princeſs readily complied with. But ſhe was ſcarcely entered with it into his bed-chamber, before he, having previouſly ſent all his attendants far enough, laid hold on her, and, in ſpite of all her prayers and remonſtrances, raviſhed her. His luſt thus ſatisfied, he conceived ſuch a diſguſt againſt her, that, not being able to bear her preſence any longer, and finding a juſt and modeſt reluctancy in her to withdraw in that deplorable condition, his barbarity roſe to ſuch a heighth, that he violently cauſed her to be turned out of his houſe by ſome of his ſervants. Her grief and confuſion were now become too great to ſuffer her to think how to avoid expoſing herſelf; ſo that, forgetting every thing but her preſent misfortunes, ſhe only ſought how to expreſs her ſenſe of it by the moſt lively tokens; by tearing her virgin robes, covering her head with duſt, by walking with her arms over her head, and filling the air with her cries. In this manner ſhe went to Abſalom's houſe, who being her brother, both by father and mother, was the propereſt perſon to procure her a redreſs, if any could be had. That prince, who was naturally haughty and revengeful, could not but feel the deepeſt reſentment againſt ſo barbarous a violence; however, as the revenge he meditated againſt the raviſher was of too deep a nature to be preſently executed, he contented himſelf with deſiring his diſconſolate ſiſter to alleviate, or at leaſt to conceal, her grief, ſeeing it was a brother who was the cauſe of it; and to ſpend the remainder of her days in ſolitude with him; which ſhe did accordingly; whilſt he, young as he was, did ſo well conceal his reſentment, that Ammon had not the leaſt ſuſpicion ſuſpicion of it. When the news of this villainous action came to David's ears, he was exceedingly troubled at it, but that was all; Ammon was his eldeſt ſon, and he could not prevail upon himſelf to inflict any other puniſhment on him, than that of his diſpleaſure.

THIS remiſſneſs did but add fewel to Abſalom's hatred, though he did not find a proper opportunity for his deſign till two years after; by which time Ammon's crime might be ſuppoſed to be forgot. The better to conceal his revenge, he invited his father and all his brothers to a ſheep-ſhearing feaſt, which he was to make at Baal-hazor. He eaſily excuſed the king, who declined going, from a principal of oeconomy, becauſe he had only invited him out of formality, and to avoid ſuſpicion; but he inſiſted, in particular, upon his brother Ammon's favouring him with his preſence with the reſt of his brethren, and eaſily obtained his conſent. When they were come to the place, he received them with an air, which ſhewed nothing leſs than his murdering intention; but as ſoon as he obſerved that wine had raiſed their mirth to the deſired pitch, he gave a ſignal to a number of his ſervants, whom he had appointed for the deed, and who immediately fell upon Ammon and ſtabbed him to death; whilſt the reſt of the king's ſon's expecting, perhaps, their turns would be next, made all poſſible haſte to get to their mules, and rode away to Jeruſalem. But before they could reach it, word had been brought to the king, that Abſalom had cauſed all his brethren to be aſſaſſinated. One may eaſily imagine how he received the dreadful news; he rent his cloaths, caſt himſelf down upon the ground, and abandoned himſelf to the moſt violent expreſſions of grief. The ſervants that were about him endeavoured to bear a part in this tragic ſcene, and ſtood round him with their cloaths rent. Jonadab only, the famous inſtrument of Ammon's inceſt, did rightly gueſs, that he alone had proved the victim of Abſalom's revenge. He acquainted the king with his thoughts, which were ſoon after confirmed by the arrival of the reſt of the young princes, who, with tears in their eyes, told him all that had happened. It was a melancholy meeting on all hands; the king mourned for ſome time the loſs of his eldeſt ſon, whilſt his murderer, not expecting the ſame remiſſneſs from him, went and ſheltered himſelf under the protection of his grandfather, the king of Geſhur, where he continued three whole years [o].

Ammon murdered by Abſalom.

BY

By that time, Joab, obſerving that the king expreſſed leſs grief for his dead ſon, than uneaſineſs for his abſent one, did reaſonably conclude, that if he could work upon him to recal him by any ſtratagem that could but ſave his honour, it would be an acceptable ſervice to them both. To compaſs this, he inſtructed a notable woman, whom he had ſent for from Tekoah, a place not far from Jeruſalem, to addreſs herſelf to the king under the perſonage of a diſtreſſed widow, juſt on the brink of being bereaved of the only ſon ſhe had left, who was in danger of being put to death, for having killed his brother in a fray, by which there would be a final end of her huſband's name and family. The ſtory bore indeed no parallel with that of Abſalom; perhaps the politic Joab had contrived it ſo, to prevent the king's ſuſpecting of it to be a deſigned thing. However, ſhe told it with ſuch pathetic expreſſions of grief, that David, moved with compaſſion, gave her his royal word, that her ſurviving ſon ſhould be ſheltered from all future proſecution. He had ſcarce bound it with an oath, when, according to her inſtructions, ſhe took the liberty, though in the humbleſt terms, to repreſent to him the wrong he did himſelf, by ſuffering his ſon to continue longer in his baniſhment, ſeeing that could by no means recal the dead, whoſe life once gone was like water ſpilt upon the ground, which could not be gathered up again. The king, who by this time perceived the woman's drift, failed not to conclude, that Joab was at the bottom of it; he taxed the woman with it, and ſhe, in the modeſteſt terms, acknowledged it, adding, that the king was as an angel of God, from whom it was impoſſible to conceal any thing. Joab, who was preſent all this while, took this opportunity of falling proſtrate before him, ſeemingly to beg pardon for his ſtratagem, but really to lay hold on his promiſe in favour of Abſalom; and David, as willing to grant as he was to aſk, did immediately order him to fetch him from his baniſhment, but with this condition, that he ſhould not approach the king's perſon, but retire to his own houſe; which was complied with accordingly, for he did not ſee the king for two whole years after his return (H). But being tired at length with living ing ſo long in diſgrace, and having ſent in vain for Joab, once and again, to come to him, he found no other way of bringing him, but cauſing ſome of his adjacent corn to be ſet on fire. Joab ſoon came to him at the news of this unexpected treatment; and, after ſome paſſionate expoſtulations on both ſides, it was agreed, that the king ſhould be applied to in favour of his ſon, which was ſoon after ſucceſsfully done by that general [P]. Abſalom reconciled to his father.

THIS reconciliation could not but convince Abſalom of his father's weak fondneſs for him; but that ungrateful prince ſought only how to make the moſt unnatural advantage of it. He immediately procured a ſumptuous equipage of chariots, horſes, and running footmen, to attract the eyes of the people; and, by an affected popularity, and ſeeming compaſſion for theſe who came to the king for juſtice, and the difficulty of obtaining it from him, it

One circumſtance it mentions, relating to the yearly polling of his hair; which, taken in a literal ſenſe, will appear incredible, it being ſaid to have amounted to 200 ſhekels after the king's weight, that is, at leaſt, to three pounds two ounces; but to double that weight, according to ſome, who make the king's ſhekel to have been equal to that of the ſanctuary, that is to half an ounce averdupois. Such a monſtrous quantity of hair, were any head able to bear the weight of it, would rather diſfigure, than be an ornament to it; we think it therefore more probable, that the word שקל Shakal, is here to be underſtood of the value, and not of the weight of it; that is, that it was worth 200 ſhekels, whether half or quarters of ounces of ſilver. Not that we will ſuppoſe that Abſalom ſold them, though even that is not impoſſible (35), but that, whether he gave it to his ſervants, as a perquiſite, or to ſome favourite woman, it was reckoned worth that ſum. Some Jewiſh doctors do tell us, that his hair being exceeding long and fair, was in great requeſt among the great women in Jeruſalem, to adorn their heads with (36).

There is another difficulty in this place (37), where mention is made of Abſalom's three ſons, and of one daughter, named Thamar; whereas it is ſaid, in another place, that he reared up a pillar in the king's dale, to perpetuate his name, becauſe he had no male iſſue. All that can be ſuppoſed is, that they died in that ſhort interval, though no mention is made of their death.

it was not long before he gained alſo their hearts, and perſuaded them, that they would be much happier under his government. This he continued doing ſome years (I), after which, finding himſelf ſtrong enough to break out into an open rebellion, and being perhaps afraid, leſt his artifices ſhould at length give the king ſome ſuſpicion of his perfidious deſign, he obtained leave of his too eaſy father to go and perform a pretended vow in Hebron, where he had appointed the chief of his party to meet him; whilſt others, who were diſperſed through the tribes, were ordered to proclaim him king, as ſoon as they heard the ſignal given by the ſound of the trumpet. He took among others 200 men from Jeruſalem, who, being altogether ignorant of his deſign, ſerved only to conceal it the more. At his coming to Hebron, he ſent for Ahitophel (K) from Giloh, his native place; and the defection of that great politician, who had been one of David's chief counſellors, did not contribute a little to increaſe the number of conſpirators. David was then at Jeruſalem, when news were brought to him of his ſon's rebellion; and being afraid of being ſurpriſed in it, and of being the cauſe, perhaps, of its inhabitants being put to the ſword, he left his palace to the care of ten of his concubines, and made what haſte he could out of the city. As ſoon as he came to the next convenient place, he made a halt, to take a melancholy view of the handful of men which followed him, and having obſerved the Cherethites and Pelethites to be

Year of the Flood, 1976. Year before Chriſt, 1023.

(I) The text ſays forty years (39), but the learned Uſher has ſhewed, that it can be only meant from David's being firſt anointed by Samuel, and not from his reconciliation to Abſalom; for this rebellion happened about four years after it (40). That prelate obſerves, that it was before or about Whitſuntide, by the new fruits and parched corn, which Barzillai brought to David in his flight (41).

We may likewiſe obſerve here, that Abſalom is the firſt who introduced the uſe of horſes in Iſrael; till then the kings uſed to ride on mules, and the greateſt nobles upon aſſes, as we have ſeen in the hiſtory of the judges.

be of that number, whom we before obſerved to have been ſtrangers; he addreſſed himſelf to Ittai, who was probably their commander, and told him, that he did not expect that they, who were ſo lately come into his ſervice, ſhould ſhare in his adverſe fortune, and adviſed him to return home with his men, ſince it was not in his power now to reward their fidelity. But that brave officer anſwered him with an oath, that he would never forſake him, whatever might be the ſucceſs of his affairs, as long as he was able to draw a ſword in his defence. The king, who could not but admire ſo faithful a zeal in a ſtranger, deſired him to paſs before him over the brook Kedron, whilſt the reſt of his followers, and the people that came to ſee this ſorrowful ſight, ſhed plenty of tears, to ſee the diſtreſs into which their monarch was driven by his unnatural ſon.

AMONG thoſe that followed the king, were the high-prieſts, Zadok and Abiathaz, at the head of a number of Levites who had brought the ark of God with them. David, however, did not think fit that they ſhould follow him, but commanded them to bear the ark back to Jeruſalem, whence they might ſend him intelligence of all that paſſed there, by their two ſons Ahimas and Jonathan, and aſſiſt him with their counſel, as they were ſeers; that is, as they had the gift of prophecy; whilſt he went and concealed himſelf in ſome of the plains of the wilderneſs, reſolved to ſubmit to whatever God ſhould decree concerning him. As ſoon as the prieſts were departed, David received the melancholy news, that Ahitophel was gone over to his ſon; upon which, he prayed earneſtly to God, to confound whatever counſel that old ſtateſman ſhould give to the conſpirators; and went up ſoon after, he and his ſmall troop, the aſcent of mount Olivet, accompanied by his wives and children, and ſome people that followed him from Jeruſalem. The march was mournful beyond expreſſion: the king, bathed in tears, went up with his head covered, and his feet bare (L), whilſt his ſorrowful retinue expreſt their deep concern for him, by the livelieſt expreſſions of real grief. When they were come to the top of it, and had offered up their prayers to God, providence ſent him an old friend named Huſhai, who came with his cloaths rent, and aſhes upon his head, reſolved to ſhare in his misfortunes. David, though ſatisfied of his fidelity, did not think fit, however, to take him into his retinue, but rather begged of him to join himſelf to that of his rebellious ſon, where he might do him much greater ſervice, by thwarting the counſels of Ahitophel, and by informing him, by means of the two high-prieſts, of every thing that was reſolved among the rebels. Huſhai readily accepted the office, and acquitted himſelf of it with ſuch faithful zeal, that he proved one main inſtrument of their overthrow [q].

In the mean time, whilſt the ſorrowful monarch was on his march, Ziba, the treacherous ſervant of Mephiboſheth, brought him ſome neceſſary refreſhments; and being aſked where his maſter was, told him, that he was then at Jeruſalem, where he expected to be ſhortly reſtored to the throne of Iſrael. An accident, that followed upon the heels of this falſe report, helped to convince David of Mephiboſheth's ingratitude. He was ſcarce come as far as Bahurim, a village not very far diſtant from that metropolis, when he was met by one of Saul's family, named Shimei, who had the boldneſs to throw vollies of ſtones at him, accompanied with the bittereſt curſes and imprecations, for being the author of Saul's misfortunes, notwithſtanding David was, at that time, ſurrounded by his guards and all his friends. This unexpected indignity did ſo inrage ſome of his captains, that they offered to go and ſmite off his head; but David reſtrained them, by putting them in mind of his more unnatural ſon, who ſought a tender father's life, whilſt this Benjamite expreſt no more than a natural concern for Saul's houſe; adding, that if his curſes came from God, as he knew not but they did, patience and reſignation would more effectually avert them, than ſuch a bloody reſentment. However, the thoughts of his having a double enemy now to ſtrive againſt, and that Mephiboſheth had cauſed a new revolt againſt him; touched him ſo to the quick, that he gave all his lands away to his faithleſs ſervant, which was all that the wretch ſought for by this falſe accuſation.

By this time, Abſalom and Ahitophel were come to Jeruſalem, that city not daring to make any reſiſtance to that hitherto ſucceſsful prince; and here it was, that Huſhai came to congratulate and offer his ſervices to him. Ab-

[q] xv. p. tot.

Abſalom, who knew him to have been a very faithful friend to his father, expreſt ſome ſurpriſe at firſt at this unexpected change; but was anſwered by that politic gentleman, that he thought it high time to abandon the father's intereſt, when providence had ſo openly declared for the ſon, who was, moreover, invited to the crown by the univerſal acclamations of the people; ſo that he had now no more to do but to ſerve him with the ſame fidelity, that he had done his father. Such a ſoothing ſpeech, could not but pleaſe the proud young prince, who admitted him into the number of his counſellors without the leaſt ſuſpicion; and repoſed ſuch confidence in him, that he ſoon after preferred his advice to that of Ahitophel, and loſt thereby the faireſt opportunity of ſecuring the victory and of his father's crown to himſelf. As ſoon as they were well ſettled in the king's palace, a council was called, in which Ahitophel adviſed the prince to rear up a pavilion on the top of the houſe, and to go and lie with his father's concubines in the face of the ſun. This, as we obſerved before, being eſteemed the greateſt indignity that could be offered to a crowned head, that helliſh politician told him, was the moſt effectual means to make his men fight deſperately for him, becauſe they would then look upon the breach as irreconcileable. It could not be expected, that Abſalom, who had already been guilty of fratricide and of rebellion againſt his own father, ſhould ſcruple to add adultery and inceſt to his other crimes: he readily complied with the advice, and thereby fulfilled one part of Nathan's prophecy againſt his adulterous father [r].

Ahitophel's counſel rejected.

THE next thing which Ahitophel adviſed the rebellious prince was, that he might be ſent at the head of 12,000 choſen men, to fall upon David's little army, whilſt they were ſtill weary with their flight; aſſuring him, that as ſoon as the king was taken off, which himſelf engaged to do, all the people would gladly come over to him as one man, and a quick end be put to the war. This counſel was approved both by Abſalom and all the elders of Iſrael; but as it was given in Huſhai's abſence, the prince reſolved to have his advice upon it, and Huſhai being informed of it, and wiſely foreſeeing, that, if it were followed, David muſt be inevitably loſt, omitted nothing to diſſuade him from it. He told the council, that David and his officers were men of too great valour and experience, to ſuffer themſelves to be thus ſurpriſed: that for ought he knew, they had fortified themſelves by that time in ſome caverns, or among the rocks, whence they would ſally out, like a bear bereaved of her whelps, and fall upon them with ſuch deſperate fury, that it would be impoſſible for them to ſtand the ſhock: that if they ſhould be unhappily beaten back in this firſt enterpriſe, the fame of David's valour would quickly ſpread, and magnify his victory to ſuch a degree, as would inject an univerſal terror into all their army, and give the exaſperated king the faireſt opportunity of quaſhing the conſpiracy. For theſe reaſons, he ſaid, he thought it dangerous to undertake any thing againſt him, till Abſalom had wholly diſheartened his men, by calling together all Iſrael from Dan to Beerſheba, and pouring his troops ſo thick upon them, that neither means nor hopes might be left to eſcape. Thus, added he, if they be hid among the rocks, we ſhall eaſily hunt or ſtarve them out, and if they be retired into ſome ſtrong city, our army will be able to pull it and them with ropes into the next river, till there is neither man nor ſtone left to oppoſe us. This ſwollen and affected ſpeech could hardly have failed being ſuſpected, had not providence ſuffered both the young prince and the council to be blinded with it. Ahitophel was the only perſon who perceived the drift and conſequence of it; ſo that, vexed at the heart to ſee Huſhai's advice preferred to his own, and that David, by gaining ſo much time, would, in all probability, recover his kingdom, he ordered his aſs to be ſaddled, and rode away with all ſpeed to his houſe, where, having ſettled his family affairs in the beſt manner he could, he went and hanged himſelf (M).

He goes and hangs himſelf.

Huſhai, in the mean time, failed not to inform the high-prieſts with what had paſt, and of the danger the king and his men would be in, if they did not go over Jordan that very night. They diſpatched therefore a maid-ſervant to their ſons, Ahimaz and Jonathan, who lay concealed for that purpoſe at En Rogel, with orders, that they ſhould go imme-

(M) The text adds, that he was buried in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors; for the only difference, which the Jews made between thoſe that died a natural or a violent death, was, that the latter, whether they died by their own hands, or by that of juſtice, were not buried till ſome time after ſun-ſet (44).

immediately and inform David of it. However, the avenues of Jeruſalem were ſo narrowly watched, that they were diſcovered by a youth, who gave immediate notice of it to Abſalom. It was not long, before they were cloſely purſued, and forced to hide themſelves at Bahurim, where a kind woman concealed them in a well, by ſpreading a cloth over it with ſome pounded corn, as if ſhe had been drying it in the ſun. The meſſengers, having loſt ſcent of them, returned to Jeruſalem, whilſt the two young prieſts haſted to David's camp, where they informed him of all that had been tranſacted at Abſalom's court. David loſt no time, but croſſed the Jordan, with his little army, in the dead of the night, and on the next morning, when he came to Mahanaim, and took a review of them, he found, that they were all ſafely got thither with him. As ſoon as the news of his arrival had reached that neighbourhood, ſeveral of his friends came thither to him, with a timely ſupply of proviſion for himſelf and his men, with tents, couches, and other neceſſary utenſils. Among theſe were Shobi, the ſon of Nahaſh, an Ammonite; Machir of Lodebar, with whom young Mephiboſheth had been brought up [s]; and old Barzillai of Rogelim, a wealthy Gileadite (N). On the other hand, Abſalom, hearing that his father was removed to this place, came againſt him with an army, under the command of Amaſa, and incamped in the land of Gilead [t].

David, having refreſhed himſelf and his troops, and ſupplied the vacancy of thoſe officers who were gone over to Abſalom, divided his army into three bodies, under the command of Joab and his two brothers, reſolving to appear in perſon againſt his rebellious ſon; but the people ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, alledging, that his life was of too great a conſequence, to be hazarded at a time, when his enemy would prefer his ſingle death before the defeat of his whole army. The king acquieſced to them, and ſtayed at Mahanaim with a ſmall reinforcement; and whilſt the reſt of his men marched out before him, under their reſpective officers, he failed not to give them a ſtrict charge to be very tender of Abſalom's life. A fierce battle was ſoon after fought in the foreſt of Ephraim, wherein the rebel army was diſcomfited with the loſs of 20,000 men, who were killed on the ſpot, beſides a great number of others who periſhed in the wood and in their flight. Abſalom himſelf, mounted upon a mule, was forced to fly from a party of David's men towards the wood, where the bough of a thick oak having taken hold of his buſhy hair, the mule, running with full ſpeed, left him ſuſpended between heaven and earth. Joab, being informed of this accident by a ſoldier, ſtayed only to reprove him for not having diſpatched him, and went himſelf to the place, and run three darts through his body; after which he cauſed the trumpet to ſound a retreat, to prevent a further effuſion of blood. Abſalom's body was taken down, and flung into a large pit, and covered with a heap of ſtones; and the reſt of the rebels were no ſooner informed of his death, than they fled every man to his home. All this while the king ſtayed at the gate of Mahanaim, impatient to hear the ſucceſs of the action; but in his heart more ſolicitous for the life of his unnatural ſon, than for that of his friends, or even for his own; inſomuch, that when he received the news of his death, not able to ſupreſs his tears, he was forced to withdraw himſelf to the chamber over the gate, to hide his extream weakneſs, and give a full vent to his grief [u].

There might be alſo ſeveral other ſorts, though not mentioned in the text, ſuch as bread, wine, dried raiſons, and figs, and ſome others, which we read were brought to David, at other times, by Abigail and Ziba (45).

Abſalom, hung by his hair, is killed by Joab.

THIS untimely ſorrow of the king did ſo damp the joy of the whole army, that they retired into the city, more like cowardly runaways, than like victorious ſoldiers. Joab eaſily foreſaw the conſequence of it, and that it would cauſe a general defection; and, as he was naturally bold and haughty, he made no difficulty to go up and upbraid him with his ingratitude to his faithful friends in ſuch inſolent terms, though covered with a ſhew of loyalty and concern, that the afflicted king was forced to ſuſpend, or at leaſt conceal, his grief, and ſhew himſelf to the people with a ſeeming chearful countenance. As ſoon as they heard of his appearing publicly at the gate of the city, not only his own men, but even thoſe who had followed Abſalom, came came in crowds, and ſtrove who ſhould ſhew the greateſt affection to him. They remembered, that he had often delivered them from the oppreſſion of their enemies: Abſalom was now dead, and David victorious; ſo that they had nothing now to do, but to regain his favour by a timely ſubmiſſion. As ſoon, therefore, as the king perceived, that all the tribes were ready to bring him back to Jeruſalem, he ſent word to the two high-prieſts, to haſten the elders of Judah to come and accompany him back to his palace, and to promiſe to Amaſa, Abſalom's general, that if he would come over to him, he ſhould be his chief general in the room of Joab (O). Among thoſe that came over Jordan to meet the king, Shimei was one of the firſt; he came at the head of a thouſand men of his own tribe, and, falling proſtrate at his feet, acknowledged his crime, begged that it might be forgiven, in conſideration of his being foremoſt of all the tribes to congratulate him upon his late victory. David's generals did indeed think it a poor recompence for his late indignity to his prince, and were urgent to have him made an example to all Iſrael, but the king willing to ſignalize, as it were, his new reign by an unparalleled clemency, did not only reprove their untimely zeal, but generouſly confirmed his pardon with an oath.

David is acknowledged by all the tribes.

Shimei forgiven.

MEPHIBOSHETH came next to expreſs his joy at the king's return, and to juſtify himſelf from the baſe aſperſions of his treacherous ſervant. He gave him indeed ſome evident evident proofs of his gratitude and fidelity, and of Ziba's perfidy, and the king ſeemed outwardly to be ſatisfied with them; but whether he was not really ſo, or that he cared not wholly to reverſe the grant he had made to the ſervant, he ordered the lands to be divided between his maſter and him. Whilſt the king was getting ready to paſs over Jordan, his old friend Barzillai came to accompany him over that river, and to take his final leave of him. David would fain have perſwaded him to have gone with him to Jeruſalem, that he might have an opportunity of rewarding his ſervices; but the good old man excuſed himſelf from it on account of his old age, which had rendered him incapable of taſting the pleaſures of a court; deſiring him, that he would beſtow his favours on his ſon Chimham, who was ready to accompany him thither; which was readily granted.

(O) It appears by this, that David had conceived an averſion for Joab; he had indeed done enough to deſerve it, by his inſupportable inſolence, by his treacherous murder of Abner, but more particularly for having dared to kill Abſalom, contrary to his expreſs orders, whom he ought to have brought alive to his father, and left it to him to have puniſhed his rebellion, as he thought fit. On the other hand, Amaſa was a conſiderable perſon, the ſon of David's ſiſter (46), whom, either the fear of the king's reſentment, or a deſire of keeping up his poſt of general, might eaſily induce to raiſe ſome new troubles in favour of Saul's houſe. Upon theſe accounts, David thought it worth his while to bring him over to his intereſt by a generous pardon, and by giving him the command of his army, which would, at the ſame time, effectually ſuppreſs Joab's inſolence. But this laſt, who ſtuck at no baſe action to rid himſelf of a rival, did ſoon after break all the king's meaſures, by the murder of his new-made general.

HITHERTO there had appeared nothing but an univerſal emulation between the tribes, to wipe off the guilt of their late defection, by the greateſt tokens of ſubmiſſion and zeal; but the partiality which David ſhewed for his own tribe, in inviting it to come foremoſt to receive him, raiſed ſuch jealouſy in the other ten, as ſeemed to threaten nothing leſs than a new revolt. The ten tribes, on the one hand, thinking themſelves injured, that that of Judah was preferred to them, in guarding the king homewards, complained in the bittereſt terms, that they had ſtolen him from them, with a deſign to deprive the reſt of their intereſt in him. Judah, on the other ſide, alledged, that their near relation to him entitled them to that preference; which, however, they had made no other advantage of, than that of being neareſt to his perſon, without expecting any gratuity from him. To this the others anſwered, that David, as a king, being equally related to them all, their ſhare in him bore a ten-fold proportion to theirs, for which reaſon they ought to have been the firſt invited, and the neareſt to him [w]. The conteſt grew ſo fierce at laſt, through the obſtinacy of the tribe of Judah, that Sheba, a factious fellow of the tribe of Benjamin, took that opportunity to blow the trumpet, and to gather all the malecontents to him, who immediately diſclaimed all further intereſt in David, and bid open defiance to thoſe that adhered to him; upon which, he ſaw himſelf at the head of all the ten tribes, that only of Judah, which had occaſioned this defection, followed their king from Jordan to Jeruſalem.

A new revolt againſt David.

As ſoon as David was come to his metropolis, he ordered his new general to ſet out, and gather what forces he could out of Judah, and to come to him within three days, whilſt himſelf took that time to clear his palace of his polluted concubines, and aſſigned them a ſuitable maintenance and another houſe, where they might ſpend their days in a kind of widowhood, But Amaſa, who met with greater difficulty than he expected, having outſtayed his time, the king gave the command of his guards and of thoſe few troops he had about him to Abiſhai, Joab's brother, another of his generals, who had commanded one third of his army againſt Abſalom, and ordered him to purſue Sheba before he could get into ſome fenced city. It is plain by this, that Joab was then in high diſgrace; however, he went along with Abiſhai, though not as a commander, and by that time they were come to the great ſtone of Gibeon, Amaſa joined them with his troops. Here the treacherous Joab came forth, ſeemingly to welcome him, and, taking hold of his chin with one hand, as if he had intended to kiſs him, ran his ſword through his bowels with the other, and laid him dead at his feet. As ſoon as he removed his body out of ſight, which he found did cauſe a general ſtop of his army; he marched with them directly to Abel-Beth-Maachah, into which he heard the rebel had retired with ſome troops. He had ſcarce began to beſiege that place in form, when a prudent woman ſpake to him from the top of the wall, and deſired him to liſten to the advice of an inhabitreſs of a place, which he knew had always been famed for counſel and wiſdom [x], and to forbear his hoſtilities againſt a mother city of Iſrael; promiſing him, upon that condition, that the head of Sheba ſhould be flung to him over the wall. Joab conſented to the propoſal, and as ſoon as he had received the arch-rebel's head, he raiſed the ſiege and returned to Jeruſalem. This ſucceſsful action, which quaſhed, as it were, a dangerous revolt in the birth, and reſtored an univerſal peace to the kingdom, failed not to raiſe the credit of the diſgraced general among all the tribes, inſomuch, that though he had undertook it without order, yet the king ſaw himſelf forced to expreſs his approbation of it, by reſtoring him to his former poſt, which he enjoyed till that monarch's death [y].

Two years after this [z], began a famine in the land, which laſted three years; at the end of which, David conſulted the Lord concerning the cauſe of this heavy judgment, and the means of averting it. He was anſwered, that it was for the murder of the Gibeonites, whom Saul and his bloody houſe had unjuſtly cauſed to be ſlain (P); upon which he ſent to know what ſatisfaction they required for the wrong, that they might afterward intercede for Iſrael, and remove that judgment from it. The Gibeonites ſent him word, that they deſired neither gold, ſilver, nor any valuable conſideration, but only, that ſeven males of Saul's family might be ſent to be put to death by them, as a retaliation for Saul's cruelty. The king loſt no time, but cauſed them to be ſought out of that unfortunate houſe; but gave expreſs orders, that Mephiboſheth ſhould be ſpared, out of friendſhip to his father. The unhappy victims of the Gibeonites reſentment were two ſons of one of Saul's concubines named Rizpah, who had been formerly debauched by Abner [a], and five ſons of Michal Saul's daughter (Q); and, as ſoon as they were put to death, the famine was ſtayed.

(P) It is not eaſy to ſay, when this ſlaughter of the Gibeonites was committed; the Jews do indeed pretend, that Saul had took into his head, in one of his phrentic fits of zeal, to cut them all off (47), but they give us no authority for it; ſo that the moſt received opinion is, that it happened when he ſlew all the prieſts and inhabitants of Nob; for the Gibeonites, as we have ſeen elſewhere †, were a kind of ſervants to them, employed in ſome of the loweſt and moſt laborious offices.

(Q) Not that which had been given from David to Phaltiel, and was ſent to him again by Iſh-boſheth; for it is obſerved, that ſhe was barren (49), but another of the ſame name, married to one Adriel of Meholah; or rather, as the Jews affirm, and with greater probability, Merab Saul's eldeſt daughter (50), who had indeed been given to that very Adriel (51); ſo that it is ſuppoſed, that Michal is accidentally crept into the text, inſtead of Merah; though the Jews, unwilling to admit that, will have it, that Merab was their real mother, and Michal only by adoption (52).

Whilſt their carcaſſes were ſuffered to hang in the open air, which was almoſt a whole ſummer, Rizpah ſhewed ſo much concern for them, that ſhe kept them night and day from being devoured by either fowls or wild beaſts; which pious deed ſtruck David with ſuch remorſe, that he cauſed them to be taken down, and buried with thoſe of Saul and Jonathan in Zelah, the burying-place of the houſe of Kiſh. After this, David had four ſucceſſive battles with the Philiſtines, which the reader may ſee in the hiſtory of that nation †; in the firſt of theſe he hazarded himſelf ſo far, that he was like to have been killed by one of their gigantick champions, but was timely ſuccoured by one of his worthies; for which reaſon his officers ſwore, that he ſhould never more expoſe his perſon to ſuch dangers [b]. Theſe victories gave birth to a moſt excellent euchariſtical poem, which that monarch compoſed in memory of his late deliverance, and is now the 18th pſalm [c].

DAVID had not long enjoyed the fruit of his victories, before he brought a heavier puniſhment upon his kingdom, by taking it into his head to have the people numbered. Joab indeed, wicked as he was, did in vain repreſent to him the danger of his diſpleaſing God by it (R); the king would

(R) The text ſays, that the Iſraelites had provoked God's anger againſt them (which is no great wonder, that being generally the returns they made to him, whenever they were bleſſed with any interval of peace and proſperity); and that he ſuffered David to be tempted to this deed; or, as the author of the Chronicles (53) words it, ſuffered Satan to tempt him to it. Not that the thing itſelf was forbidden, on the contrary, they had an expreſs permiſſion from Moſes for it, provided they paid half a ſhekel for every perſon ſo numbered (54). The reaſon, therefore, of God's being provoked with it was, in all probability, becauſe David did it from wrong motives, without any neceſſity, in time of profound peace, after ſo many miraculous deliverances, with a ſeeming confidence in his own ſtrength, and contrary to his continual profeſſions of truſting in God alone. As for that part of the puniſhment which fell ſo heavy upon ſo many thouſands of the people, it is ſuppoſed to have been owing to their neglect of paying the ranſom appointed by the Moſaick law (55).

would be obeyed; and he, with the reſt of the commiſſioners, were forced to ſet about it. Theſe travelled through the land on either ſide of Jordan, and, at the end of nine months and twenty days, brought him the ſum of all the fighting men in the whole kingdom; namely, of Iſrael 800,000 and of Judah 500,000 (S). But before this time, David, having ſome evident tokens of the divine diſpleaſure [d], was ſo far from receiving any ſatisfaction at the vaſt number of his ſubjects, that he was ſtruck with a lively ſenſe of his folly, which broke out in expreſſions of the deepeſt remorſe. On the next morning, the prophet Gad was ſent to him, to chuſe, as a puniſhment for his ſin, either a ſeven years famine (T), or to be three months purſued by his enemies, or a three days peſtilence. The humble monarch owned it to be a hard choice; but, conſidering that war and famine ſeldom fall ſo heavy on the great, as on

(S) It appears by the book of Chronicles (56), that Joab, though in no other caſe ſcrupulous, went about this work with ſuch an unwilling mind, that he prolonged it as much as he could, in hopes the king would ſee his error, and put an end to it; which it ſeems he did; for Joab came back before he had numbered the tribes of Benjamin and Levi. The account which that general gave here doth likewiſe differ, in ſome particulars, from that of the Chronicles; from which we may probably gather, that Joab was not over exact in his, and that it was afterwards rectified under the reign of Jotham (57). Others think the latter to be the leſs authentick of the two, and to have been corrupted rather than rectified; but it is better to ſay, that Joab, not having finiſhed ſome of the tribes, becauſe he found that God was diſpleaſed at it (58), the reſt were afterwards added to it; which is the reaſon, that the number of Iſrael in the Chronicles doth ſo far exceed that in the book of Samuel; as for the difference in that of the tribe of Judah, the former may alſo be the moſt exact, and the latter only a round number.

(T) The book of Chronicles ſays three years famine (59), ſo that it is likely, the prophet means here ſeven years, including the three years which were ſent upon the account of the Gibeonites; and the next year, which could not be very fruitful through ſcarceneſs of ſeed, the Philiſtine war, and, as Uſher conjectures (60), becauſe the fourth year being a jubilee, there was to be neither ſowing, nor reaping, but for the poor.

on thoſe of the lower rank, choſe the three days peſtilence, as the more equal puniſhment, and more immediately under the divine direction. No ſooner had David pronounced his choice, than that dreadful diſtemper received the divine commiſſion, and executed it with ſuch amazing ſwiftneſs, that it had deſtroyed 70,000 men before its time was expired. It had then began to fall upon the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, when God was pleaſed to put a ſtop to it at David's prayer; who, beholding the miniſter of divine vengeance (V) ſtanding by the threſhing-floor of Araunah, a prince of the Jebuſites (W), humbly entreated the Lord, that he would ſpare the innocent people, and let his anger fall upon himſelf and thoſe of his court, who bore a ſhare in his guilt. Whilſt he was offering up this mournful ſupplication, the prophet came to him, and commanded him to erect an altar on that ſpot of ground, where he had ſeen the deſtroying angel ſtand; and as David haſted towards the threſhing-floor, Araunah came forward to give him a reſpectful meeting; and as ſoon as he underſtood David's purpoſe of buying it of him, he made him a generous offer both of the floor, the threſhing-oxen, carts, and all the wooden inſtruments that were upon it. David thanked him for his offer, but told him, that it was not fit for the king of Iſrael to offer ſacrifices to God at other peoples coſt; and deſired him to ſet a price upon it. So Araunah ſold him the floor, and all that was upon it, for fifty ſhekels of ſilver (X). David haſted to rear an altar there which brings a peſtilence upon the land.

(V) the text ſays expreſly, that David ſaw the angel of the Lord that ſmote the people (61), and the book of Chronicles adds (62), that he ſaw him ſtanding between heaven and earth, with his ſword drawn, and that both he and the elders of Iſrael, who were with him, fell on their faces; and that Araunah and his ſons, who were threſhing there, did likewiſe ſee him, and went and hid themſelves (63); ſo that theſe two places compared together will by no means admit of an allegorical ſenſe.

(W) At laſt he is generally believed to have been ſuch by Jews and Chriſtians, from the words (64), all theſe did Araunah the king give unto the king; for that is the true ſenſe of the original.

(X) The book of Chronicles ſeems again to claſh ſtrangely here with that of Samuel, in making the ſum, which David paid to the Jebuſitiſh prince, amouut to 600 ſhekels of gold. Some rabbies there upon the ſpot, and to offer burnt-offerings and peace-offerings upon it; and a miraculous fire, which deſcended from heaven, and conſumed the victims, ſoon gave them a manifeſt proof, that God was again reconciled to the land [e].

By this time David, who was about ſeventy years of age, had ſo exhauſted his ſtrength and natural heat, by a continual ſeries of wars, fatigues, and misfortunes, that no cloaths could keep him warm; ſo that his ſervants were forced to ſeek him a young beautiful virgin to wait upon, and cheriſh him, and lie in his boſom. His declining ſtate made Adonijah, who was now his eldeſt ſon, being next in birth to Abſalom, begin to look upon himſelf as already inveſted with the regal dignity. He got a ſumptuous equipage of chariots, guards, and running-footmen, whilſt David, out of a natural fondneſs for his children, beheld it without ſhewing any diſlike. It plainly appears, that young prince knew already, that his father deſigned Solomon to be his ſucceſſor; and it was to prevent it, that he made what haſte he could to get himſelf proclaimed. To this end, he leagued himſelf with Joab and Abiathar, and with them invited all his brothers, Solomon excepted, with a conſiderable number of his father's officers and of the elders of Judah, to a ſumptuous feaſt, which he had prepared at Zoheleth, in order to be proclaimed king of Iſrael there.

bies have fancied, that every tribe paid fifty ſhekels, which made it amount to 600. But were that true, as it is not, becauſe David reſolved to be at all the charge himſelf, 600 ſhekels of ſilver would make but the 12th part of 600 ſhekels of gold, for that is the proportion theſe metals did bear to one another. Some learned men (65), obſerving that the words keſſeph and ſhekel, did often ſignify money and value in general, think, that the firſt ſum was 60 ſhekels of gold, and the ſecond 600 ſhekels of ſilver, amounting in value to 60 ſhekels of gold; ſo that either ſum anſwers to 547 pounds Sterling (66). But we think, that they remove the difficulty beſt, who ſuppoſe, that the 60 ſhekels of ſilver were paid only for the floor, oxen, and wooden inſtruments; and the 600 ſhekels of gold, for all the adjacent grounds, which were the place which David had choſen to build the temple upon (67).

His deſign, however, was ſuſpected by Nathan, Zadok, and ſome of David's worthies, who were in young Solomon's intereſt; the prophet, therefore, went and adviſed Bathſheba to go and inform the king of it, and to put him in mind of his promiſe in favour of her ſon. Whilſt he was ſtill ſpeaking, Nathan came, as it had been preagreed, and gave the king an account of Adonijah's feaſt, company, and of the deſign of it: deſiring to know, whether it was done with his conſent. The king, ſurpriſed with this report, ordered immediately Solomon to be ſet on his mule, and to be carried to Gihon, accompanied with his guards, with Zadok, Benajah, and ſome others of his chief officers, there to be anointed king; and then to be brought back, and ſeated upon the royal throne, and there proclaimed his ſucceſſor by the ſound of the trumpet. Solomon proclaimed.

The king's commands were executed with ſuch ſpeed, that Adonijah and his company had not the leaſt knowledge of it, till they were alarmed with the univerſal ſhouts of the people, who cried, Long live king Solomon. Jonathan, the ſon of Abiathar, came ſoon after to them, and gave them an account of the whole ceremony, aſſuring them, that it was all performed by the king's expreſs order, who had teſtified an uncommon joy, at ſeeing his favourite ſon ſeated upon his throne before he left the world, whilſt the air was filled with the acclamations of all the people. This unexpected news ſtruck them with ſuch amazement, that they all fled with the utmoſt ſpeed; and Adonijah, ſeeing himſelf forſaken, and expoſed to the reſentments of David and Solomon, went and took ſanctuary at the horns of the altar. Solomon, being informed of it, ſent him word, that if he behaved himſelf for the future like an honeſt man, he would not hurt a hair of his head; but aſſured him, that his next diſloyal attempt would certainly be puniſhed with death. This meſſage brought Adonijah upon his knees to the new king; after which, he was ordered to retire to his own houſe [f].

David, now finding himſelf near his end, aſſembled the heads of all the tribes, his generals, and chief officers, with the prieſts and Levites, and acquainted them with his old deſign to have built a magnificent repoſitory for the ark of God, had not the prophet told him, that this work was reſerved for Solomon's peaceable reign. it, and laid up immenſe quantities of gold, ſilver, copper, iron, and other materials (Y); all which, together with the plans and models of that edifice, the order and diſpoſition of the ſeveral branches of the divine ſervice, the courſes of the prieſts and Levites, of the muſicians, ſingers, and porters, the deſign for eſtabliſhing judges and courts of juſtice, with many other religious, civil, and military regulations

(Y) The book of Chronicles ſays, that the gold, which was that of Ophir, amounted to 3000 talents; and the ſilver, which was of the pureſt ſort, to 7000 talents; as to the baſer metals, they are ſaid to have been without number (68).

Prideaux obſerves * two things concerning the immenſe quantity of gold, which David dedicated to the ſervice of the temple; the firſt is, that it was that of Ophir; from which he concludes, that he muſt have eſtabliſhed a navigation in his time, without which it cannot be conceived, how he could have heaped it up to that degree; for as for that which he got out of the ſpoils of war, and his public revenue, it makes an article by itſelf, excluſive of theſe 3000 talents.

His next obſervation we ſhall give in his own words, as they ſtand in the note under the former. "This ſum, ſays he, is ſo "prodigious, as gives reaſon to think, that the talents, whereby "this ſum is reckoned, were another ſort of talents, of a far leſs "value than the Moſaic talents, of which an account is given in "the preface. For what is ſaid to be given by David [1 Chron. "xxii. 14, 15, 16. & xxix. 3, 4, 5.] and contributed by his "princes [xxix. 6, 7, 8.], toward the building of the temple at "Jeruſalem, if valued by theſe talents, exceeded the value of "eight hundred millions of our money, which was enough where-"with to have built all that temple of ſolid ſilver."

What ſeems to prove our author's laſt remark is, that thoſe talents are only mentioned in the Chronicles, which were undoubtedly written after the return from the captivity. This appears, 1. From its mentioning of Cyrus's decree for rebuilding the temple, and, 2. From its carrying the genealogy beyond Zorobabel, who was one of the chiefs that returned from Babylon: ſo that they might, by that time, be uſed to compute, either by Babyloniſh talents, which were ſomewhat above half the value of the Moſaic one, or perhaps by the Syrian, which is but a fifth of this. We need not to add, that the difficulty ſeems as great, with reſpect to the prodigious quantities of ſilver, braſs, and iron, which, if computed by the large talent, amount to ſuch an incredible ſum, that one will be at a loſs to gueſs how it could be diſpoſed of in that building, and yet leave room enough for ſo much timber and ſtone.

regulations [g], he now reſigned up to him, to be perfected and improved as his wiſdom ſhould direct him. He deſired them to aſſiſt him in ſo deſirable a work, and that thoſe, who were deſirous to contribute towards that building, ſhould bring their free-will offerings into the treaſury. He concluded with exhorting both his ſon and the reſt of the aſſembly, to continue ſtedfaſt in the ſervice of God, ſeeing that was the only condition upon which they muſt hope for happineſs. This ſpeech ſtirred up ſuch a ſpirit of magnificence in the rich men of Iſrael, that they outvied one another in the richneſs of their preſents towards the building of the temple; ſo that David had the pleaſure to ſee an incredible quantity of gold, ſilver, copper, and other metals (Z), beſides precious ſtones, marble, porphyry, and other rich materials, brought from all parts of the kingdom. The ſight of ſo much wealth, brought in with ſuch readineſs and alacrity, did as it were revive the monarch's poetic muſe, and made him break out into an euchariſtical rapture, full of the deepeſt gratitude to God, and good wiſhes for the proſperity both of his ſon and of his kingdom, which were ſeconded with a hearty and univerſal Amen, and accompanied with ſolemn ſacrifices and other tokens of joy. On the next day, the king ordered 1000 oxen, 1000 rams, and the ſame number of lambs, to be offered up, beſides the daily ſacrifices, and a proportionate quantity of meat and drink offerings, with which the aſſembly was feaſted all that day, with a magnificence worthy ſo great and good a monarch [h]. In this aſſembly Solomon was anointed a ſecond time by Zadok, received the homage of all his brethren, and of all the chiefs of Judah and Iſrael, and was proclaimed king through all the tribes; Zadok was at the ſame time declared ſole high-prieſt, for his ſtrict adherence to Solomon [i], and Abiathar reduced to the ſecond rank, for his defection to Adonijah.

AFTER this, the king ſent for his ſon to give his laſt inſtructions; and firſt of all he put him in mind, that all David's laſt inſtructions to Solomon.

(Z) Theſe offerings are ſaid to have amounted to 5000 talents, and upwards, of gold, 10,000 talents of ſilver, of braſs 18,000 talents, and 100,000 talents of iron, beſides precious ſtones, marble, wood, and other coſtly materials (69).

the gracious promiſes, which God had made to him and his poſterity, were only conditional, and depended wholly upon their obedience to his laws, ſo that they muſt expect their proſperity to riſe and fall in proportion to their obedience. He then proceeded to recommend to him the family of the good old Barzillai, and thoſe other friends, who had ſtuck to him in his adverſe fortune, and charged him to expreſs a grateful ſenſe of their friendſhip; as for Joab, added he, thou knoweſt how many vile actions he has been guilty of towards me, and how treacherouſly he imbrued his hands in the blood of two brave generals, Abner and Amaſa, after I had taken them into my ſervice and friendſhip. I was not then in a condition to puniſh him for it; but I need not tell thee what to do, thou knoweſt but too well, that he has forfeited his life, and on how many accounts he is unworthy of it. Shimei doth not leſs deſerve a violent death, for his horrid curſes and indignity to me, when I laboured under the deepeſt affliction; but as he took an opportunity to acknowledge his crime, at a time, when I thought it more proper to forgive than to puniſh it, I ſealed then his pardon with an oath; but thou, who art not under the ſame obligation, mayeſt, if thou thinkeſt fit, inflict ſuch a puniſhment as his crime deſerves. The king died ſoon after, in the 70th year of his age, after having reigned ſeven years in Hebron over the houſe of Judah, and thirty three over all the twelve tribes. He left an immenſe treaſure behind him, beſides that which he had dedicated to the ſervice of the temple; and was buried in a ſtately tomb (A), in that part of the city,

His vaſt riches and burial.

(A) We have had occaſion to ſpeak heretofore of this ſtately tomb, and of the immenſe treaſure that had been laid up in it, by him and his ſucceſſor, according to the Jewiſh hiſtorian *. The Jews have added many fables concerning that monarch, too extravagant to be inſerted; the reader may gueſs at the reſt, by that which follows, They tell us, that David, foreſeeing that he ſhould die on the Sabbath, begged of God, that he might die on any other day, becauſe on that he could neither weep for his ſins, nor order any thing concerning his burial. All he could obtain was, that he ſhould die towards the cloſe of the Sabbath; whereupon, the devil, who owed him a ſpight, and had tried part of that day, in vain, to divert him from reading the law, that he might take that time to diſpatch him, bethought himſelf, at city, which he had cauſed to be built, adjoining to the old Jebus, or Jeruſalem [k]. The author of the Chronicles adds, that his hiſtory was penned by three contemporary prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad [l]. His zeal, piety, and repentance are likewiſe celebrated in ſeveral places of the Old and New Teſtament; but that which raiſes his character above all the reſt is, that the promiſe of the Meſſiah, which had been made to Abraham, Jacob, and Judah, was fixed to that monarch's poſterity. Accordingly, the ſacred genealogiſts have given us the two lines of it, in which his birth was joined, namely that of Nathan, from whom his virgin mother was deſcended, and that of Solomon, from which was ſprung Joſeph his reputed father [m].

SOLOMON, being ſeated on the throne, delayed not to fulfil his father's laſt injunctions. Adonijah obliged him to go the ſooner about it by an action, which, though owing perhaps to a youthful indiſcretion, could not but render him ſuſpected of ſome further deſign, in concert with the turbulent Joab. We have lately obſerved, that it was looked upon as a treaſonable deſign againſt the regal dignity to marry, court, or to debauch any of the king's concubines; notwithſtanding which, Adonijah, obnoxious and diſgraced as he was for his late attempt upon the crown, was raſh enough to make uſe of Bathſheba's interceſſion, to obtain the king's leave to marry Abiſhag, the young Shunamitiſh at length, to go and ſhake ſome of his apple-trees, which made the king haſten down a wooden ladder to go and catch the thief; but, in the mean time, Satan pulling it from under him, broke his neck with the fall. The conſequence was, that his corps was to remain there till the Sabbath was over, in danger of being devoured by his own dogs. They conſulted their Sanhedrim what muſt be done in that caſe, and were anſwered, that they ſhould ſtrew a good quantity of bread round his body, which pleaſing the dogs better than his fleſh, they left it untouched till ſun-ſet, when it was lawful to remove it to a ſafer place (70.) The Mohammedans have not been behind-hand with the Rabbies, in ſtuffing his hiſtory with monſtrous extravagancies; the reader may, if he pleaſes, ſee them in the author quoted in the margin (71).

virgin, who had been the cheriſher of David's old age; aſſuring her, that he deſired no other recompenſe for the loſs of a crown, which belonged to him by right of primogeniture. Bathſheba, glad perhaps to find, that her ſon's rival would be ſatisfied at ſo eaſy a rate, made no difficulty to promiſe him her intereſt, not doubting of ſucceſs. Solomon, who expected nothing leſs than ſuch a requeſt from her, received her with all the marks of honour that were due to a queen and a mother, and had already promiſed to grant her ſuit; but when he heard the purport of it, he was ſo inraged at his ambitious brother, that he ordered him to be put to immediate death. Joab alarmed at the news, went and took ſanctuary at the horns of the altar, and there met with the puniſhment of his crimes, and was ſucceeded in his poſt of general by Benajah, who had been before appointed his and Adonijah's executioner. The next in guilt was Abiathar, who had been one of the chiefs of Adonijah's conſpiracy; but the king contented himſelf with diveſting him of his ſhare of the high-prieſthood, and confining him to his own territories at Anathoth, in conſideration of his having carried the ark before his father, and been a ſharer in his afflictions. The king then ſent for Shimei, and told him, that though he thought him worthy of death, yet, out of regard to his father's promiſe, he would put it in his power to ſave his life, by confining himſelf within the walls of Jeruſalem; but he aſſured him, at the ſame time, that if ever he ſtirred out of it, without his leave, his diſobedience ſhould coſt him his head. The old man, glad to come off ſo well, thanked the king for his unexpected clemency; but venturing ſome years after to tranſgreſs his orders, and to ride out after two run-away ſervants, he was put to death for it at his return [n].

Adonijah and Joab put to death.

Solomon did not think it enough, that he had rid himſelf of two ſuch powerful enemies as Adonijah and Joab; he ſought to ſtrengthen himſelf ſtill more by marrying the daughter of the king of Egypt (B), who was then one of the [n] 1 King. ii. paſſ.

(B) Theſe kind of alliances were indeed forbidden by the Moſaic law (72); but it is ſuppoſed, that Solomon cauſed that princeſs to be inſtructed in, and to embrace the Jewiſh religion before he married her; becauſe we do not find, that God did reprove him for it in that intercourſe, which he had ſoon after with him, but the moſt powerful princes about him, and Pharaoh gave her for dowry the city of Gezer, which he had taken from the Canaanites and burnt down to the ground; but which being rebuilt by Solomon became a very conſiderable place°.

HITHERTO the people uſed to reſort to ſeveral high places, to offer up their devotions and ſacrifices; but the moſt conſiderable was Gibeon, becauſe the tabernacle, altar, and all the other ſacred utenſils, except the ark, were there. Whilſt therefore the temple was building, Solomon uſed likewiſe to repair thither upon all ſolemn occaſions, with a magnificence ſuitable to his dignity. Here, having at one time offered a thouſand ſacrifices, the Lord appeared to him in a dream, and promiſed to grant him whatever he ſhould aſk. The young monarch, conſcious of the weight of his kingdom and the ſtubbornneſs of his ſubjects, begged only for ſuch a degree of wiſdom, as might enable him to govern with that prudence and ſagacity, as became a king of Iſrael: which modeſt requeſt was ſo pleaſing to God, that he not only gave him ſuch a ſhare of wiſdom and knowledge, as had never been poſſeſſed by any mortal, but ſuperadded to it, a promiſe of ſuch other earthly bleſſings, as he had ſo judiciouſly overlooked. It was not long, before he gave his people a proof of his excellent wiſdom and diſcernment, in the method he took, to paſs a right judgment between two women, both contending for a living child, Solomon's choice of wiſdom.

but, on the contrary, ſeemed well pleaſed with what he had hitherto done. It is true, that he is ſaid afterwards to have been inticed to idolatry by his ſtrange wives (73); but they were thoſe whom he married towards the latter end of his reign, after he had, as it were, forſaken God. But Pharaoh's daughter ſeems to be excepted out of the caſe, unleſs we will ſuppoſe, that ſhe relapſed to her former idolatry, when ſhe ſaw him immerſed in it.

However that were, he is generally believed to have compoſed the 45th Pſalm, and the book of Canticles, as an epithalamium upon his marriage with that princeſs. As for her dowry, the city of Gezer, it had formerly belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and had been given to them by the Levites (74); but had been retaken by the Canaanites, and now, by her means, returned and continued in Iſrael.

and diſclaiming the dead one with ſuch equal ardour, that it was thought impoſſible to adjudge the infants to their right mothers. But he ſoon found out an expedient to make nature itſelf unravel what reaſon could not, by ordering the living child to be divided by a ſword between them, which ſo alarmed the real mother, that ſhe choſe rather to reſign him up whole to the pretended one, than have him butchered before her eyes [P]. After this, the aſſembly could not be at a loſs where to aſſign the living child, nor what judgment to make concerning their young monarch's wiſdom, which was ſo much the more ſurpriſing and extraordinary, as he was then, at moſt, but twenty years of age, according to the chronology of our bibles and the learned archbiſhop Uſher †.

A pregnant proof of it.

His magnificence.

It became no leſs conſpicuous in the choice he made of his officers, and in the order and magnificence of his court, the proviſions for his houſe (C), the number and richneſs of his tables, chariots, horſes, ſtalls (D), and equipage; in the

(C) Theſe proviſions are ſaid to have amounted every day to thirty meaſures [each meaſure containing about eight buſhels and a half] of fine flour, double that quantity of common flour, ten fatted, and twenty paſture, oxen, and an hundred ſheep; beſides veniſon, poultry, wild-fowl, fiſh, pulſe, fruit, herbs, and other eatables, which were ſent to him from all parts of the kingdom, under the direction of twelve officers, who took their turns, each in his reſpective month, and out of his reſpective canton (75).

(D) There is a conſiderable difference in the number of his ſtalls, between the book of Kings and that of the Chronicles; the former reckons them forty thouſand, and the latter but four thouſand (76), which laſt is preferred to the former, as the moſt reaſonable, becauſe Solomon is ſaid to have had but 1400 chariots (77); for if we allow four horſes to a chariot, which is double the number that chariots of war uſed to have, it will make in all but 5600, at which rate, there muſt have been more than ſix ſtalls to one horſe, contrary to common cuſtom, which allows ſeveral horſes to one ſtall (78). Some other authors take another way of reconcileing the ſettling of his cuſtoms and finances (E), and the regulating of his guards and his army (F); which, added to the vaſt number and valour of his ſubjects, and his immenſe riches, gave him ſuch a powerful ſway, that he lived in the profoundeſt peace, plenty, and grandeur of any prince in his time; beloved by his friends and allies, who were conſtantly pouring the richeſt preſents upon him; feared by his enemies, receiving large tributes from ſeveral crowned heads (G), and reſorted unto, from all parts of the world, for his excellent wiſdom and magnificence, which brought in a continual concourſe of ſtrangers to his metropolis, and enriched ing the difference, which we cannot dwell upon (79). Theſe horſes, whatever their number was, were to be furniſhed with barley, ſtraw, and other provender, by the ſame twelve commiſſioners, we mentioned in the laſt note (80).

(E) Solomon was the firſt that brought chariots and horſes into uſe in Iſrael, at leaſt to any quantity: theſe he ſent for out of Egypt; not only for his own uſe, but for ſeveral neighbouring kings, who were obliged to pay him ſix hundred ſhekels for every chariot and four horſes, and a hundred and fifty for every ſingle horſe. He had likewiſe abundance of yarn, linen, and other commodities out of Egypt, which he ſold to his ſubjects and merchants at a certain price (81); all which brought him a vaſt revenue, beſides his navy, of which we ſhall ſpeak anon.

(F) What ſtanding army he kept, the ſcripture doth not tell us, and as he was in peace with all the world, and was either loved or feared by his neighbours, he did not ſeem to have needed a great one. But beſides the number of his chariots and horſes, mentioned in a former note, the text ſays, that he had 12,000 horſemen (82), which ſome take to have been rather ſaddle-horſes, and others his life-guard. However, it is certain, that this multiplying of chariots and horſes was expreſly forbidden by the Moſaic law (83), whatever ſalvo he might find out to evade it, in a time of the profoundeſt peace. Theſe he did not keep all at Jeruſalem, but diſpoſed of them in ſeveral of his ſtrong cities, reſerving only a convenient number about his perſon, either for guards or grandeur (84).

(G) The text ſays, that his dominion reached from the river Euphrates, or even beyond it, to the Nile, or borders of Egypt, and that all the kings of thoſe countries were tributary to him (85).

enriched it to ſuch a degree, that gold and ſilver ſeemed to have loſt their intrinſic value, by their extraordinary abundance. The very revenue which his navy brought him in, excluſive of his cuſtoms, amounted to ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix talents of gold. All this while his Iſraelitiſh ſubjects, not only enjoyed the ſweets of peace and plenty, but alſo of an univerſal freedom. There were no other ſlaves during his reign, except the poor Canaanites, and ſome captives of other nations [q].

Hiram's embaſſy and treaty with Solomon.

Of all the princes that ſought his friendſhip, Hiram, king of Tyre, David's old friend and ally, was the firſt that ſent ambaſſadors to congratulate his acceſſion to the crown, and to offer his ſervice to him, as he had formerly done to his father. Solomon returned the embaſſy, and acquainted him with the deſign of his building the temple, deſiring him to ſend a ſufficient number of workmen, to join with his artificers, for the work; particularly, ſome that were well ſkilled in working in gold, ſilver, and other baſer metals, precious ſtones, ſcarlet, crimſon, and other fine dyes, all which was readily granted by the Tyrian king; in conſideration of which, Solomon agreed to furniſh him yearly with 20,000 meaſures of wheat, and 20,000 barrels of fine oyl for his houſhold, beſides the ſame quantities of barley, wheat, wine, and oyl, which he engaged to give to his ſervants that did the work. On the other ſide, Hiram was to ſend the cedars, fir, and other woods upon floats to Joppa, there to be delivered to Solomon's ſervants, and thence brought to Jeruſalem. He ſent him alſo a man of his own name, a Tyrian by birth, who was a ſecond Bezaleel, and was ſuch an excellent workman in all kind of metals, ſtones, carving, engraving, embroidery, tapeſtry, and in making all ſorts of fine cloaths, that Hiram honoured him with the title of father. Him Solomon made overſeer over all the artiſts, whom David had formerly procured out of Tyre and Sidon. Theſe two princes made likewiſe an alliance together, which only ended with their lives (H) [r].

To carry on this ſtupendous work with greater eaſe and ſpeed, Solomon cauſed an account to be taken of all the Canaanites, and other foreign ſlaves, that were in the land, and it was found to amount to 153,600; 70,000 of whom he appointed to carry burdens, 80,000 to hew timber and ſtone in the mountains, and the remaining 3,600 he appointed to be overſeers over them [s]. Beſides theſe ſtrangers, over whom he appointed ſome of his chief officers to overſee the work, he levied 30,000 men out of Iſrael, whom he appointed to work in Lebanus one month in three, 10,000 every month, under the inſpection of Adoniram; theſe were likewiſe imployed in hewing wood, marble, and other ſtone, which was afterwards wrought by the Tyrian maſons and carvers, and thence conveyed to Joppa by water [t]. Whilſt theſe were preparing, Solomon, who had been ſtill adding immenſe quantities of gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, and other rich materials to thoſe which David had prepared before his death, did put them into proper hands, to be wrought into an almoſt infinite variety of ornaments. And the vaſt number of hands imployed, and the diligence of the overſeers and workmen was ſuch, that he was able to lay the foundations of this vaſt ſtructure in the fourth year of his reign, which was the ſecond after David's death, and the 480th after the exod [u]. uſed to puzzle one another with riddles, and that the nonſolvent was obliged to pay ſome conſiderable forfeit to the propoſer. So that Hiram, having once received ſuch a one as he could not ſolve, was forced to pay Solomon a large ſum; which he, however, made him to refund ſoon after, by getting one Abdemon a Tyrian to invent another, which proved too hard for that wiſe monarch (87). There is nothing improbable in all this; but what he and other learned Jews add, by way of appendix, to what the text records, concerning his extraordinary wiſdom, deſerves notice, though it were but for its abſurdity; for he makes one part of his knowledge to have conſiſted in the deepeſt receſſes of magic, in charms, evocation, and ejection of demons, and ſuch-like witcheries, in which he was not content to be the experteſt man living, but took the pains to propagate that art, by writing ſeveral books upon that worthleſs ſubject (88). What is still more surprising is, that every piece of it, whether timber, stone, or metal, was all finished before it was brought to Jerusalem, so that there were no other tools wanted or heard, than what were necessary to the joining of them to each other.

And here it will be doubtless expected, not only, that we should give our readers an exact description of that wonderful edifice, but perhaps also, that we should make some improvements upon those authors, who have gone before us, and discover new ornaments and excellencies, which they had overlooked. This is, indeed, no more than they pretend to have done with respect to one another, especially of late years, not from any greater insight they have gained into the sacred language and writings, but from what they have fetched either out of the description of the prophetic temple of Ezekiel, or from that of Josephus, or from what the Jewish rabbies have been pleased to

[w] Vid. Usser. Ann. sub an. A. M. 3001.

(I) This foundation, which took up the whole group of mount Moria, did likewise cost an immense labour to level, because it consisted of several gibbous eminences, all of them solid rock, except the surface, some parts of which were to be considerably lowered, and others raised in proportion, in order to bring them to that capacious area; insomuch, that Josephus says, a man could hardly believe his own eyes, when he beheld the stupendousness of that work, the very contriving of which was enough to have crased any brain, but that of Solomon (89). It will, indeed, appear very surprising, how such a foundation could be laid, and the materials for the building could be in such a forwardness, in so little a space as four years, as to have been finished in the seventh year after its foundation. But we see no reason against supposing, that David, who had also sent for a great number of Tyrian workmen long before his death, had already set them to this work, to prepare stone and timber, and to level the ground.

to ſuperadd out of their own heads, in order to raiſe this ſacred fabric to the higheſt pitch of grandeur and richneſs. The truth is, whilſt thoſe paper architects can have their work and materials at ſo cheap a rate, it is next to impoſſible to keep a luxuriant fancy within due bounds, and not to act the panegyriſt, rather than the hiſtorian, in the rearing of this ſtately building. This is therefore what we would carefully avoid, though at the hazard of being taxed with running into the other extreme, whilſt we ſtrike off their three evidences, as far as they jar with, or exceed, the account, we have of it in the books of Kings and Chronicles.

For, after all, who has aſſured thoſe authors, that the temple of Ezekiel, which was only ſeen in a viſion, and was, for ought appears, only a type of that ſpiritual one under the goſpel, did bear a conſtant analogy with that of Solomon, with reſpect to its members, dimenſions, ſymmetry, and the like? Who knows not, that that of Joſephus, allowing it to have been equal in beauty and magnificence to that author's deſcription of it, had received ſuch conſiderable additions and improvements from time to time, as might eaſily render it quite different from, not to ſay vaſtly excelling, that of Solomon? Laſtly, what diſcoveries can we hope for in this reſpect from the Talmudiſts and Jewiſh rabbies, who lived ſo many centuries after its final deſtruction, but what are of the ſame ſtamp with thoſe they have made with reſpect to religion; mere pious fables and forgeries, calculated to raiſe the honour of their nation? And if Ezekiel, Joſephus, and the rabbies muſt be ſet aſide, where ſhall we find an author that has done ſo, or a deſcription of this edifice, that has not borrowed more from them, than from the ſacred hiſtorians? For theſe reaſons, we had once reſolved to ſpare our readers the charge of a new draught or deſcription of it, ſeeing we could offer them nothing new or authentic, without being at the pains of delineating it afreſh, according to the account we have of it in the books of the Kings and Chronicles, without any farther regard to the others, than as they helped to explain a doubtful paſſage, or ſome obſcure terms, ſuch as muſt unavoidably occur in great plenty, in deſcriptions of this nature, written at ſuch a diſtance of time, and in a language ſo little known, as the Hebrew now is.

But whilſt we were deliberating, whether we ſhould undertake ſo laborious a taſk, we were agreeably informed by a curious gentleman, a friend and encourager of this hiſtory, ſtory, that having ſeen all the various deſcriptions of that edifice, and being diſſatisfied with their borrowing ſo much from thoſe authors we excepted againſt; he had ſome years ago prevailed upon a learned clergyman of his acquaintance, to make ſuch a delineation, as we have been ſpeaking of, out of the two ſacred books above-mentioned. He then favoured us with a ſight of the plans, and gave us time and leave to examine and compare them, and their proofs, with the original text; and when he found how much we approved of them, and that they could not but be very uſeful and acceptable to the curious, he not only made us a generous offer of the whole, to be communicated to the world, but gave us ſome opportunities of receiving farther ſatisfaction from his learned friend, touching any difficulties that might occur. However, as his demonſtrations from thoſe ſacred books, curious and exact as they are, would too ſenſibly interrupt the thread of our hiſtory, we think it will be more acceptable to our readers, if we join them with the plans of the city and temple in that ſuccinct and explanatory method, in which he has been ſince prevailed upon to adapt them to this work, that ſo both may at one view be compared, either with each other, or with any of thoſe deſcriptions that have hitherto appeared in the world (K). As for the elevations of that edifice, we

(K) It will not be amiſs, however, to obviate two objections which may be made againſt theſe new delineations; the firſt is, that it is more than probable, that the ſacred hiſtorians have omitted ſeveral particulars in their deſcriptions of that building, which, though perhaps of leſs conſequence, are yet of ſuch a nature, that one cannot well frame a juſt idea of the whole without them. This both our friend and we do readily grant, and therefore are far from giving this as a complete and perfect plan of the whole; all that is pretended is, that it contains all that the ſacred hiſtorians have mentioned of it, without having recourſe to Ezekiel, Joſephus, or the Talmudiſts, for a ſupply of what they have omitted. And we think, it cannot be unacceptable to the curious, to ſee how much thoſe, who have followed the laſt mentioned authors, have added to what we find in the text; and to be able to diſtinguiſh what is authentic, from what is not ſo, by comparing this with theirs.

The next objection is, that the tears, which the antients of Iſrael ſhed at the ſight of the ſecond temple, when they ſaw how far ſhort it was of the firſt †, ſeem to argue, at leaſt, that that of Solo-

Chap. 7.

The Explanation at Large of SOLOMON's Temple, according to the Sacred Hiſtorians.

FOR the right underſtanding the deſcription in the foregoing plate, we ſhall lay down the following preliminary obſervations;

I. Firſt, The temple of Solomon being our chief and proper object, we give the plan or ground-plot of it (which we declare to be our only taſk) whole and complete, juſt as we conceive it to have been: but Jeruſalem we repreſent only with an eye to thoſe parts which bore ſome relation to the temple; ſuch as the palace on the ſouth, and the ſuburbs to the weſt, the valley between both, the horſe-gate towards the eaſt, and the like.

II. Secondly, WE pretend to no other knowledge of the temple, but what we have from ſcripture, in terminis, or the clear ſenſe of it; and where that fails, we only beg to be allowed the uſe of criticiſm, and reaſonable or plauſible conjecture; for beyond theſe we have no other evidence. How great ſoever the learning of ſome moderns may be, much greater, we own, than any we pretend to, yet what they aſſert has no weight, unleſs they can bring ſuch manner of proof as that which we ourſelves intend to uſe. Whether they, or we, beſt ſtand the teſt, muſt be left to the judgment of the reader, that will be at the pains of perufing theſe ſheets with ſome attention, and of comparing our plan with any other now extant. As for antient authors, we have none to produce beſides Joſephus, and other Jews, rather of a later date than he. Now all we might learn from them, that has no foundation in holy writ, to us is no evidence at all. Much they knew, or pretended to know, from tradition, but that, we preſume, is not to be depended upon. We know no monuments they had beſide thoſe we have ourſelves: And the Hebrew tongue, properly ſo called, being a ſort of dead language at the time theſe authors writ, it may be well doubted, without ſinning againſt modeſty, whether they, who had no other books to learn it by than thoſe that are now in uſe, could underſtand it better than thoſe that ſtudy it at preſent. Nay more, it might be ſhewn, we dare ſay, that Joſephus underſtood not

ſome of thoſe few Hebrew words he pretends to explain in his Hiſtory of the Jews (A).

III. Thirdly,

(A) This is the more to be wondered at, becauſe Joſephus boldly aſſerts, at the end of his Jewiſh antiquities (1). That there were none of his countrymen ſo perfect in that ſort of learning as he was. But we are not alone in our opinion of him; though the late editor of his works, taking his bare word for it, ſets him off in the margin (2) as a very learned hebræan: Bochart (3) and Huetius (4), not to name any more, have openly declared themſelves quite oppoſite to that eulogium of Joſephus by Dr. Hudſon, Some indeed have tried to bring him off upon a ſuppoſition his writings were interpolated; which is not unlikely in ſome inſtances (5), and truly he himſelf ſhould not be charged with the blunders of either his tranſcribers or tranſlators. We ſhould think what is read in his manuſcripts (6) that the Hebrews called the ark Heoron, and many ſuch other ſtrange names (7), is no fault of the hiſtorian, but of thoſe that copied his writings, and the ſame we judge of the tranſlations. The French one, though much valued, ſays, The ark was made of an incorruptible wood, the Hebrews call Heoron; and truly ſo the Latin has it, which the French exactly followed, though pretending, in the title, the tranſlation was made from the Greek original; and Roger L'eſtrange here treads in Dandilly's ſteps heartily. However, to us it is probable, that Joſephus, being about to give in Greek the word in Hebrew for the ark, he wrote ἡ δὲ ἄρων, or as Dr. Bernard of Oxford would have it (8), ἡ δὲ ἔρων. Now pronounce it either way, Aron with the Hebrews, or Eron with the Chaldæans, the word itſelf ſignifies a Trunk, as was the ark, and Joſephus is right enough, though others have wronged him in relating his words. But what ſeems thereabouts (9) to be Joſephus's own fault, is the interpretation of what his manuſcripts and editions both call Chethomene; which, he ſays, ſignifies a linen coat, becauſe it is Chethon we call linen: now begging his pardon, Chetoneth, the Hebrew word, or Chethoneh, as the Chaldæans pronounce it, may alſo be a coat of wool. Not to obſerve

III. Thirdly, We do admit of Ezekiel as a divinely inſpired prophet; and therefore what he has ſaid or written ought to be received by us as moſt true. But then we take it, he has not given us a deſcription of the temple of Solomon, but of quite another; a prophetic or emblematical temple, that never exiſted but in the revelation that was made to him, and the repreſentation he has ſet down in his prophecy. He himſelf ſays [a], In the viſions of God brought he me into the land of Iſrael——and ſaid unto me, Behold with thine eyes, for to the intent that I might ſhew unto thee art thou brought hither. Declare all that thou ſeeſt to the houſe of Iſrael——and much more to the ſame purpoſe. Now it does not ſeem probable at all, that there wanted ſo much care and ſolemnity to ſhew the prophet a temple he had himſelf ſeen a hundred times over and over; he, as it is well known, being a prieſt [b], who had there officiated, and had no need of divine inſpiration to tell his countrymen the Jews, what moſt of them could not well be ignorant of, or rather were well inſtructed in. And, if it ſhould be urged, that this might well be forgotten in a captivity ſerve the Chethoneth of many colours Joſeph wore (10), or that that hanged like a robe about Thamar (11), poſſibly were not of linen, thoſe, moſt ſurely, our firſt parents were cloathed with, are ſaid (12) to be of ſkin. Accordingly, we are told, thoſe of the prieſts were of linen (13), on purpoſe, that they ſhould not be thought of ſome other ſtuff. But finding Chethon, or Kethan, for linen, in the vulgar language of Jeruſalem, Joſephus thought Chethoneth in holy writ to ſignify a coat of linen; which indeed does not look ſo ſtrange as the etymology he ſeems to give (14) of Jeruſalem, being a compound of the Greek Hieron, a ſacred thing, and the word Solyma, unleſs this alſo be an interpolation. And the ſame one might ſay concerning Bezetha, which Joſephus (15) makes to ſignify the New City, when no ſuch thing can be made out of that word. But if it be worth while to gueſs at it, בצת Baſath, as it is a root, or radical word, ſeems to be preſerved in that well known derivative among the Turks, viz. Boſtangi, tivity of 70 years (B), I will readily allow it, and all that can be drawn from this conceſſion, provided it be proved, that any uſe was made of this ſo ſolemn a deſcription, in their building of the temple, after the return from the captivity; but ſo far was it from it, that at the ſight of the ſecond temple many tears were ſhed, this ſecond temple built by Zorobabel being much inferior to that they had ſeen of Solomon's building [c]; and what then, if compared with that of Ezekiel? for this temple (and that is the thing we dare rely upon) had no proportion as to its meaſures with that other of Solomon. Whether any body has ever apprehended Solomon's temple to have been of each ſide above 500 cubits (C), we do not know: but that would be nothing to Ezekiel's, which was 500 reeds [d], that is to ſay, 3000 cubits, for it is well known, that a reed was ſix cubits (D), ſo that here is a difference as of ſix to one in their capacity ſtangi, a gardener; and among the Rabbins in Buſtan, a garden. So that it is not unlikely, that part of Jeruſalem, that lay northward of the temple, viz. Bezetha, before it was built into ſtreets, was the gardening place for the city, and kept its ancient name, as is ſtill cuſtomary among ourſelves in ſuch like occaſions.

(B) This revelation was made to Ezekiel in the 20th year of the ſaid captivity, and but the 14th after the taking of Jeruſalem by the Babylonians (16).

(C) The temple may well be taken for the whole ground on which it ſtood, with all its courts, and truly that name muſt be taken in this latitude, in our tranſlation of the goſpel; in Greek it is ἱερον, which might be properly turned into Engliſh by a conſecrated place, or ground (17); and the Jews, who commonly call it Har habbaith, mountain of the houſe, ſay it was a ſquare of 500 cubits (18).

(D) What theſe cubits were, has been obſerved chap. 7. of this hiſtory (19), to be almoſt equal to 22 inches, which is not improbable. Some indeed would increaſe the cubit to a greater length, and others reduce it to ours of 18 inches, which yet could not affect our argument, becauſe which ſoever of the divers hypotheſes capacity or encloſure, which is impoſſible to be thought or ſaid of one and the ſame temple. But you will ſay, it might be the ſame except the encloſure: I anſwer, No, becauſe the mountain had no proportion to ſuch a one, no not by any jettees, or other ways you can imagine; for the ſquare being 2000 reeds, will not give you leſs than 12000 and odd cubits, or about 4500 paces. Now Jeruſalem itſelf was never ſo large (E); how then can we ſuppoſe the temple to have been ſo, that was but part of that city? Beſides, Joſephus [f], in the dimenſions he gives us of Herod's temple, that he had himſelf ſeen, and was by far the largeſt of the three; does not exceed 4 ſtadia, or 500 paces. In a word, never any real temple, built upon Moria, was any thing near ſo big as that temple Ezekiel ſaw and delineated by inſpiration.

hypotheſes be the nearer the truth, it makes no difference here in the main, the cubit not being conſidered in itſelf, but comparatively to the meaſuring reed, ſaid to be (20) ſix cubits by a cubit and a hand-breadth, or, according to the Septuagint, ſix cubits and one hand-breadth beſides.

(E) Though we know what he does relate out of Hecateus, who, in the reign of Ptolemy Lagus, makes the circuit of Jeruſalem almoſt 50 ſtadia πενήκοντα μάλιστα (21) σταδίων τὸν περίμετρον, which indeed Joſephus does not correct, though he himſelf does not reckon this renowned city's largeſt extent to have been above 33 ſtadia, τῆς πόλεως δὲ ὁ πᾶς κύκλος σταδίων ἦν τριάκοντα τριῶν (22.) Now a ſtadium, as is well known, being 125 paces, 23 ſtadia will produce 4125 paces, which would reduce the whole extent of the city to three ſtadia, 375 paces leſs than that of the temple. There is indeed a book written in Dutch (23) by the learned Camp. Vitringa, wherein he undertakes to make void this our argument, by obſerving, That the 2000 reed are to be underſtood only of ſo many cubits, as the Septuagint have expreſſed it in their tranſlation; and to make it anſwer in the Hebrew text, he ſuppoſes the word there (24) to ſignify, by an ellipſis, cubits of a reed, that is to ſay, ſuch cubits, as ſix of them make up one reed. But whether this will ſatisfy we muſt leave to the judgment of our readers.

IV. A fourth obſervation, very neceſſary to be attended to, is the true ſituation of Jeruſalem, as to its two principal parts, well known by the names of two mountains, viz. Sion and Acra [g], on which ſtood the upper and lower city; for Sion was a good deal higher or loftier than Acra. They roſe like two huge heaps one againſt another, with a valley between them, by which they were ever, and are ſtill, parted, though not, as it is eaſy to imagine, without ſome very great alteration in their particular form or figure. The temple was built upon mount Moria [h], which was either part of mount Sion, or a hill of leſs compaſs near it. That Moria ſtood to the eaſt is not diſputed; but whether Sion was on the ſouth or the north has been a queſtion among the learned. This an eye-witneſs could eaſily have determined, if any one had favoured us with a map exactly drawn, or anſwered the queſtion in expreſs terms: For all this, we could try to clear it by the help of the ſacred monuments, which, thanks to the learned Reland [i], would prove an eaſy taſk, but too prolix for this performance; and therefore we chuſe to refer to that author for a full ſatisfaction about it. However, it is pretended, that Iſaiah [k] leaves room to think, that Sion lay northwards of the lower city: For, ſays the king of Babylon, as he is introduced ſpeaking by the prophet, I will ſit upon the mount of congregation in the ſides of the north. But it is not ſaid here mount Sion lay on the north of Acra; what is ſaid ſeems to be, that the conqueror would eſtabliſh his dominion where was the king's palace, bordering upon the ſouth of the temple, and ſituate on the northern ſide of mount Sion. There the Babylonian thinks himſelf ſecure, and in full poſſeſſion of the city. But ſays the prophet to him, alluding to the valley bordering upon mount Sion, towards Acra, Thou ſhalt be brought down to the ſides of the pit. This ſituation of Sion, which might be further proved from Joſephus [l], beſides our judicious traveller the Rev. Mr. Maundrell [m] and the Paris citizen Anthoine Regnault [n], we we did insist upon, because very great men [o], have appeared on the opposite side, who by their uncommon learning may draw others into the same error.

V. The fifth observation will give us the true situation of the temple. 'Tis known that when the Hebrews did worship, they turned themselves towards the most holy place or temple [p]. Now we learn from what Ezekiel saw, that it lay westwards of its door or entry. His words are very plain, Behold, says he [q], at the door of the temple were about five and twenty men, with their backs towards the temple, and their faces towards the east; and they worshipped the sun towards the east; therefore the front of the temple was turned towards the east (F); and this is confirmed by Josephus [r], who so far must be right, the temple having at first been in the same situation he saw it in afterwards.

VI. Lastly, Though our proper enquiry be into what appears to us to be strictly true, as to this matter of Solomon's temple, yet we do not pretend, that all that is true of it has been said by us, because it is possible, many things about it may have been omitted by the sacred historians, and therefore, as has been intimated, cannot in any wise be said by others. Neither do we aver, that all we intend to say is exactly true or certain. Once more we must be so plain with our readers, as to let them know, that we do not pretend to give demonstrations, but probable

(F) Theodoret, it seems, gives a very good reason for it, viz. That as the Israelites were commanded to worship God alone, they might have the sun behind their backs, turning themselves towards the tabernacle, and not adore the sun, but his maker; and truly when the custom prevailed among the Christians of turning their faces towards the east in their worship, the Pagans did upbraid them with adoring the sun (25). But the author of the apostolical constitutions knew well how to put it in another view, for the holy apostles are introduced by him, saying, προσευχέσθαι δὲ κατὰ ἀνατολάς, κ. τ. λ. (26).

conjectures. And if our weak endeavours are not satisfactory, we should be very glad by them to put others upon gratifying the world with a scheme more accurate, wherein all things appearing better connected, might also better answer, or be more agreeable to the several passages or texts of holy writ here under consideration. All then we do engage on our part is, carefully to distinguish between those things we have a full proof of, and those things wherein we only try to make some near approaches towards the truth; and upon this foot will now be explained the several particulars in the plan before us, according to the indication of them by the letters in the margin, for the greater conveniency of finding out whatever may seem to want a review, or deserve to be more narrowly looked or inquired into.

a. We begin with the Oracle (G), where God did speak from between the cherubim [s]; accordingly it is called the Oracle of his Holiness, or as it is otherwise translated, His Holy Oracle [t], towards which the Israelites turned themselves when they did worship [u]; and this was a square room of 20 cubits, as appears from 1 Kings vi. 2, 20. 2 Chron. iii. 8.

b. The holy place, or Sanctuary, 40 cubits long and 20 broad, as is plain from 1 Kings vi. 2, & 3. where it is also called

[s] Exod. xxv. 22. ult. Psal. xcix. 1. [t] Psal. xxviii. 2. [u] See before, Vol. 3. ch. 7. sect. 4. under the article of the mercy-seat and ark of the testimony. & comp. Psal. xxviii. 2.

(G) In Hebrew, דביר Debir, as if one should say Locutorium, or speaking-place. For there it was that God used to speak, or give his orders, or instructions, to his lieutenant, if one may so call the judge or prince, and to the high-priest, his first minister. Besides, it was called the oracle of the house, and most holy place, Heb. holy; or, as the Septuagint (27), holies of holies, and as it is translated (28) concerning the tabernacle the holiest of all (29).

The Septuagint have kept the Hebrew word reading it δαβειρ or δαβιρ, except in one place, where it is translated ναὸς, or temple.

(27) Exod. xxv. 22. Numb. vii. 89. (28) 1 Kings viii. 6. Psal. xxvii. 28. (29) Hebr. ix. 3.

called the Temple of the Houſe. For the Houſe (H) might properly be the name of the two apartments [w], but that of the Temple (I) the proper name [x] for the ſecond apartment: However, the length of both theſe together, being the Houſe and (K) Temple of God [y], was ſixty cubits, 1 Kings vi. 2.

c. BEFORE the Sanctuary ſtood a Porch. Twenty cubits was the length thereof, and ten cubits was the breadth thereof, as is ſaid ver. 3. and ſo far we have a certainty from the books of Kings and Chronicles. To which we might, if needful, add the authority of Joſephus [z] and numbers of others.

d. As for the wall between the porch and the temple, any one ſees it ought to be there admitted, though never mentioned in ſo many words by the ſacred hiſtorians. We ſay it appears to have been of great uſe, not only better to ſuſtain the building, but alſo to ſeparate the temple from the porch belonging to it; that ſo this temple might ſtand wholly by itſelf and alſo be ſhut up when there was occaſion for it.

[w] 1 Kings vi. 5, & paſſ. [x] Ibid. ver. 17. [y] Pſal. v. 5. comp. xxviii. 2. [z] Pag. 342.

(H) הבית Habbaith, or בית Baith, an Houſe (30), by way of excellency. It was the houſe of God, and in ſome ſenſe that of the Iſraelites alſo, wherefore they ſay (31), Our holy and beautiful houſe where our fathers praiſed thee. However, the houſe of the Lord is indifferently taken for the whole, or part off, the building.

(I) היכל Hecal is properly a palace, witneſs the [hecal] palace of Ahab (32); and by this name ſeems to be called the different parts belonging to the tabernacle (33). The Septuagint tranſlate it ναὸς moſt frequently, and ſometimes οἶκος.

(K) Well might it be called ſo, when it was the place of his reſidence among the Iſraelites. So ſays Solomon (34), I have ſurely built thee an houſe to dwell in; a ſettled place for thee to abide in. And therefore the Jews have given the name of Shekinah to this habitation not improperly, for there was God's ſymbolical preſence upon the ark (35), or, as it were his throne; and there alſo was a real preſence conſpicuous by its operations, I mean by the oracles which God delivered there.

(30) 1 Kings viii 16. (31) Iſaiah lxiv. 11. (32) 1 Kings xxi. 1. (33) 1 Sam. i. 9. iii. 3. (34) 1 Kings viii. 13. (35) 1 Sam. iv. 4. 2 Sam. vi. 2. Pſalm. lxxx. 1.

e. BUT further, our conjecture is ſtrengthened by this plain inference, that the temple had doors. Thus it is ſaid [a], For the entering of the oracle he made doors [b], —— ſo alſo made he for the entering (L) of the temple poſts of olive-tree, ——and the two doors were of fir-tree. Now a door ſeems to ſuppoſe a wall, where-ever a wall appears to be neceſſary, as was here. And ſhould it be objected, that the oracle had a door as well as the ſanctuary, though we do not conceive any wall between them, it might be anſwered, That there is nothing upon record concerning ſuch a wall (M); that we ſee no neceſſity for one; and laſtly, that there might be ſomething elſe in lieu of it.

f. FOR a very rich and ſtrong veil was made to ſeparate the moſt holy from the holy place [c], the ſame we ſuppoſe, as St. Matthew calls the veil of the temple that was rent in twain when Jeſus yielded up the ghoſt [d]. Joſephus [e] poſitively tells us, that Solomon made a partition wall, different from the veil; but this is not ſo clearly expreſſed in the ſacred books. The tranſlation indeed ſays [f], He made a partition by the chains of gold before the oracle: and accordingly we may underſtand, that there was both a partition and a veil, the partition being fixed, and the veil hanging before it, ſo as to be moved like our curtains. But we do not warrant, that this is the true ſenſe of the Hebrew (N), which

[a] 1 Kings vi. 31. [b] Ibid. 33, 34. [c] 2 Chron. iii. 22. [d] Matth. xxvii. 50, 51. [e] Ant. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 343. [f] 1 Kings vi. 2.

(L) The word in Hebrew is פתח Petach, the ſame as for the oracle above, and therefore entring ought to be kept in Engliſh, not door, as in our tranſlation; although Petach, an entring, is in other places tranſlated a door, by a true analogy.

(M) This muſt be underſtood of holy writ, wherein no mention is made of any ſuch wall, though indeed our tranſlation ſays, as to the door of the oracle; "the lintel and ſide poſts were a fifth "part of the wall." But thoſe laſt words are not in the Hebrew, and truly another interpretation is given in the margin, viz. that they were five ſquare; however, the reading in the text may well be admitted relatively to the height of the oracle, ſo that this is meant, that the lintel, &c. were five cubits high.

(N) ויעבר ברתיקות Vajehabber Beratikoth, or, according to the keri, Beratoukoth, which is verbatim, he made paſs with chains, ſuppoſing ratikoth to be chains, for that word occurs in no other text but this, and may be as well tranſlated bars, or bolts which is rather, He placed chains (bars or bolts) croſs the oracle: However, there was a door to it, as we have ſeen already. And although we may eaſily conceive a door without a wall, properly ſo called, we muſt ſuppoſe ſome ſuch thing as a partition. Beſides, what bolted this door, or went acroſs before the oracle, was of gold, and therefore not the veil itſelf. At leaſt the Hebrew text allows us to ſay the oracle was ſhut up with golden bolts. Yet whether there was a partition beſides the door of each ſide [g], or whether the door itſelf ſerved inſtead of a partition, we ſhall not determine (O), but conclude this article by ſaying, that the doors of the porch are mentioned as ſuch in one paſſage [h], and called the doors of the houſe of the Lord in another [i].

g. WHAT we are now to conſider are the chambers, built againſt the wall of the houſe round about, both of the temple and the oracle, the nethermoſt ſaid to be five cubits broad, and alſo five cubits high [k]; but of their length we find nothing in the books we refer to. It ſeems they were ſquare rooms: Joſephus tells us [l], they were thirty in number all about the temple, which, it may be, he took from that of Ezekiel [m], who ſays, The ſide chambers were three, or any thing equivalent. Hence then it ſeems, Joſephus (36) took, "the in and the outſide of the temple was all lined with "cedar, and that the cramping of the cedar together with ſtrong "chains, (ἁλυσεσι, not irons, as L'eſtrange has it) was a great "ſtrength and ſecurity to the building." However, pro materiâ ſubjectâ, to make paſs with chains; or as it might be tranſlated without the particle (37), to make chains paſs, ſeems to be nothing elſe but to chain, or tie with chains, to bolt, or bar; unleſs the word veil be ſupplied to fill up the gap of this expreſſion, well underſtood at that time, though afterwards, being obſcure and obſolete, it was omitted by the Septuagint. The Vulgate ſays, he faſtened the ſhelfs with nails.

(O) It will hardly be expected we ſhould here take particular notice of thoſe ſacred veſſels and utenſils that adorned this holy houſe, viz. the ark, and cherubims, the table of ſhew-bread, the golden candleſticks (38), and the altar of incenſe; ſince we could hardly add any thing, that is needful concerning them, to what hath already been obſerved in the courſe of this hiſtory.

three, one over another, and thirty in order: So that thirty being multiplied by three, according to the number of ſtories in the firſt book of Kings, thoſe chambers will amount in all to ninety, that are called the nethermoſt, the middle, and the third. And ſuch a number may eaſily be placed about the houſe, ſuppoſing them to have been each of five cubits length, as well as height, for in the breadth they differed from five to ſix, and from ſix to ſeven; the reaſon of which is there given. Upon this ſcore they will undoubtedly appear ſomewhat ſmall, and ſo indeed Joſephus [n] calls them. However, if their uſe was well known, that might give ſome light into this matter. But concerning their uſe, we find only [o], that Joas was hidden in the bed-chamber (P) belonging to the temple. Taking it then for granted, that they were chiefly or frequently intended to lye in, we may venture to ſay, that they were ſufficient for that purpoſe, eſpecially thoſe of the middle and third ſtory. Beſides that, the bed-chambers among the Jews were generally upper rooms, as has already been obſerved in this Univerſal Hiſtory [p].

One thing more remains to be attended to about the temple, properly ſo called. It is ſaid [q], The door for the middle chamber was in the right ſide of the houſe, and they went up with winding ſtairs into the middle chamber, and out of the middle into the third. Where we may well imagine an opening was left in the thickneſs of the wall for a pair of ſtairs, to go up to the ſecond ſtory of the chambers about the temple, temple, and alſo a paſſage from the temple to the porch, for there might be ſeveral occaſions that required the miniſters of the temple to go up to thoſe chambers, as well as in and out of the temple, of which we ſuppoſe a detail is not here expected.

(P) In Hebrew, חדר Heder or Cheder, and ſeems to be underſtood of one of the three ſtories about the temple (39), where might be the beds for the prieſts in waiting. and among thoſe rooms, or chambers, one, or more, eſpecially reſerved, or ſet apart for the high-prieſt; which alſo ought therefore to have been a retired place, and not eaſily acceſſible but to himſelf and conſort, with thoſe they truſted. Theſe rooms we find alſo called inner-parlours (40). where for parlours the Hebrew hath Chadarim, and there diſtinguiſhed from the lower apartments, Ganſakim, (the treaſuries in our verſion), and from the upper-rooms. So as we have here the ſeveral parts of the Jaziah (41), it ſeems, by their proper names.

We are now come to the Porch, where we meet with thoſe celebrated columns, or pillars, Solomon adorned it with. It is ſaid [r], He ſet them up in the porch of the temple, and [s] he made before the houſe two pillars, and [t] he reared up the pillars before the temple; which expreſſions taken together ſufficiently ſeem to imply the pillars were before the temple in its porch. But it is not quite ſo eaſy to aſſign the height of them. In one place it is ſaid of Solomon [u], He caſt two pillars of braſs of eighteen cubits high apiece. In another [x] we read, He made two pillars of thirty-and-five cubits high. This ſeeming inconſiſtency between the two ſacred hiſtorians we ſhall preſently reconcile; only we will firſt beg leave to take notice, that this is an inſtance of their not combining together, of their not being corrected or amended by one another. Now let us only ſuppoſe the pedeſtal or baſis of the columns to have been 17 cubits high, this added to the 18 cubits (1 Kings vii. 15. Jer. lii. 21.) for the ſhaft, will, added together, make exactly 35, the number mentioned 2 Chron. iii. 15. Laſtly, taking from 1 Kings vii. 16, five cubits, being the height of the chapiter, we ſhall have the true height of the pillars, viz. 40 cubits. It is true, that in another place [y] the height of the chapiter is ſaid to have been three cubits; but here we apprehend we have the dimenſion of the chapiter only, ſtrictly ſo called, Cotherith in the Hebrew, or crowning, which is expreſſed to have been three cubits; and there is left to be underſtood the wreathen work on it round about, which was two cubits more; both which ſums added make that of five, the number ſet down before by the ſame author. We can ſay but little concerning the thickneſs of the ſhaft of thoſe pillars, only that a line of twelve cubits did compaſs either of (Q) them round about [z], and therefore the diameter

(Q) Some will ſay, the Hebrew differs from our tranſlation, for what is here either of them, is there (השני Haſheni) the ſecond, and we acknowledge this is a ſeeming, though no real, difference.

ter was four cubits, which is the proportion of 12 for the circumference. But it may be further obſerved, that one of the pillars was to be ſeen on the right of the porch, and called Jachin, and the other on the left called Boaz [a]. Now Jachin ſignifies he ſhall eſtabliſh, and Boaz, ſtrength is in him. By which it ſeems Solomon would give to underſtand, that he depended only on an Almighty power for the continuance and duration of this temple. But by way of conjecture one might ſuppoſe, there was an inſcription in ſome ſuch ſenſe upon the baſis of each of the pillars, that on one beginning with the word Jachin, and that on the other with the word Boaz; from whence the pillars might have their denomination; as we ſee the books of Moſes called by the firſt word they begin with *. Laſtly, as to their ſituation; we take it they ſtood before the temple [b], in the porch of the temple [c]: So ſays our tranſlation, which we chuſe here to follow (R).

GOING

[a] 1 Kings vii. 21. * See before Vol. iii. Ch. vii. Sect. iv. firſt note A. [b] 2 Chron. iii. 17. [c] 1 Kings vii. 21.

ference. It is ſaid, Eighteen cubits was the height of the firſt column, and a line of twelve cubits did encompaſs the ſecond, which is an elliptical expreſſion, where, in a period, one branch of it not expreſſed, is underſtood by what the other expreſſes (42). So here the height of the firſt column gives you the meaſure of the ſecond, and the thickneſs of the ſecond the meaſure of the firſt. But this not being agreeable to our ſtile, another turn ought to be took, which is uſual and intelligible in our way of ſpeaking.

(R) One reaſon is the difference to be obſerved between the two particles in the texts of Chronicles and Kings. In that it is עַל־פְּנֵי All-pene, which cannot otherwiſe be tranſlated than by Before. But in this it is לְ Le, which may be tranſlated ſeveral ways, and eſpecially by In; ſo you read Lerouach (43), in the cool of the evening; Lekiſſe (44), in the throne; and ſuch like expreſſions (45). Beſides, the Vulgate has in porticu, and the Septuagint do not much differ as to the ſenſe: They tranſlate, he ſet up the pillars τῦ αἰλαὰμ of the porch; which ſeems to imply, that the pillars were an appurtenance of the porch, and therefore very properly placed in it. Joſephus, as to this, ſays only (46), Solomon placed

GOING now out of the porch, we muſt take notice firſt of the altar ſtanding before the porch [d], or before the houſe [e], as in the Hebrew, not improperly tranſlated the fore-front of the houſe: and there it ſeems to have ſtood in the middle of the court (S), of which court afterwards. This altar for burnt-offerings did anſwer to one of the ſame uſe in the tabernacle, whereof we have ſpoken at large [f]. What remains for us to obſerve is, only the new altar, which was in length two cubits, and as many broad, beſides ten cubits high [g]; and ſince no ſteps were allowed in the tabernacle to go up to the altar [h], it ought to be ſuppoſed, there were none for that uſe in the temple, but only an eaſy aſcent up to the altar.

OF the court itſelf we muſt own it is our opinion, that it went at firſt all about the temple. Thus was the court about the tabernacle, an oblong ſquare, the length thereof being an hundred cubits, and the breadth fifty every where [i]. Now as we find no dimenſion given of the court in placed one of them on the right poſt of the porch, and the other on the left. The French and Engliſh tranſlations add, at the entrance of the porch. We have declared our opinion to be that they were within; but after all, if one likes them better without, we would not much oppoſe it, ſince ל may ſignify At, as where it is ſaid of Zabulon (47), "He ſhall ſtand ל at the haven of the "ſea;" or For, as in the very ſame expreſſion, viz. לְחוֹף our own interpreters have taken it elſewhere (48), ſaying, for the porch.

(S) In the tabernacle, the altar of burnt-offerings was to be placed (49) before the door, and at a convenient diſtance *, ſo that our tranſlation ſeems to be very right in ſaying by (50) and at (51) it, which could not be well otherwiſe, the court being of a ſmall compaſs. But as that of the temple was much larger, the altar might here ſtand in the middle of the court, and this further appears from its relation to the King's Seat, which was in the midſt of the other courts, and before this altar, as will be ſeen hereafter (52).

(47) Gen. xlix. 13. (48) 1 Kings vii. 12. (49) Exod. xl. 6. * See before, Vol. iii. ch. vii. ſect. 4. of the ark and mercy-ſeat. (50) Levit. i. 5. (51) Ibid. v. 7, 8. (52) Notes Y & Z.

in the temple, all we can well do, to go ſomewhat by a ſcriptural rule, is, to make this laſt court twice as big as that in the tabernacle, becauſe it ſufficiently appears king Solomon kept pretty near to that proportion in the building of the temple itſelf. Again, as in that oblong Square the tabernacle ſtood weſtwards, and that by that means the court had on the eaſt two third parts or more of the whole ſpace, we conceive, the court in the temple, as Solomon at firſt built it, to have been much the ſame.

BUT a wall is placed here on the weſt ſide of the court before the porch, for which no warrant will eaſily be found in that part of ſcripture that was to be our guide in our preſent enquiry, and therefore does not ſeem to be built upon any ſure foundation; but yet what we have to ſay for it may be ſeen in the next note (T).

A NEW court is plainly mentioned in ſacred hiſtory. Thus we read [1], That Jehoſophat ſtood in the congregation of Judah, and Jeruſalem in the houſe of the Lord before the new court (V). That here by the houſe of the Lord is underſtood

[1] 2 Chron. xx. 5.

(T) By ſaying this we would not be underſtood to deny there might be ſuch a wall in Solomon's time, for we read (53) concerning the houſe he built for his queen, The great court round about was with three rows of hewed ſtones, and a row of cedar-beams: As for the inner court of the houſe of the Lord, and for the porch of the houſe. Inſtead of As, our tranſlation renders Both, the Hebrew ו We, whoſe ordinary ſignification is and. But in the way of a compariſon, (as it plainly appears to be here uſed) if we conſult our tranſlation in other places (54), it would, we think, be more properly rendered by As. However, the wall, for the porch of the houſe may, it ſeems, be underſtood of this wall that ſtood before the porch of the temple, though others, with ſome probability, underſtand it of a porch before the queen's houſe.

(V) The name given by the Septuagint to this court deſerves ſome attention: They call it αυλην της σκηνης, the court of the tabernacle; which, well underſtood, ſeems to be a very proper name; for the houſe in Solomon's building did anſwer the tabernacle of Moſes, and here and there equally was the Shekinah, or inhabitation, of the divine majeſty, to which St. John alſo ſeems to have an eye, when he ſays, the λογος word εσκηνωσεν εν ἡμιν dwelt among us. Now derſtood the whole compaſs of the temple, with its ſeveral courts, wants no proof, after what has been ſaid above [m]. But what that new court is, we are now to conſider. Some will have it to have been the court of prieſts repaired, as indeed the altar was, by king Aſa [n], and therefore called the New Court.

But though, by the analogy of the temple with the tabernacle, the court of prieſts ſeems to have been round about the holy and moſt holy place, and not divided by a wall; yet afterwards ſuch a wall being found convenient to be made between the altar and the porch, that part of the court about the temple becoming now a ſort of a court by itſelf, might be called the new court, the old name, viz. the court of the prieſts, remaining with that part where ſtood the altar. Now weether this will be judged a rational conjecture muſt be ſubmitted to the reader.

We have a few words to add concerning the other, but undoubted, wall of the court of prieſts. It is ſaid [o], Solomon built the inner-court with three rows of hewed ſtone, and a row of cedar-beams. It is elſewhere [p] called the court of prieſts, and bore the name of the inner, becauſe of another round about it. But what theſe rows were, is not ſo eaſy to explain. Some indeed do not ſpare buildings that coſt them nothing, and of theſe rows make ſo many ſtories; but whether the ſingle Hebrew word, Tur, i. e. row, will uphold ſuch a heavy building, we very much doubt: To us there appears no more than a kind of parapet wall, of ſome four or five foot high, (conſiſting of three rows of ſtone, one upon another, and a fourth of cedar beams over them) ſufficient to keep off the people from, being an hinderance in the court of prieſts, but low enough for the Iſraelites without to ſee all the prieſts were doing within.

One

[m] Note C. & al. [n] 2 Chron. xv. 8. [o] 1 Kings vi. 36. vii. 12. [p] 2 Chron. iv. 9.

Now this ſituation of the New-Court being allowed, we may, by it further explain and fix the place where Zechariah, the high-prieſt's ſon, was killed. It is ſaid this happened in the court of the houſe of the Lord (55), between the temple and the altar (56), which muſt be as he came out of the temple, into this New-Court, towards the wall before the porch.

ONE thing remains to be conſidered, which is the ſeveral entries into the court; for though we ſhould not find any mentioned, as they are ſufficiently [q], they muſt, in the nature of things, have been there, and we therefore place them where we find it moſt proper, viz. over-againſt the gates that are ſaid to have been in that court where the people did meet for their ſolemn devotions.

Now this court (X) was called the Great Court [r], becauſe of its bigneſs, comparatively to that of the prieſts, which was a good deal leſs; both of them being ſaid to be the two courts of the houſe of the Lord [s]. And that Solomon himſelf did build the one as well as the other, we read in theſe words, Furthermore he made the court of the prieſts, and the great court, and doors for the court, and overlaid the doors of them with braſs. Joſephus, not thinking this metal valuable enough, has made a tranſmutation of it into ſilver [t], and has, at no other expence than his fancy, built a large court upon a mount raiſed on purpoſe 400 cubits high. It is eaſy to preſume he has ſpared neither columns, nor porticoes, nor all the embelliſhments a fruitful imagination could prompt him to adorn it with (Y).

HASTE

[q] Ibid. [r] Ibid. [s] 2 Kings xxi. 5. [t] Antiq. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 346.

(X) The Septuagint call it αυλην ιερα, where ιερον ought not to be taken for hecal commonly rendered, as has already been obſerved (57) by another Greek word, but never, as we know, by ιερον. This laſt word, as made uſe of both by them and Joſephus (58), does ſignify either the whole of the building, or ſome outpart of it, and is properly a ſacred place, or conſecrated ground; the court of Iſrael being its proper court, as it encompaſſed round about immediately that of the prieſts, and mediately the temple itſelf and oracle.

(Y) His words are, "Beyond this partition was another ſquare "court (gr. ιερον) or building, with large porticoes or galleries "about it, and four ſtately gates that opened eaſt, weſt, north, "and ſouth, the doors all plated and inlaid with gold. This "place was common to all the people.——— The erecting of "this outward building was ſo ſtupendous an undertaking, that "no tongue can expreſs the difficulties of raiſing it, and a man "would

(57) 1 Chron. xxix. 4. Coll. Ezik. xlv. 19. (58) Antiq. viii. c. 3. p. 346.

r. HASTE we now to fix the gates. There were three on three ſides of the temple, eaſt, north, and ſouth; beſides two on the weſt ſide. Theſe gates were kept by wardens, truſted with power and authority, who had under them numbers of Levites; for we read [u], Among theſe were the diviſions of the porters, even among the chief men, having wards one againſt another, to ſerve in the houſe of the Lord; and they caſt lots, as well the ſmall as the great, for every gate. We have nothing remarkable to ſay concerning the north and eaſt gates; but juſt by that to the ſouth, we find the houſe of Aſuppim [x], and what this houſe was is not eaſy to determine; however, as this belongs properly to our ſubject, we ſhall make our beſt endeavours towards a diſcovery that way.

s. THE radical verb Aſap ſignifies to add, aſſemble, or gather together, and the ſeveral nouns derived from it keep all this primitive ſenſe; ſo that it is to be preſumed, it is alſo preſerved in the word Aſuppim; but as this idea is indefinite, we muſt try to fix it by the uſe of this word, to be found only in the place already quoted, and a little lower [y], and in Nehemiah [z]. In the firſt quotation, the tranſlation is word for word the houſe of Aſuppim, but the ſenſe ſeems rather (Z) to imply each of the two houſes, for

[z] Chap. xii. ver. 25.

" would have much ado to believe his own very eyes that ſaw it. " Such hollows, ſuch depths to be filled up, as a body would " hardly have looked upon, or but ſo much as fancied, without " turning his brain; 400 cubits to be brought up to a level with " the top of the mountain, only to make the work regular and " the ground even. This port was encompaſſed again with a " kind of double cloyſter, and two rows of pillars to ſupport it, " every pillar being cut whole out of the rock; the doors were " all ſilver work, &c.

(Z) According to an uſual way of ſpeaking in ſcripture; as where we read, The fool hath ſaid (59). How ſweet thy word (60). Let us lurk for the innocent (61). The wicked flee (62). She, that is, the woman, ſhall be ſaved (63). For, by what follows, the ſenſe appears to be each or either of the things and perſons mentioned. See above, letter O.

(59) Pſ. xiv. 1. (60) cxix. 103. (61) Prov. i. 11.

for ſo many there were under the direction of Obed-edom and his ſons. In the ſecond text, the tranſlation ſays, toward Aſuppim two and two, (adding the word and, which is not in the Hebrew) and as far as can be judged, the true ſenſe is this, There were four Levites truſted with the care of the Aſuppim, two to the one, and two to the other. This ſeems to be confirmed by the third paſſage, that in Nehemiah, for one reads, according to the Hebrew, Porters keeping the ward at the Aſuppim of the gates. In the verſion it is at the threſholds, and in the margin treaſuries, or aſſemblies. It would have been better to have preſerved in the tranſlation the Hebrew word Aſuppim, which, though a proper name, is there a caſe governed. And if the three above-mentioned paſſages are carefully compared together, it will plainly appear, that there were near the gate we have been ſpeaking of, two houſes, or diſtinct apartments, one on each ſide of this gate, where either the prieſts or the levites, or it may be both orders, aſſembled at times, either about buſineſs relating to the temple, or depoſited all things of uſe in that conſecrated place, ſince gathering and aſſembling are equally an apt tranſlation of the word Aſuppim. Beſides, we find in holy writ, that there were ſuch apartments or houſes within the incloſure, or precinct of the temple, or its courts. So, for example, Jeremiah [a] brought the Rechabites into the houſe of the Lord, into one of the chambers, where he did put before them pots full of wine, and ſo on. This room, which, for that very reaſon, we may ſuppoſe to have had ſome extent, did belong to the offspring of Igdaliah, a man of God, that is to ſay, a prophet; and its ſituation is ſaid to have been next to the chamber of the princes, or chief men, which in the temple can be underſtood only of the prieſts, or chiefs of the levites. Beſides, it is ſaid, that this chamber was above the chamber of Maaſejah, the keeper of the door. It was an upper room. And it is well known, that about buſineſs of moment they met in ſuch rooms among the Jews, which was ſtill a cuſtom in the time of the apoſtles [b]. Let that be as it will, there are ſeen here in the ſame houſe large rooms, different or diſtinct both in relation to the uſes they were put to, and the perſons that occupied them, whether they met or lodged in them, in order to be of ſervice to the temple, or its miniſters; or whether in particular the lower part, or ground floor of theſe houſes ſerve ferved as ſtore-houſes, or treaſuries, which, it ſeems, may be gathered from what is related elſewhere [c], That Amaziah took all the gold, and the ſilver, and all the veſſels, that were found in the houſe of God with Obed-edom (A).

t. It will be pertinent enough, before we go to the other gate, to put here together what we have more to ſay concerning the other apartments we have delineated in this court of the people. Upon which two things are very diſtinctly to be conſidered, the firſt relates to the form and particular ſituation of theſe apartments, and this we muſt frankly own we are ignorant of. But as it was abſolutely neceſſary to place them ſome where, we have diſpoſed of them, in the plaineſt manner we could, to the four corners of the temple, leaving to every one to fix and repreſent them as may be thought moſt proper. The ſecond thing we have to ſay about theſe chambers is concerning their real exiſtence, of which there is no room to doubt. For ſetting aſide what has juſt now been inſtanced of the Aſuppim, and apartments mentioned by Jeremiah; and ſuppoſing them to be different from thoſe we are now ſpeaking of, it is plain from holy writ [d], that David gave to Solomon the pattern of the courts of the houſe of the Lord, and of all the chambers round about, of the treaſuries of the houſe of God, and of the treaſuries of the dedicated things; and this order was executed, for [e] Ahijah was over the treaſuries of the houſe of God, and over the treaſures of the dedicated things (B). To this it may be added, that in the temple of Zorobabel, in Nehemiah's time, when to be ſure there had been no thoughts of exceeding Solomon's temple, Eliaſhib [f] the prieſt having the overſight of the chamber

(A) Not ſurely the ſame Obed-edom, who, from the foundation of the temple, had been chief warden of the Aſuppim, with his ſons under him, but one of his family, or poſterity, who now was in the ſame employment or office; either bearing the ſame name, or going by it in that his public capacity, or as ſucceſſor to him. Somewhat like we ſee in the names of Iſrael, Judah, David, &c.

ber, or rather of each chamber (C), of the houſe of God, had prepared for Tobiah, one allied unto him, a great chamber, where afore-time they laid the meat-offering, the frankincenſe, and the veſſels, and the tythes of the corn, the new wine, and the oil, and the offerings in the courts of the houſe of God.

We would have theſe laſt words to be attended to, becauſe theſe chambers ſhould be carefully diſtinguiſhed from thoſe already mentioned [g], which immediately joined the temple. For beſides that theſe laſt, as has been ſeen [h], were very ſmall, and did not ſeem to have been capacious enough for thoſe uſes the others were put to; the difference of their names makes it probable, that theſe chambers were different. Thoſe about the temple are called Jaziah (D), and thoſe in the courts Leſhacoth, and they were the chief porters that were over thoſe chambers, or, as in the margin, ſtore-houſes and treaſuries of the houſe of God [i]; and very large they ought to have been indeed, ſince in one of them the chamber of Gemariah, in the higher

(C) According as has been obſerved above, though it may be the four Hebrew characters there לשכת are not rightly punctuated for Liſhcath, in the ſingular, a chamber, but ought to have been ſo for Leſhacoth, in the plural, chambers. Yet, one way or other, the ſenſe is much the ſame.

(D) יציע we take to have been ſomewhat like the Italians coridore, which ſome derive from currere, where one may run in, round about an houſe, as you have ſome furniſhed with bed-rooms in our hoſpitals and colleges. And truly the Hebrew word comes up to that notion, for יצע jazah, is to lay, and יצוע jazuah, a bed, Pſal. 132, 139. However, in the jaziah, belonging to the temple, the rooms were of a ſmaller ſort, but לשכות Leſhacoth, the larger ſort of them, like our dining-rooms, parlours, or halls. And indeed in that emblematical temple of Ezekiel, where all is repreſented, in the height of grandeur and bigneſs, far above that of Solomon's temple, there is no mention of any ſuch thing as jaziah, but in its ſtead, ſo many Leſhacoth. Yet it may be objected, that David gave to Solomon the pattern of the court of the houſe of the Lord, and of all the chambers, Leſhacoth, round about (64). True they were ſuch rooms, but not joining to the houſe, as the jaziahs which Solomon built againſt it (65).

higher court (E), which was that we are about, Baruc did read the words of Jeremiah in the ears of all the people [k], which cannot well be underſtood but of a conſiderable number there met together (F).

u. LET us now conſider the gates to the weſt, which deſerve a particular attention. Thus ſays the ſacred hiſtorian [l], To Shuppim and Hoſah the lot came forth weſtward with the gate Shallecheth, by the cauſey of the going up, ward againſt ward, and [m] at Parbar weſtward, four at the cauſey, two at Parbar. As to the firſt at ſouth-weſt, the name may be applied, according to its etymology, to what comes out like a projecture, as we call it from the Latin, or a jutting or leaning out in a building. The word is found only in two places of ſcripture, this of Chronicles, and another [n], where it is ſaid of oaks, whoſe ſubſtance is in them when they caſt their leaves, ſays our verſion, but the Hebrew be-ſhallecheth, where the particle be ſtands for in, and Shallecheth, we ſhould think to be, what is riſen, or above ground, for here ſuch trees very well ſtand or ſubſiſt (G).

HOWEVER, when the name of Shallecheth is given to the gate we are ſpeaking of, we ſee it at the ſame time joined to a cauſey. This was a jettee, bank, terraſs, or bridge, that led up to the temple. And here, it ſeems, [k] Jerem. xxxvi. 10. [l] 1 Chron. xxvi. 16. [m] Ibid. ver. 18. [n] Iſaiah vi. 13.

(E) This is an expreſſion that occurs but once, and is therefore the harder to be underſtood; though of itſelf a plain one, which ſeems to be in relation to a court that ſtood lower. But it may be, no more is intended than thereby to ſignify the great court. However, if higher, muſt be taken in the proper ſenſe; to us it appears, 'tis the new court that is here called the higher, becauſe thereon was the temple, in the eaſt of the hill, where, it is commonly ſuppoſed, was its top.

(F) It may be ſaid indeed, he might read it out of a window or balcony, which we are not willing to oppoſe; but then we do further remark, that this chamber, out of which he read, was at the entry of the new gate, ſuppoſed to be the eaſtern, and near it, in either courts, might be large apartments.

(G) This, to us, appears to be the true notion the Hebrew text gives of what we have ſeen rendered by the word Subſtance, which is מצבת Mazebeth, the ſubſiſtence, properly, or ſubſiſting of a thing, wherefore it ſignifies a pillar and monument Gen. xxxv. 14. 20.

ſhould be placed the miſhad, made for the temple by the king [o]. The tranſlation calls it pillars in the text, but in the margin rails, (Heb. a prop) and in another place it bears the name of [p] Meſilloth, rendered by terriſes in the text, but in the margin ſtays, (Heb. high-ways) the ſenſe of all which comes to one; for the ground without the temple ſeems to have been very uneven, and in order to make the coming to it not only commodious, but delightful, Solomon contrived an avenue over the valley, one end of which anſwered the gate Shallecheth, and the other the palace, over-againſt the ſouth-ſide of the temple, to the north of mount Sion. It is in this diſpoſal or order we are to conſider what is called [q] his aſcent, by which he went up into the houſe of the Lord; which aſcent was built by Solomon in ſo coſtly a manner, that it was looked upon with admiration by the queen of Sheba. Thus have we aſſigned a cauſe why this gate ſhould be called Shallecheth; and as there was the greateſt concourſe of thoſe about court, and in general from the high city, here were two diſtinct guard-houſes, parallel to one another, one under Shuppim, and the other under his co-partner Hoſah.

x. But the ſecond to the weſt, towards the north of the temple, was for the inhabitants of that part of the city that has ſince been called the lower: and this gate was called Parbar (H,) the way from it leading to the ſuburbs named in ſacred hiſtory Parvarim [r], from which this gate ſeems to derive its name, but ſlightly altered, the b and v conſonant being capable of permutation, as is eaſy to be ſeen in moſt languages, both antient and modern. Now as the temple might be more expoſed on that ſide than any where elſe, and there was a very great concourſe of people, the out-let of the road near the gate was guarded by four Levites, and the gate itſelf by two more. But now let us return to the temple by the terraſs-gate.

y. Here we find the covert for the ſabbath, and (z) the king's entry adjoining to it; for we read in ſacred hiſtory [s], that king Ahaz cut off the borders of the baſes, and removed

[o] 1 Kings x. 12. [p] 2 Chron. ix. 11. [q] Kings ubi ſupr. ver. 5. Ch. v. 4. [r] 2 Kings xxiii. 11. [s] 2 Kings xvi. 18.

(H) Which word the Targum does expound by that of בראּ barr, i. e. without; and this ſenſe of it ſeems very probable, ſince Parbar had its iſſue, or out-let, into the then out-parts of Jeruſalem.

removed the laver from off them, and took down the ſea from the brazen oxen that were under it, and put it upon a pavement of ſtones: and the covert for the ſabbath that they had built in the houſe, and the king's entry without, turned he from the houſe of the Lord, for the king of Aſſyria. We preſume ſomewhat of a commentary on this paſſage, as to the two things here mentioned, will not be unacceptable to the reader.

We muſt firſt form to ourſelves an idea of this covert, called in Hebrew Miſac, or, as the Maſorites read it Muſac; which pronunciation is not of great concern, for this word is to be found only in this place, the ſignification of which it is no eaſy matter to aſcertain. Sacah is to cover, and Maſac a covering or veil. As for the thing itſelf, we muſt look for what may relate to it among thoſe things built by Solomon in the temple. At the time of its dedication one finds [t], he had made a brazen ſcaffold, (in Hebrew it is Kior) of five cubits long, and five cubits broad, and three cubits high, and had ſet it up in the midſt of the court, and upon it he ſtood, and ſo on. Here it is eaſy to imagine a raiſed up place, where ſtood the king. It might be in the ſhape of a hemiſphere, or hollow veſſel, almoſt like the concha, or triumphal car of the Romans; but whatever might be this Kior, it muſt of neceſſity have reſted upon, or been ſupported by, a pedeſtal or column. This the Vulgate, following the Septuagint, expreſſes by the word baſe, inſtead of the Hebrew Kior. Much the ſame figure therefore would have been made uſe of, both in the text and tranſlations, where the whole takes its denomination from a part of the throne. We ſhall try to diſtinguiſh every one of them that made up this royal ſeat.

Firſt, We take notice of the baſe or column; for it is ſaid of Joas, when he was proclaimed king [u], He ſtood upon the pillar: this is the true meaning of the Hebrew [x], the ſame turn of expreſſion already made uſe of in relation to Solomon, although in the tranſlation it is by a pillar; and, what is very remarkable, the text adds Camminſhphath, according to the manner, that is, as the kings were uſed to do in the temple, in their uſual place or throne. According to this, Joſiah, in order to renew the covenant [y], ſtood upon the pillar, according to the text; and this ſame pillar the king ſtood upon is, even in our tranſlation [z], called his place wherein he ſtood. It is plain to be ſeen this place was very fit and proper for the king, who appeared there at the head of the Iſraelites, in their court, in the midſt of which the ſacred hiſtorian has fixed the throne [a] before the altar [b]. But it will not be amiſs to obſerve, that the king did not ſtand or ſit there, when he came to the temple in the form of an humble ſupplicant to the God of Iſrael, or to aſk his council; for in this caſe, it ſeems, the kings were mixed and confounded among the crowd of their ſubjects. At leaſt it is ſaid of Hezekiah [c], after he had received the threatening letter of the Aſſyrian king, He went up into the houſe of the Lord, and ſpread it before the Lord, and prayed, &c. where no mention is made of his ſtanding upon the pillar. And we are the more apt to judge he did not, for that Jehoſophat before him [d], when, in fear of the Moabites and Ammonites, he had proclaimed a faſt, He ſtood in the congregation of Judah and Jeruſalem, in the houſe of the Lord, before the new court, and there prayed. There the king would not appear upon his throne, but went as near to the temple as he could, which, in our opinion, is intimated by his ſtanding before the new court; for we have ſeen this court was immediately next to the temple, whereas the court of the prieſts, properly ſo called, before which ſtood the throne, was further off. However, the throne was the ordinary ſeat upon all ſolemn occaſions, when the king appeared before the altar. And there alſo it was young Joaſh was ſeated, in all the pomp of a king, at his inauguration. So the hiſtorian ſays [e], The king ſtood upon his pillar at the entring in, and the princes and the trumpets, &c. Our tranſlation here again is ſtood at his pillar, but we do not chuſe to vary where the text is uniform.

Secondly, Upon this pillar was a ſort of alcove, or ſmall gallery, made, as we have hinted above, much in the ſame ſhape as our pulpits. This reſted on the central point of its convex ſide upon the pillar: There the king might either ſit or ſtand, and turn himſelf about to the temple, altar, or conſecration, as he had occaſion, as is obſerved of Solomon at the conſecration of the temple [f].

Thirdly, The Kior ſeems to have been covered, as is at preſent the throne of our kings, and for this reaſon it was

was called Muſac, which may be explained by canopy or cloth of ſtate, this third part denominating the two firſt.

But it is not eaſy to conceive, for what reaſon, to the idea of covering is joined that of Sabbath. The word Sabbath properly is reſt, and figuratively the ſolemn day on which one did reſt. If you take it in the firſt ſenſe, it muſt only be underſtood, that the Muſac covered the place where the king reſted, or ſat down (I), every one elſe ſtanding [g]: if you take it in the ſecond ſenſe, it may imply, that the Kior, or throne, was covered with the Muſac, or cloth of ſtate, only on the laſt day of the week, the day of reſt or ſabbath; and then it was laid up till the next ſabbath-day, unleſs ſome high feſtival intervened that required the king's preſence in the temple.

It may give ſome air of probability to this ſecond conjecture to take notice, that the Muſac was ſurely a very rich and valuable piece of work, ſince Ahaz made uſe of it with a deſign to glut the avarice of the king of Aſſyria, whom he had very imprudently called to his aid againſt the king of Damaſcus [h].

It will now be proper to ſhew the agreement between what we have been ſpeaking of and the King's entry without. In order to do this, it will be needful to conſider what is written in the New Teſtament concerning Solomon's Porch: Chriſt uſed to walk then in the temple [i], the apoſtles were all with one accord there alſo [k], and all the people ran together unto them in the porch that is called Solomon's [l]. Now that this king had built ſuch a porch Joſephus acknowledges [m], but placeth it eaſtward, which ſeems to be an error, unleſs he meant that it went up eaſtward, which is true in our opinion. However, the authority of St. Luke and St. John is ſufficient to make us conclude, that among the ſeveral porticoes the temple was adorned with in their time, one in particular was looked upon as Solomon's. A ſure ſign that it was ſuppoſed he had built one, which ſufficeth for our purpoſe.

We

(I) The ſeventy interpreters ſeem to have taken it in this ſenſe. For they tranſlate the covert of the ſabbath by τὸ θεμέλιον τῆς καθέδρας, the foundation of the chair, or ſeat.

We ſhall not here undertake to deſcribe exactly the ſtructure, nor even the ſituation, of that built by Solomon. It only appears in general, that it might reach or extend itſelf from the gate, where ended the terraſs by which the king went up from his palace to the temple, and that it was carried forwards in a ſtrait line as far as over-againſt the Muſac; but then to go to the Muſac joining to the wall of the court of prieſts, one muſt turn to the left, and that turning will preciſely be the Mebo, or King's entry. It is to be ſuppoſed, the porch from the gate Shallecheth, as far as this entry, might be a common paſſage for the uſe of the public as well as of the king; but from the turning to the throne, as has already been obſerved, it was the king's entry properly ſo called; which conſequently was adorned and inriched much more magnificently than the reſt. For which reaſon Ahaz made uſe of it, as well as of the covert of the ſabbath, to buy the aſſiſtance of the king of Aſſyria. Not that we are to think, that Ahaz deſtroyed the whole building, which was not neceſſary; but, as we read of Hezekiah [n], that he cut off the gold from the doors of the temple of the Lord, and from the pillars which he had overlaid, and gave it to the king of Aſſyria, now the ſame did Ahaz, Taking away a portion out of the houſe of the Lord [o], viz. The king's entry and covert for the ſabbath, juſt as Hezekiah did the reſt aboveſaid.

But what may be of more weight in this enquiry is, that this hypotheſis of the ſituation of the Muſac, or royal throne, will clear up a circumſtance in Joaſh's inauguration, otherwiſe very difficult to be underſtood [p]. It is well known, that that prince, by Jehoiada's means, having been proclaimed in the temple, the noiſe was heard by Athaliah in her palace; upon which ſhe in haſte ran to the temple by the terraſs-walk, which for her was the readieſt and ſhorteſt way (K). She went in at the gate Shallecheth, and croſſed what

(K) We confeſs no place of ſcripture gives the ſituation of this palace, ſo as to fix it exactly. However, it is probable, the ground it ſtood upon was called the middle city, as we have it in the margin of our tranſlation, though in the text, middle court (66). The truth of which is, what is written in the Hebrew calle what we have called the portico, or porch of Solomon, at leaſt that part of the court, where ſtood in arms the Levites, according to the directions of the high-prieſt [q]. They, ſeeing the queen, but having no particular orders concerning her, did let her advance, ſo that ſhe drew nearer; and coming as far as the King's entry, or directly over-againſt it, it is ſaid [r]. She looked, and behold the king ſtood upon his pillar at [s] the entering in, and the princes and trumpets by the king.——Then Athaliah rent her cloaths, and ſaid, Treaſon! Treaſon! Hereupon the high-prieſt, Jehoiada, ordered the commanding officers to have her forth of the ranges [t]; which, according as their armed Levites were poſted, could not more conveniently and with greater ſurety be done, than in opening the ranks towards the gate of Aſuppim, which was over-againſt the king's entry to the ſouth (L). By this gate then Athaliah was thruſt out of the called ketib, is העיר hahir, the city; but what is read according to the Maſorites, called keri, is חצר hazer, or chazer, a court. Now ſuppoſing, as is likely, the true reading to be hahir, this ſhews where the palace ſtood; for nothing could well be called the middle city, but what had weſtward the top of mount Sion, whereon was built the higher city, or city of David. And then at the foot of this mount, on a plain, or level ſurface to the eaſt, you meet with the palace of Solomon, though not in a low place; for to the north, a large valley lay betwixt it and the temple, ſtanding itſelf upon that other hillock called Moriah. Further it does appear (67), the palace ſtood in the eaſtern part of Jeruſalem, where was the court of the priſon, the water-gate, and the horſe-gate that led to the palace, whoſe front looked up to the temple, both places having an eaſy communication by the celebrated terraſs, or aſcent, of which before.

(L) Being divided in three parts, the Levites had three different poſts joining to one another (68); one third part was to guard the King's houſe, or apartment, next to the temple, ſouthward; another to be at the gate of Sur, or turning, which ſeems to be that of Aſuppim, whereat the king turned to his throne. It is indeed the temple immediately, and the better to hinder her from returning to her palace, they conducted her towards the fields, through the eaſtern gate of Jeruſalem, called, Miphkad, or priſon gate [u], then turning to the right by the corner [x], down to the horſe gate [y], eaſtward of the palace, thereabouts ſhe was killed. Soon after the high-prieſt brought the king from the temple to the palace, by the way of the gate of the guard (M), and thence through the great or high gate of that palace [z]. This we reckon is the true ſenſe; though ſome would underſtand by this high gate a gate of the temple; but there was no ſuch gate in the temple till the reign of Jotham, of whom it is ſaid in expreſs terms * He built the high gate of the houſe of the Lord; which is generally taken to be that towards the eaſt (N). But let this ſuffice, poſſibly have we launched out too indeed called by another name, but very like it in the Hebrew, viz. the gate of Sippim, where our verſion has doors or threſholds. The laſt was at the gate beyond the guard, or runners (69), which ſeems to be that of Shallecheth. For the king coming to the temple through this gate, any one may ſee, that there was their proper ſtation in the avenue. It is alſo called the gate of foundation, becauſe of the projecture there made with the terraſs, as has been obſerved.

(67) Nehem. iii. 25.——28. Conf. 2 Kings xi. 16. & 2 Chron. xxiii. 15. (68) See 2 Kings xi. 5. &c. 2 Chron. xxiii. 4. &c.

(M) So ſays the firſt of the ſacred hiſtorians (70), meaning, as we take it, the gate that before has been called the gate beyond the guard, viz. Shallecheth, or ſouth-weſtern gate. But if one had rather, that the gate of the guard here, which is ſomewhat different from the other, ſhould ſignify the ſame with the high gate in Chronicles, where the guard of the king's houſe ſtood; this will make no variation in the main; for as it is rightly ſuppoſed to have been in the front of the palace, it was the firſt gate they met with coming from the LORD's to the King's houſe over the terraſs, or aſcent.

(N) This we do remark, becauſe Ezekiel (71) ſpeaks of the higher gate that lieth toward the north, the ſame, it ſeems, with that which Jeremy (72) calls the high gate of Benjamin, which was בבות bebeth in, or by, the houſe of the LORD.

too far, and ventured upon too many conjectures; but we hope the reader will do us the juſtice to acknowledge we have kept our word, in carefully diſtinguiſhing between probable opinions and things of greater certainty.

I beg leave to conclude the whole with one remark. It is allowed, that the main ſcope of the ſacred writings was not ſo much to ſatisfy our vain curioſity, as to inſpire us with the love of all chriſtian virtues; and therefore, though we may juſtly expect that every thing which relates to this latter, which is the eſſential of religion, ſhould be delivered with all poſſible clearneſs, it would be abſurd to expect the ſame ſatisfaction about the former. Thoſe leſs important points, many of which are well worth enquiring after, make a branch of chriſtian philology, in which every man, being forced to ſupply the want of evidence with probable conjectures, is intitled to differ from others, whenever he thinks his own better grounded. But though in points, like this I have been upon, it be almoſt lawful to err, yet thoſe are more excuſable who keep a conſtant regard to the ſacred original above all things, than thoſe who manifeſtly depart from it, to follow their own fancies, or the fabulous accounts of the Jews. Now, as I have drawn the greateſt part of my light from the former, I am ſenſible, that thoſe who have been converſant with all the pompous deſcriptions we have extant, will be ſurpriſed to find this of mine come ſo vaſtly ſhort of the boaſted magnificence of that ſacred building. But here I deſire it may be remembered, that as this was deſigned to contain no more than could be met with, or fairly deduced from the ſacred writings, ſo the reader will at leaſt reap this benefit from it, that he will now be better able to judge what is, or is not, authentic in other plans of this ſtructure, than he could have been without it.

A Deſcription of JERUSALEM.

AFTER the account we have given of the holy city's great ornament, the Temple of SOLOMON, we have thought it would not be unacceptable, for a more comprehenſive view of the whole, to ſubjoin a deſcription of the city itſelf, according to the ſacred hiſtorians.

IT is a general ſuppoſition, though, as we preſume, without any ſolid argument to ſupport it, that Melchiſedek's Salem ſtood in the ſame place, where afterwards was built built the city, the ſubject of our preſent enquiry (A). We will not, at this time undertake to decide the queſtion, but ſhall only take notice of the habitations of the Canaanites, who dwelt here and in the adjacent parts, being called Jebus and Jebuſi [a]. David having taken from them the mountain, upon the top of which was their ſtrong hold, made it his place of reſidence [b], and this is commonly called Zion, or the city of David [c]. Under Solomon the name of Jeruſalem either firſt began, or firſt got the better of the other; but there being no ſure reaſon aſſigned for this, nor any determined ſignification affixed to the name (B), we will dwell no longer upon theſe uncertainties, but enter into the matter in hand, by conſidering Jeruſalem.

Its Origin and Names.

In

[a] Joſh. xv. 8. xviii. 28. Jud. xv. 10. [b] 2 Sam. v. 7. 9. [c] Pſ. xlviii. & paſſ. 1 Chron. xi. 5.

(A) What is generally alledged, that the tabernacle was in Salem (1), proves only, that it was the ſhortened or abridged name of that city, like that of Solyma. Some even have ſaid Solymus for Hieroſolymitanus (2).

Solymo nigrantem pulvere fratrem.

(B) ירושלים, according to the pronunciation of Maſorites, Jerouſhalaim; but to that of the Chaldee, in holy writ, Jerouſhelem; which is much the ſame as the Greek ἱερουσαλημ, and our Jeruſalem. This word, in all likelihood, is compounded and derived from Shalem, or Shalum, peace; and, as ſeveral are of opinion, from jarah, to fear; or raah, to ſee; or jaraſh, to inherit or poſſeſs; or from Jerus, altered from Jebus, by a mutation of letters. We read in Joſephus (3), that by ſome it was thought Homer had called this city Solyma; and that truly the Temple was called, in Hebrew, Solyma, i. e. ſafety or ſecurity. St. Jerom lays this to the Jewiſh hiſtorian's charge in very hard words (4); and, as it ſeems, with ſome juſt ground. For, in another place, the ſame hiſtorian (5) tells us, that Melchiſedec was the firſt that built the temple, το ἱερον; and that after he had built it, he called it ἱεροσολυμα, which was before named σολυμα: where that ſtrange etymology is again ſeen; not to mention other groſs errors, which give us room to think this paſſage is very much falſified (6). This may have happened to ſeveral others, which, it is to be hoped, will be reſtored by Mr. Whiſton, in the tranſlation he intends to publiſh.

Holineſs.

In regard to its holineſs. We muſt not imagine this attribute has been given to it by the rabbies only, or by the legend of the ſhekels, which is Jeruſalem the holy [d]. Iſaiah [e] tells us, that the Iſraelites called themſelves of the holy city. Nehemiah twice qualifies it by that title [f], all which doth ſufficiently ſhew it was generally called ſo. In the new teſtament [g] the ſame title is ſeveral times given to it. Beſides, it is well known that in the Pſalms it bears the name of City of God [h]; in the Prophets [i] we read, that it ſhall be called the Throne of the Lord; our Saviour himſelf calls it the City of the great king [k], as being hallowed and conſecrated in a particular manner by God's reſidence in the temple. The rabbies [l] add, that there was a penalty forbidding the leaving a dead corpſe in it the ſpace of a night, and that the importation of dead mens bones was unlawful; notwithſtanding this, in it were contained the tombs of the royal family [m]. It is further added by the rabbies, that within its walls were not to be ſeen gardens, trees, dung, or lime-kilns, or even cocks. In it no houſes were to be let; and this, I think, means only, that the inhabitants were obliged to exerciſe hoſpitality by entertaining their brethren, on whom it was incumbent to reſort from all parts to Jeruſalem on the days of the great feſtivals (C).

Extent.

It is no eaſy matter preciſely to determine the extent of this city in its different changes. Its moſt antient ſtate of perfection was under the flouriſhing reign of its founder's ſucceſſor, I mean Solomon; in whoſe time this city, before embelliſhed by his father David, appeared in its greateſt luſtre and beauty, and there is no great likelihood, that it was was enlarged by thoſe that came after him. The general and indeterminate deſcriptions, to be found in the authors of thoſe times, will not permit us, as we have juſt now hinted, to ſettle with any exactneſs the bounds of it. We will, however, venture to ſuppoſe its circumference, at firſt, to have been about ſeven or eight ſtadia, or a Roman mile. It was certainly twice, or probably three, times, as large under Solomon. After the captivity, this city being rebuilt, took up much the ſame ſpace as before; as may be gathered from Nehemiah's [n] deſcription of the ruins of the city, and its condition after it was repaired. This deſcription of Nehemiah we ſhall take particular notice of, and at the ſame time ſhall not let that of Joſephus [o] paſs unheeded. According to this hiſtorian, the whole circumference of Jeruſalem was 33 ſtadia [p], which is about four miles and 125 paces. But Hecateus, who has deſcribed it ſuch as it was in his time, under Ptolemy Lagus [q], gives it no leſs than 50 ſtadia *, probably including the outparts, which properly did not belong to it; for there is no reaſon to believe, that there was any conſiderable decreaſe, from the time of Hecateus to that of Joſephus, ſo that we muſt ſtand to the meaſure of the laſt of theſe: we will only add, that Hecateus's aſſertion, that there was in Jeruſalem one hundred and twenty thouſand inhabitants, is very probable (D).

Situation. THE ſituation of this capital city of Judæa has always been extremely advantageous. The agreeable variety of riſing

(D) His words are, ἡν οικεσιμεν ανθροπων περι δωδεκα μυριαδες, twelve myriads; now a myriad is 10,000; and 120,000 inhabitants may ſeem rather too few for ſuch an extent as had Jeruſalem of four miles. We ſee that in the ſiege periſhed, according to Joſephus (8), 1,100,000 men, μυριαδες ἑκαϛον και δεκα, beſides 97,000 taken priſoners during the war; and that this may gain more credit Joſephus adds, as an undoubted proof, that in Cteſias's enrollment on Eaſter-day were reckoned 255,600 lambs. Now there was not leſs than ten men to each lamb; ſo that the number of thoſe that were purified according to the law, beſides the reſt, muſt have been two millions, five hundred and fifty-ſix thouſand.

rising grounds with which it was encompassed [r], the fruitful meadows that lay between, interspersed with clear rivulets and wholesome streams; the hills on which it stood, which rose gradually one behind another, and looked like a natural amphitheatre, made up as pleasing and delightful a prospect as can well be conceived.

Of these hills the two largest, Zion and Acra, were directly opposite to each other; on Morija, whose compass might be about three quarters of a mile, Solomon built the temple. Of the two first we will take a more distinct view, beginning by mount Zion.

This hill, as has already been shewn [t], bounded to the south the whole circumference, and reached from west to east. The western side was highest, and bounded by the valley of Hinnom (E) as the eastern by that of Jehoshaphat [u], which, it is thought, joined the other towards the south [w]. Here were several springs, particularly that of Gihon [x], or Shiloh [y] which ran very plentifully with exceeding

(E) גיאהנם Ge-hinnom, so it is called (9) in Joshua, where Hinnom is a man's name. In another place (10) it is the valley of the sons, or children, of Hinnom; and it is said, that in this valley was Topeth, where the children were made to pass through the fire in honour to Moloch. Upon this account, it is thought this place took its name from the tears the children shed whilst burning, and from the noise of the drums which were kept beating, in order to drown their shrieks. But the text in Joshua shews, that the valley did bear this name long before it was put to such an use, if ever it was put to it at all. At least, if we believe Maimon, and other rabbies, the children were made to pass through the flame only, as being, by that ceremony, consecrated to the idol (11). However, in later times, the carrion was thrown into this valley (12); and, when it did not waste away fast enough, frequently burnt. This has given room to fix up the word Geenna, (which represents in Greek and Latin the Hebrew word) the notion of hell-fire (13).

ceeding good water (F). To the north, Zion, had another valley, that lined it from one end to the other, named by Joſephus [z] the valley of the Cheeſemongers; probably the ſame as that diſtinguiſhed in Zephaniah [a] by the epithet of the Mactheſh (G), tranſlated by the Septuagint την κατακεκομμενην, that was cut into or made hollow (H).

(F) Πηγην γλυκειαν τε και πολλην are the words of Joſephus (18). Others have thought, that Shiloh was a rivulet of Gihon, and it is true, that that word ſignifies ſent, according to the etymology given of it in the goſpel (19); where it is alſo called pool.

(G) Which word ſignifies a morter, or any hollow thing. Thus the מכתש בלחי, which ſo ſeaſonably refreſhed thirſt, is univerſally rendered the hollow of the rock lechi, ſo called from its reſemblance to a jaw-bone, or from the ſlaughter he had made with it there (20).

(H) In the ſame manner, 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, habbor, (in our tranſlation a pit, in which Benajah, in time of ſnow, ſlew a lion) litterally the pit, was probably a known place, ſo named from its cavity and hollowneſs, and may very well be the deep valley here mentioned. What ſeems to favour this conjecture is, that Benajah was one of David's mighty men, or captains. Now, it is very poſſible, that he being upon duty at the gate of the city of David on mount Zion, and hearing in the valley, at the foot of the palace, the roaring of a lion, whom want of food, in time of ſnow, had brought thither, deſirous of ſignalizing himſelf by ſo ſingular an action, immediately went down, encountered, and deſtroyed the hungry rapacious beaſt.

(I) This name ſeems to be borrowed from the Greek ἄκρα, an eminence; and ſometimes a citadel or fortreſs (21). It is well known, that there was one built upon this hill by Antiochus, and afterwards laid even to the ground by Simon (22). And to this reaſon it muſt be aſcribed, that Acra has been ſince diſtinguiſhed by that name. Notwithſtanding the Targum (23) makes ſometimes uſe of this expreſſion, the Acra; that is, the citadel of Zion.

as Joſephus ſays; and we cannot give a better idea of theſe two hills, nor of the valley between them, than he who had ſo often ſeen them. According to this hiſtorian [c], Jeruſalem was built upon the two hills, Zion and Acra, directly oppoſite one to another, and ſeparated by the valley of the cheeſemongers. The firſt was higher, and its length formed a much ſtraiter line than the ſecond. Upon it, that is Zion, ſtood the high city, in the author's time called the high market-place. The lower city ſtood upon Acra, but before that bore other names, as hath been already obſerved in the deſcription of the temple [d].

Wards. LET us now examine theſe mountains, in relation to their different wards or quarters, ſtreets, and public places, as well as palaces, and moſt remarkable buildings.

THE principal quarter was called the city of David [e], on the top of mount Zion, towards the weſt. This was a fortification which encloſed that king's palace; and it is likely, that near this, afterwards, ſtood that of Herod, which ſerved as a citadel [f]. To the weſt of the fort was מצפה Mizpah, or Maſpha, according as the Hebrew word is differently pronounced; but this is not the knotty part of the queſtion: the difficulty would be to prove, that Mizpah was a part of Jeruſalem, it being ſure, that near it was a ſmall town that bore that name [g]. Theſe are the words of Nehemiah [h], Shallum of Cothozeh, ruler of the פלך Pelec of Mizpah, repaired the gate of the fountain. Now Pelec in Hebrew is a ſtaff [i], and ſo may ſignify a diſtrict, ward, or quarter, ſubject to a particular juriſdiction or inſpection, in the ſame manner as שבט Shebet, a rod, ſignifies a tribe. The Chaldee dialect makes uſe of Pelac, and פלחא Pileca, in the ſame ſenſe as is here given to Pelec. The Arabians give this name, which they pronounce Felec, to a ſphere; ſo that it would be a pretty good tranſlation of παροικια Pariſh, as it denotes the neighbourhood round about. The Septuagint tranſlate it here part, or portion; but every where elſe in this chapter it is a περιχωρος circumference of land, a diſtrict of more or leſs extent. The Latin word Vicus bears the ſame ſenſe, and is made uſe of in the Vulgate; though in this place, ſpeaking of Mizpah, that tranſlation has Pagus, and in another place Pars; ſo uncertain it is to truſt to tranſlations, how uſeful ſoever they may be when compared together. However, I ſhall venture to ſay, that Mizpah was one of the quarters of Jeruſalem, and that it was divided into two parts; that we are ſpeaking of to the weſt, and the other, where ſtood the arſenal, and where Ezer was ruler [k], to the eaſt of the fortreſs.

ANOTHER quarter, divided into two parts, bears the name of Jeruſalem [l], which had two rulers, each of half a quarter. This is the part which Joſephus [m] calls the City, with reſpect to the citadel, and both together made the upper city. There were three other quarters, which, it ſeems, might be looked for in Acra, viz. Bethakerem, Bethzur, and Keilah.

Streets. As for the Streets, in Hebrew חוצות Hhouzoth [n], all we know concerning thoſe of Jeruſalem, at that time, is, that as there was one bearing the name of Haophim, i. e. Baker's-ſtreet [o]; ſo there might be others which bore the names of ſome other trades; thus the valley, in Joſephus's time, was callsd Tyropeon [p].

Places. רחוב REHOB properly is an open place (K); in the Rehoboth, according to Ezekiel [q], were built the high places. In the book of Eſther [r], an officer of the king of Perſia goes out to Mordecai in the Rehob of the town, over-againſt the gate of the palace, which ſeems to have been made uſe of by the courtiers to walk in. In the Rehob of Jeruſalem [s] Ezekiah aſſembled his generals, and made a ſpeech to them. The people were gathered together by Ezra [t] in a Rehob of the temple, and the prieſts and levites by Ezekiah [u] in the eaſtern Rehob: we muſt ſuppoſe theſe two to have been parts of the vacant ſpace that ſurrounded the courts of the temple. Laſtly, there was

was was a Rehob near the water-gate [w], which muſt have been vaſtly large, ſince it contained all the people of both ſexes, that flocked thither from all parts, in order to hear Ezra read the law, upon a ſcaffold, or ſtage, erected upon this occaſion at one end of the place, in ſuch a manner that Ezra had the whole aſſembly facing him.

If we have not yet taken notice of מלוא Millo, it is becauſe we do not find it in ſcripture diſtinguiſhed by any of the abovementioned names, or indeed by any other name than Millo. When David took from the Jebuſites the top of mount Zion, he then built round about from Millo and inwards, ſays the text of Samuel [x]; where it is eaſy to underſtand a caſtle was built on this mount, ſurrounded with ſtrong walls, and probably of a circular form. Now this building had on the eaſt what is called Millo, and on the other ſides was bounded by the hill itſelf; inſomuch, that the city of David was within mount Zion on the north, weſt, and ſouth, but was bordered eaſtwards by Millo (L). Although it is ſaid in the text [y] Solomon built [w] Nehem. viii. 1. 4. Add the Rehob of the gate Ephraim, ibid. 16. [x] 2 Sam. v. 9. Coll. 1 Chron. xi. 8. [y] Vid. 1 Kings x. 15, 24, & xi. 27.

(L) Without doubt Millo doth ſignify ſomething either full, or to be filled; at leaſt this may be deduced from the two Hebrew words that come neareſt to it, Melo fullneſs, and Miluah, beazel, or collet, in which are inchaſed precious ſtones. So Moſes, receiving orders about the breaſt-plate, is bid to fill the beazel, Miluath, with a ſtone (24), that the ſtones ſhall be ſet in gold in their encloſings (25), and that they were incloſed in ouches of gold in their incloſings, bemilluotham (26). So then Millo was ſomething filled up; and this we are very ready to allow, for, to make it fit for the uſe we have been ſpeaking of, it was required, that in ſome places this ſpot of ground ſhould be made level, and in others filled up, in order to its being uniform and of a piece. This derivation ſurely favours our opinion more than any other; and we might add to this, that it is very likely this was the place where afterwards ſtood the Xyſtus (27), a large place where the athlets did exerciſe. And as ſuch a place was alſo called περίδρομις, from the runnings there round about, it hath been apprehended an Hippodrome was there for horſe-races; which is not improbable. However, it, yet the context ſhews, that he only made an end of it, or repaired it; and as much did Hezekiah in his time [z]. Who the firſt was that built it, we do not know, but it ſeems to have been a work of the Jebuſites, whoſe government was almoſt a democracy like that at Athens.

FOR this reaſon, and from what is ſaid in ſcripture, there would be no abſurdity in ſuppoſing it to have been a ſpacious open place, ſuch as the Campus Martius at Rome, where the people met for their recreation, on feſtival and other rejoicing days, or about private or public affairs. It may be placed at the foot of the city of David, going to the valley between Zion and Acra, in the centre of the whole circumference of Jeruſalem. Others imagine it to be a ſtreet, beginning at the ſteps of the city of David, and reaching as far as Acra, or Morijah; or elſe a wall along the valley between the two hills; and laſtly, the valley itſelf. But this ſeems leſs probable than what we at firſt hinted.

Buildings. LET us next viſit the public buildings in Zion: The firſt that offers itſelf is the palace of king David, on the top of the mount in the midſt of a fortreſs [a]. There was a flight of ſteps to go up to it [b]; to the north of theſe ſteps, or ſtairs, ſtood the tomb of David, of which Joſephus tells many wonderful ſtories at the end of the ſeventh book of his antiquities. At the bottom of the ſteps was the houſe of the Mighty [c]. This, in my opinion, ſerved as a guard-houſe to the palace, or at leaſt was the ſtation of ſome chief commanders, without whoſe leave no one was permitted to go up to the houſe; ſuch as we ſuppoſe the thirty-one worthies [d], among which was Uriah the Hittite.

NEXT was the Arſenal, or Armoury [e], at the turning of the wall [f], in Hebrew called Mikzoah (M); but the Arſe-

However, it is very much reſembling what we have ſaid of Millo, it may alſo be, that the firſt inhabitants may have given it this name from its being a place of general concourſe, and ſo filled up with numbers of people of all ſorts.

(M) מקצע, is properly the opening of an angle, which conſequently forms a ſpace; but פנה Pinnah is the point of an angle, or, as it is called by artiſts, a ſalliant angle; ſo the wall had a turning out here, and this juſtifies the tranſlation; and any one may

Arſenal itſelf, by a compendious expreſſion, or way of ſpeaking, was called הנשק Hanneſhek, for Neſhek is a weapon, or arms. The word baith, a houſe, muſt therefore be underſtood.

NOT far from the Arſenal, and more towards the middle of the city was, if not the palace of the high-prieſt, at leaſt a pontifical palace, then in the poſſeſſion of Eliaſib [g]. Nehemiah mentions it only occaſionally, when he ſpeaks of the repairs of the walls of the city; but even from the little that is ſaid of it, we may gather that it was a ſpacious building. Lower, at a very little diſtance, we find the houſe of Azariah, a man of diſtinction of the tribe of Benjamin *. But it is time to come to the Palace or Palaces.

AND here the books of Kings do indeed mention three houſes built by Solomon; the firſt they call the houſe where he dwelt [h]; the ſecond, the houſe of the foreſt of Lebanon [i], and the third was, that which he made for Pharaoh's daughter [k]; but this laſt I take to have been only a ſpacious apartment (N) added to the firſt houſe, whoſe ſituation it is not very difficult to fix. For, on one ſide, this palace was almoſt parallel to the water-gate [l], and on the other, there was a communication between it and the temple, by means of the terras built by Solomon over the valley [m]. I am apt to think, that the ſecond was a ſummer-retirement, ſince we have it upon record that Solomon built it in the foreſt [n]. But yet I would not contradict thoſe who are of opinion, that it was only another wing, or apartment of the palace, which very probably took its name may ſee that it formed a corner, or open place, in the interior angle. For this reaſon, ſuch an opening in Ezekiel's temple is called Mikzoah; Behold, ſays he (28), in every מקצע corner of the court there was a court.

(N) Beth is often taken in that ſenſe, as when Rebekah runs to her mother's beth (29), apartment, or lodging; and ſo is the houſe of the women (30) to be underſtood in the book of Eſther; the ſaid houſe probably not being ſeparate from the king's, but part of it.

from the cedars of Lebanon, that may be ſuppoſed to have been the chief material employed in it †.

THE following conſideration adds a great deal of weight to this ſide of the queſtion, viz. That in this houſe [o] were placed the targets and ſhields of beaten gold; for the diſtance from Lebanon to Jeruſalem would have made it very troubleſome to bring them up whenever they were wanted, beſides the riſk of being taken, to which ſuch coſtly armour would have been expoſed by the way; and indeed they were carried away by Shiſhak when he came up againſt the city [p].

NOT far from this palace, I think, was the Mattara, tranſlated Priſon [q]; but if it was one, it was only like the Tower of London, or like our courts of law, or even the main corps-de-guarde at the avenues of the palace. For in the court of this Mattara Jeremiah was confined; but at the ſame time was allowed a good deal of liberty, ſince it was here he made the purchaſe of an eſtate in preſence of ſeveral witneſſes who ſigned the deed of agreement, and of all the Jews that lived there [r]. We read moreover [s], that afterwards the prophet was taken as he went out of Jeruſalem by the gate of Benjamin, and put in priſon (O) in the houſe of Jonathan the ſcribe, from whence, by Zedekiah's order, he was transferred to the Mattara, where he propheſied in the hearing of all the people. For this, at the requeſt of ſome of the great men, he was thrown into a dungeon full of ſoil, where, ſinking into the mire, and in want of all things, he would ſoon have periſhed, had not the king, at the entreaty of a pious Ethiopian proſelyte, given order for his being taken out again. The pro-

(O) It is called בית האסור Beth haeſour, houſe of binding; otherwiſe it is called Beth בלא kele (31), the houſe of detaining; and in ſuch a houſe we ſee Micaiah the prophet (32), a king of Iſrael named Hoſhea (33) and the king of Juda Jehoiachin (34); and this place did bear ſo fruitful an aſpect, as to make the prophet think it would ſoon cauſe his death (35).

ALL this ſufficiently ſhews the Mattara to have been different from a priſon commonly ſo called. This appears clearly enough; but it is not ſo eaſy to determine the ſituation of this building, although it ſeems Nehemiah has undertaken to deſcribe it exactly; and if to us he does not appear to have ſo well ſucceeded in it, the fault lies neither at his door, nor at that of the language he wrote in, but to its being a dead language, many expreſſions of which are not ſo familiar to us as to be perfectly intelligible. However, Nehemiah, as I underſtand him, ſays [w], "That "Palal repaired the wall of Jeruſalem, over-againſt the "turning of the wall, and the tower belonging to the "king's houſe, the high tower (P) that was by the court "of the Mattara."

HERE are two diſtinct indications of the reparations made by Palal in the wall; one near the turning of the wall going up to the water-gate, the other near the adjoining tower; and the ſituation of this tower is ſpecified as well by its diſtinguiſhing height, as by its relation to the palace, and the neighbourhood of the court in queſtion. So that to fix this to a point, we muſt look upon theſe buildings as being within the verge of the court, and under the immediate cognizance of king Solomon and his ſucceſſors. Men were there entirely under their protection, neither could they be meddled with without the king's expreſs

[u] Ibid. 28. [w] Ubi ſup. iii. 25.

(P) In our tranſlation this is called the tower which lieth out from the king's high houſe. In Hebrew that epithet, the high, is more properly conſtrued, we ſhould think, with the word tower. The Septuagint has accordingly ἀνώλερος, which neceſſarily refers to πυργος, not οἶκος, in their text. Beſides, to lie out or project from a thing, according to the letter, is in the ſenſe, as we expreſs it, belonging to the ſame (36). But though it be well ſuſceptible of this ſenſe, when joined to that ſequel of the king's houſe, this phraſe may well admit of another ſignification, when without it; and this ſignification we then take to be that of a great extent (37); ſo as the Mattara, its court included, being called by the name of this high tower, that ſet it off exceedingly, was, it ſeems, a long ſeries of buildings and walls, diſtant about fifty paces on the weſt ſide of the water-gate.

expreſs orders; although it was by their orders only, they were reſtrained within the bounds of theſe buildings.

We are now come to buildings much leſs remarkable for their dignity, magnificence, or embelliſhments; but whoſe ſituation cannot well be omitted in the particular deſcription we are about; I mean the ſtation or poſt of the Nethinims [x]: It is ſaid indeed they dwelt in Ophel, eaſtward, near the valley; but their מושב Moſhab, or dwelling, ſhould not, we preſume, be confounded with their houſe בית Beth, or, as in our verſion, their place. Then followed the hall, or place of the merchants or retailers, Haroſhelim [y], who, I believe, are the ſame as the Collybiſtæ, or money-changers [z], a ſort of dealers very uſeful at the gate of the temple, where abundance of ſtrangers reſorted from all parts. But northward ſtood the houſe of the governor, ſuppoſed by ſome to be Nehemiah, and named in Hebrew Kiſſe-pakhath. This houſe was in Acra, near the gate of Ephraim. Our tranſlation has the throne of the governor, and it might be called his court; it was like the Roman Prætorium, and had in it a tribunal, or a ſeat, which properly is what is meant by the Hebrew כסא Kiſſe [a]. This too is the primitive ſignification of throne in Greek, from whence that word in our languague is derived.

Little is ſaid concerning the walls of the city; but that little which is ſaid we will here put together: 'Tis well known, after David had taken the ſtrong hold of [b] Zion, he called it the city of David, and dwelt in that fort (Q), having built round about from Millo and inward [c]. Afterwards Solomon built the wall of Jeruſalem [d], which took in all

(Q) When David beſieged Zion, the Jebuſites ſaid, "Except "he took away the blind and the lame, he ſhould not come in-"to the fort." The ſenſe of which is not, to be ſure, the moſt obvious at firſt reading; yet, when well conſidered, it ſeems to be, This fort is ſo ſtrong of itſelf, that for its defence, lame and blind men are ſufficient. And to this ſtrength of the place it is owing, that the king promiſed to make chief or captain the man that would drive theſe people into the ditch (38).

all the eaſtern part at leaſt: However, the king of Iſrael brake down the wall of Jeruſalem, from the gate of Ephraim unto the corner gate [e]. This is the wall on the north of Acra, from eaſt to weſt, according to the poſition of the gates, as we ſhall ſee hereafter; and truly although a broad wall was built there [f], it was always the weak ſide of Jeruſalem (R).

Of Jotham we read, On the wall of Ophel he built much; this lay to the ſouth-eaſt. Of Hezekiah, He ſtrengthened himſelf, and built up all the wall that was broken, (viz. by Joaſh as above) and another wall without [g]. So alſo of Manaſſeh, He built a wall without the city of David, on the weſt ſide of Gihon, in the valley even to the entering in at the fiſh-gate, and compaſſed about Ophel [h]. Here you have almoſt the whole circuit of Jeruſalem, from ſouth to north by weſt, and to the ſouth-eaſt. Now to one of theſe latter buildings the prophet ſeems to allude, when ſpeaking of the breaches of the city of David, he adds, the houſes of Jeruſalem were broken down to fortify the walls [i]; though it may be alſo taken for a prophecy of the calamitous times that were to follow. Laſtly, it is reported, that when the city was broken up by the Chaldees [k], the ſoldiers fled by the two walls by the way of the king's garden, which was on the ſouth [l], one of theſe walls being built by David or Solomon, adjoining immediately to the city; and the other, the new one without, by Hezekiah or Manaſſeh. We read alſo the army of the Chaldees brake down the wall of Jeruſalem round about [m], which was left till Nehemiah's [n] time with open breaches on every ſide.

In antient Jeruſalem the gates, שערים Shaharim, were Gates.

Now as to that which is called of the valley, the entrance was on the weſt: By this gate Nehemiah went out of the city, in order to viſit the ruins of Jeruſalem; he likewiſe placed himſelf upon this gate, or upon the wall cloſe to it, when he made the dedication of the rebuilding of Jeruſalem, by a double proceſſion of the people, one half going to the right, or ſouth, the other to the left, or north, in order to come by the eaſt to the temple. As they did not go through this gate, from which they ſet out, no mention is made of it in the account given of the places through which the proceſſions paſſed [p], but only where the particulars are given of the repairing the walls and gates of Jeruſalem [q]. Neither in this account of the proceſſions is the horſe-gate mentioned, probably, becauſe the rubbiſh ſtopped up the paſſage, which was the reaſon that they turned to the left to go to the temple. This gate is placed to the eaſt by Jeremiah [r], and it was through it that Athaliah went from the temple to the palace [s]: But we muſt confeſs, it is not ſo eaſy to aſſign the cauſe for which the dung-gate is omitted in this account: However, it is ſpoken of in the re-building of the wall; and when Nehemiah did view the ruins, it is again mentioned by the name of the dung-port *.

As to the water-gate turning to the eaſt [t], it is likely, that it anſwered the ſouthern part of the palace, by the place or ſquare in which Ezra read the law to all the people [u].

THE priſon-gate is in Hebrew Miphkad [w]. This word, which is kept in the tranſlation, ſignifies viſitation, and by by deduction, judgment, correction, ward, priſon. It is alſo called the gate of Mattara (S), in our tranſlation priſon-gate [x]. It ſtood eaſtward of the palace and city both.

It is plain, the gate of Ephraim took its name from its joining the highway leading to that tribe. This may ſerve to aſcertain the truth of the ſituation we have given of the city.

The ſheep-gate furniſhes us with means of explaining the word προβατικη, in the goſpel according to St. John [y], where our tranſlation has, there was a pool near the ſheep-market, in the text, and gate in the margin, viz. αγορα, or πυλη. And the tranſlation in the text ſeems the moſt probable; for a ſheep-market was there near the gate of the ſame name, and ſeems to have been between the gate and the pool, that of Bethesda, on the north-eaſt of the temple (T).

Lastly, the fiſh-gate [z] did anſwer to one afterwards built in the new city, and call'd the gate of Joppe, a ſea-port on the Mediterranean.

These, we think, are all the gates of Jeruſalem, either as it ſtood before the captivity, or as, after the return

(S) Of the Mattarah itſelf we ſpoke above, as pretty near the palace that lay northward of it: And what ſeems to have given the name of either Mattarah or Miphkad to this gate is, that thoſe words well agree in their general notions; which reaſon appears to us more likely, than that the great Sanhedrim had there its ordinary ſittings, it being at leaſt dubious whether at that time this court had any juriſdiction, or even exiſted. Yet we do not deny, but that courts of juſtice were kept at the gates (41), and therefore priſons might be there alſo, and houſes of correction beſides.

(T) Though Joſephus does not mention it by name yet he (42) places a pool there, and thereabouts. Mr. Maundrel found a large empty baſon, of which he gives the following deſcription (43). "It is 120 paces long, 40 broad, and at leaſt eight deep, "but void of water. At its weſt end it diſcovers ſome old arches, "now dammed up: Theſe ſome will have to be the five porches "in which ſat that multitude of lame, &c. The pool is contiguous on one ſide to St. Stephen's gate, on the other to the "area of the temple."

turn from it, it was repaired by Nehemiah. It cannot be denied, but a few others ſeem to be mentioned in that ſpace of time; but we take them to be only different names given to thoſe already mentioned. And firſt, the corner-gate [a], which, in our opinion, muſt be the ſame with the old-gate, as may be gathered from Jeremiah's occaſionally giving the circuit of Jeruſalem from the north-eaſt, over-againſt the temple, [i. e. from the tower of Hananeel] unto the gate of the corner (U), going along to the north-weſt, where ſtood the hills Gareb and Goath (X), afterwards called Golgotha, or Calvary. Then, according

(U) Although the tranſlation here ſomewhat differs from that above, the word in both places in the original is Happinah. It is true in Zechariah it is read Happinim, as if one ſhould ſay the corners, but the ſenſe is the ſame if (44) tranſlated the corner. Laſtly, this our tranſlation, in the parallel to Kings, anſwers (45) the Hebrew word Happoneh, where the margin has the gate of it that looketh; which is not eaſy to be underſtood, unleſs, by ſuppoſing it to be an elliptical expreſſion, the ſenſe is made up by what we find added elſewhere (46), viz. Zaphonah to the north, which is a true indication of the ſaid gate: However, it may be thought this various reading is owing to the careleſſineſs of the tranſcriber, as it ſeems may be collected from the Septuagint's having here πύλης γωνίας, corner gate; yet notice ſhould be taken, that this gate did lie towards the σκόπος. By this name was called (47), not only the eminence, (from whence coming from the north one firſt diſcovered Jeruſalem) but alſo the plain next to the city on that ſide: Now that in Hebrew would be Phoneh, or Haphoneh, which we leave to our reader's conſideration.

(X) As the word גלעתה, which according to the Maſoreth's pointing is read Goath, may as well, if not better, be pronounced either Goatha or Gotha; and as the word גל, admitting of two ſounds in the compoſition of known names, Galhed and Gilhad, does as naturally ſound Gol; we ſhould think the etymology of Golgotha is found to our hand, and its ſignification moſt plain, viz. the heap of Gotha: However, the great likeneſs the ſound of this ſame word Golgotha had to Gagultha, in Syriac, (which dialect is called Hebrew in the goſpel (48), becauſe a mixture of both was what was generally ſpoken at Jeruſalem) it ſeems to have been commonly underſtood, as having a near relation to Gulgaltha (49),

(44) See above. (45) 2 Chron. xxv. 23. (46) Ezek. viii. 3. (47) Vide Joſeph. de Bell Jud. v. 2, 1216. (48) John xix. 17.

cording to the directions in the prophet, one turns towards the ſouth, through the valley of Hinnom, and the ſouth-eaſt fields called the fuller's fields, unto the corner of the horſe-gate to the eaſt [b]: So alſo in Zachariah [c], All the land ſhall be as a plain to Rimmon, ſouth of Jeruſalem, and inhabited from Benjamin's gate (Y) unto the firſt gate unto the corner-gate, and from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's wine-preſſes. Here firſt you have Jeruſalem, on the ſouth, a hilly country there, to be turned into a plain; which is eaſily apprehended to be figuratively ſpoken. But further, the northern ſide is traced here from a gate going to the neighbour tribe of Benjamin [d] to the old gate, here called the firſt; the following words unto the corner-gate being an explanation of the former unto the firſt-gate: So you go up to the eaſt by the tower there, returning to the ſouth, where was the royal garden. Another gate is mentioned in Jeremiah [e], where he is to go forth unto the valley of the ſon of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the eaſt-gate, but ſhould be rather the brick-gate (Z), or of the brick-bats, it

(49), a ſcull, and therefore well expounded by κρανίου τόπος (50), which from the Latin Calvaria, a ſcull, is called in our language Calvary. Mr. Maundrel ſays, the church of the holy ſepulchre is founded upon mount Calvary, which is a ſmall eminency, or hill: It was anciently ſhut out of the walls of the city, but ſince it hath attracted the city round about it, and ſtands now in the midſt of Jeruſalem. Journey, p. 68, & 69.

(Y) There is a gate called the high gate of Benjamin (51), which is ſaid to have been by the houſe of the Lord: It might alſo be tranſlated in the houſe If this ſenſe be followed, the gate is none of the ten we are inquiring about; if the former, this is the gate that led into the land of Benjamin, and is further called the higher gate which lieth towards the north (52).

(Z) It may be thus tranſlated, ſuppoſing only here (53) an eaſy and common permutation of letters, as appears in the pronunciation of Sibboleth for (54) Shibboleth. This is the more probable, becauſe there is already in the text a various reading of Harſſouth for its being the ſame with the dung-gate, where was the valley of Aſhes [f]. But we do not take the city-gate [g] to be one of the ten of Jeruſalem, but rather a gate of the city of David, or Zion, to the north-weſt, leading to the valley-gate, and ſince called Zion-gate [h].

The ſituation (שער התוך Shahar Hattavek) the middle gate, may be deduced from what is ſaid in Jeremiah [i]; Nebuchadnezzar's army, after having entered into Jeruſalem by the north, advanced as far as this middle gate, of which Zedekiah being informed, he made his eſcape, as has already been obſerved [k], through his garden to the ſouth. This plainly ſhews that this gate muſt have ſtood in the midſt of the valley between Acra and Zion.

Towers. A WORD or two more concerning the towers, as related by Nehemiah. They were four. Indeed, it is ſaid of Huzziah [l], "He built towers in Jeruſalem, at the corner-" gate, and at the valley-gate, and at the turning of the "wall; but how many he built is not ſaid." However, the names of the ſaid four towers were Meah, eaſtward; Hananeel, north eaſt-ward; Hattanourim, of the furnaces, weſtward; and Ophel, ſouth-eaſt-ward. The firſt-named of theſe was alſo the firſt built [m]; near this they paſſed going to the ſheep-gate, in the dedication of the walls [n]; the ſecond, called Hananeel, lay more to the north; and the third quite to the weſt. From beyond this tower it is ſaid [o] they in the dedication went to the broad wall. Laſtly, from the fourth, Ophel, a ward ſo called [p], and the wall itſelf joining to it [q], took their name; but properly it is a tower [r], and ſuppoſed to be very high (A), and for Harſſith: However, Heres, in the Hebrew חרש, is a brick, and Hereſs, in Chaldee חרם, the ſun So we chuſe to take it here, as if it was written חרשית, looking upon it as the dung-gate, that opened into the valley of Hinnom, and that of aſhes.

and we ſhould think was made uſe of as a watch tower [s], from whence one might ſee and obſerve afar off. It is ſaid king Manaſſeh raiſed it up to a great height [t]; and of this tower Joſephus ſpeaks, when he ſays, that the wall paſſing through Ophlas was carried on ſo as to join the eaſt portico of the temple [u].

OF the waters and ſprings in or about Jeruſalem we have had occaſion to ſay ſomething before [w]; but for a further knowledge of the ſame, it will be proper here to add what Mr. Maundrell tells us concerning the pool of Gihon; "It lies ſays he, about two furlongs without Bethleem "gate, weſtward; it is a ſtately pool, 106 paces long, "and 67 broad, and lined with wall and plaiſter, and was, "when we were there, well ſtored with water." This helps to underſtand the better what is related of Hezekiah [x]; "He ſtopped the upper watter-courſe of Gihon, "and brought it ſtraight down to the weſt of the city of "David." Theſe naturally ran to the ſouth and eaſt out of the city; but the king turned off the courſe of this ſtream, in order to make it run towards the weſt in Sion. According to the Targum, Gihon is the ſame as Shiloh; nevertheleſs it is plain, there were there two pools, ſince Gihon is named the upper pool. Now as there was a lower pool, this laſt might be Shiloh, of which the upper was the ſpring; notwithſtanding one might be apt to think, that Gihon was only a baſon or reſervoir, into which the water came from En-rogel, that is to ſay, the fuller's fountain where Adonijah offered his ſacrifice [y] at the time of his aſpiring to the throne. But, it is poſſible, this may have no other foundation than the ſituation given to Gihon in the fuller's field. And although the word Rogel may ſignify a fuller, yet the word [z] כבס, as is made uſe of more properly implies it. However, ſince the time of Hezekiah the water of Shiloh, or Gihon, was brought into the city, and that in all appearance when the city roſe again from its ruins, it was reſtored to the ſame advantage; it is no wonder, that Tacitus [a] places here fontem perennis aquæ.

Waters.

THE king's pool is mentioned in Nehemiah [b], as being near the fountain-gate, that is, to the ſouth-weſt of Zion: It

It is called by Joſephus [c] the pool of Solomon, and placed, (which comés to one) winding towards the eaſt. Iſaiah [d] ſpeaks of the old pool, whoſe water had been made to run between the two walls, and might be the ſame as that made by Hezekiah, barely called the pool made [e], which might be named the artificial pool; not but that it was a natural ſpring, but becauſe art had been made uſe of in order to make it water the eaſtern parts of Zion: However, one of the moſt renowned waters in Jeruſalem was the brook of Cedron, whoſe head ſpring did not run very plentifully, for in ſummer it was generally dried up, but in rainy weather the quantity of waters falling from the mountains increaſed it ſo prodigiouſly, that it looked rather like a river than a brook. In the Hebrew its name is pronounced Kidron, as our tranſlation has expreſſed it, as where it is ſaid, "King "David paſſed over the brook Kidron, toward the way of "the wilderneſs [f]," What the word does ſignify ſeems not of great conſequence, yet it may be remarked, that according to St. Jerom [g], it is ſaid a tenebris, and truly קדר Kadar, is to be dark or black. Accordingly Joſephus [h], who often calls Cedron a valley, ſays it was very deep, and at the foot of the mount of olives, on the eaſt [i]; but in one place [k] he names it χειμαρρος, and ſo in the new teſtament we find it called [l].

To conclude; we dare flatter ourſelves we have faithfully repreſented Jeruſalem as it antiently ſtood, from about the times of David to the Babyloniſh captivity: For though it may be objected, that Nehemiah, from whom moſt of our proofs are borrowed, lived ſeveral years after the return of the Jews to the holy city, yet it muſt be allowed, that it was not raiſed upon any new plan, but only rebuilt upon its antient foundations. The walls indeed have been pulled down, the gates burnt to aſhes; but yet the remains, or at leaſt ſome marks or out-lines of them all, were ſtill to be ſeen, and parts of ſeveral of them were ſtill ſubſiſting. So, as we read in Nehemiah [m], the breaches were ſtopped up, the buildings re-edified, and the whole city reſtored, as much as poſſible, to its former condition.

we hope, it will be thought a charge and trouble, which may be better ſpared, conſidering the vaſt number and variety we have already, and how little reaſon we have to be ſatisfied with any of them.

We return to the king of Iſrael, who to celebrate the dedication of this new temple with greater magnificence, choſe to defer it till the next year, which was the jubilee (L), at which ſolemnity there uſed to be always a vaſt

Solomon muſt have exceeded by far this of ours, ſeeing it is ſo much inferior to the deſcription which Joſephus, who had ſeen it, has left us of it. To this it may be anſwered,

1. That the diſparity between theſe two temples, which thoſe elders bewailed, might not conſiſt ſo much in the largeneſs and magnificence of the building, as in the excellency of the work, and richneſs of its materials. We have ſeen, what immenſe quantity of gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, and other coſtly things, had been beſtowed upon the firſt; but we read of nothing like it in the ſecond, neither indeed could they afford it.

2. Joſephus and the rabbies deſcribe the ſecond temple after it was deſtroyed, when no man could contradict them; and how laviſh they might be in adorning a building which was the glory of their nation, we need not ſay; one thing is certain, that though it was become, in Joſephus's time, rather a ſtrong fortreſs, than a place of divine worſhip, yet there is hardly a man of ſenſe that believes half the wonders he ſays of it, or that it was capable of entertaining ſuch a prodigious gariſon as he affirms it did. And yet the Talmudiſts were ſo little ſatisfied with that author's deſcription, that they have made an incredible number of additions to it; inſomuch, that it looks rather like a new edifice of their own rearing, upon which they have beſtowed all the grandeur and magnificence, that their luxuriant fancy could muſter up.

But, laſtly, allowing it to have been equal to their deſcription, it doth not follow, that that of Zorobabel, over which the elders wept, was ſo; which having been burnt, rebuilt, improved, inriched, inlarged, and fortified, from time to time, and by ſeveral royal hands, had not perhaps one footſtep left of its primitive figure, except in the very ſanctuary. It is therefore in vain to pretend to gueſs, either at that of Solomon or Zorobabel, by that which we have in Joſephus; or to object the largeneſs and magnificence of this laſt, againſt the ſeeming plainneſs which our friend gives us of the firſt.

concourse of people from all parts of the kingdom, as we have elsewhere observed *. The ceremony began on the eight day of the seventh month of the sacred year, which was the first of the civil year, answering to the latter end of our October, and lasted seven days, at the end of which began the feast of the tabernacles, which was one of the three solemn feasts of the Israelites, and lasted likewise seven days; so that the vast concourse of people, who were invited by the king, and flocked to that solemnity, stayed at least fourteen days in Jerusalem. The ceremony opened with a pompous procession, in which the priests carried the ark, from the tabernacle which David had erected for it, to the temple; and deposited in the most holy place, between the two golden cherubims, which Solomon had caused to be made by Hiram, and to be set up there, to be a kind of covering to the ark (M). The king himself, accom-

(M) We have spoken elsewhere of the shape and position of those which covered the mercy-seat (91). These, that were made by Hiram for the most holy place, differed from them, and were of two sorts, namely these two, which spread one wing over the ark, and touched the wall with the other; and those which were made in bass-relief, to adorn the sides of the wall, between palm-trees likewise in bass-relief, and all of the finest gold. What the bigness of these last was we know not, but that of the two massive standing ones may be guessed at by the length of their wings, which reaching to the north and south walls with one extremity, and joining at least by the other over the center, must have been each five cubits long, because the place was twenty cubits in length and breadth; so that onemay reasonablysuppose the cherubims themselves to have been about ten cubits high. As to their form, we can affirm nothing certain concerning it, beyond what was said in the place above quoted.

There we took also notice, that Solomon made all the other utensils and ornaments of the temple, proportionable, both in bigness and richness, to that of the edifice: the mosaic altar of burnt-offering, for instance, was set by on account of its smallness, and another placed in lieu of it, which was twenty cubits in length and breadth, and ten in heighth. The same was done by the altar of perfume, and the table of shew-bread; which last, accompanied by all his chief officers, and the elders of Iſrael, marched before the ark; theſe were followed by a great number of prieſts and levites, who ſang ſome canticles proper to the occaſion, and played upon various inſtruments. Next to the ark followed another number of ſingers and players, with other prieſts bearing the golden candleſticks, altar of incenſe, and other ſacred utenſils of the ſanctuary, which had been brought from Gibeon, where they and the tabernacle had ſtood ever ſince. Theſe were not depoſited in the ſanctuary, becauſe the king had cauſed a new ſet of them to be made, which were larger, and more anſwerable to the ſpaciouſneſs of the place; but were laid up in ſome other repoſitory prepared for that purpoſe laſt, as well as the golden candleſticks, he increaſed the number of five or ſix fold.

Beſides theſe, there was a prodigious quantity of other gold and ſilver veſſels and utenſils; concerning which the text only ſays, that they were without number (92); but the Jewiſh hiſtorian has given us ſuch a detail of them (93), that we chuſe to refer the reader to him for it, becauſe we can neither tell whence he had it, nor indeed find room enough or uſe for ſuch quantities. Thus he tells us, that there were 10,000 tables to hold the ſacred utenſils, beſides thoſe of the ſhew-bread. He mentions likewiſe 10,000 candleſticks, beſides thoſe that were in the holy place; 80,000 cups for drink-offerings; and though the text mentions but 100 baſons of gold, which ſeem to us to have been for the ſame uſe (94), and to have been ſufficient for it, he has multiplied them to 10,000, beſides double that number of ſilver ones. We may ſee the ſame thing of 1000 prieſtly ornaments, which he tells us Solomon cauſed to be made for the ſole uſe of the high-prieſt; the 10,000 linen robes and girdles for that of the common prieſts; and 200,000 more for the Levites and muſicians; all which, if we may believe him, were never to be mended when torn, nor waſhed when ſtained with the leaſt ſpot, but were to be made into whicks for the lamps. To theſe we ſhall only add the 200,000 trumpets, and 400,000 muſical inſtruments made of a mixt metal between gold and ſilver, ſuch as was called by the antients electrum; concerning all which, we can only ſay, that the text is either ſilent, or contradicts his prodigious account, as well as where he ſays, that the 200,000 trumpets were made according to Moſes's appointment.

poſe. To add the greater magnificence to the proceſſion, the king ordered the ark to ſtop at proper diſtances, and there cauſed a prodigious number of victims to be offered up before it, till they had reached the ſanctuary. Whilſt the prieſts were depoſiting the ark in the moſt holy place, the air rang with the ſound of 120 trumpets, and with the voices of the levites, who ſang the praiſes of God, repeating theſe words at proper ſtanzas, Give thanks to the Lord, for he is good, and his mercy endureth for ever. It was then, that God ſeemed to come down in a viſible manner, to take poſſeſſion, as it were, of his new temple, by filling it with a glorious cloud, as he had formerly done the tabernacle, inſomuch, that the prieſts could not ſtand to offer up the ſacrifices, which they had prepared upon that occaſion [x].

DURING this time, Solomon, who ſtood upon a braſen ſcaffold three cubits high, and prepared for the purpoſe, having commanded the attention of the people, which ſtood in the galleries round about, kneeled down, and ſpread his hands towards heaven, and dedicated the building to God in an elegant and devout prayer, which he then made in their hearing; intreating the divine mercy to make it its reſidence in favour of Iſrael, and to be ready from thence to hear the prayers which his people ſhould direct thither, from whatever part of the world, and what condition ſoever they were in, to grant their requeſt, and pardon their offences. All this while the prieſts had covered the ſpacious altar with proper victims, which as ſoon as his prayer was ended, were conſumed by a miraculous fire, as a token of the divine favour and acceptance. The king then, turning himſelf about, bleſſed the audience; after which they went about offering a vaſt multitude of other ſacrifices, which were furniſhed both by the king, and by the heads of the tribes, inſomuch, that they were forced to rear a number of other altars in the court, the great one not being ſufficient for them. On the very firſt day of this ceremony, which laſted ſeven days, they (N) ſacrificed 20,000

A vaſt number of victims offered.

[x] 2 Chron. v. p. tot.

(N) The text ſays, indeed, that Solomon himſelf offered that vaſt number of victims (95); but it appears from the end of the verſe, and that which goes before it, that all Iſrael joined with him in it. We may likewiſe obſerve here, that it is not altogether clear

20,000 bullocks and 120,000 ſheep for peace-offerings, which ſerved to feaſt the concourſe of people; beſides a prodigious number of burnt and other offerings, which were brought in every day. The feaſt of the tabernacles, which immediately followed this, was likewiſe obſerved with unuſual magnificence; after which the people were diſmiſſed in peace, and returned to their homes, with their hearts full of joy and admiration of their wonderful monarch [y]. At the ſame time, leſt that young prince's heart ſhould be too elated by this extraordinary grandeur, God was pleaſed to appear to him in a dream, on the firſt night of the dedication, expreſſed his acceptance of that ſumptuous edifice, and renewed his promiſes to him and his poſterity, provided he and they ſerved him with an upright heart: on the other hand, he aſſured him, that in caſe they provoked him by their idolatry and diſobedience, that glorious building which was now the wonder of the world, ſhould infallibly become a deſolation, a dwelling for owls and bats, and a proverb of reproach among all nations †.

As ſoon as Solomon had finiſhed this noble ſtructure he ſet his artificers to work upon two other buildings, one for himſelf, and another for Pharaoh's daughter [z], and ſpared nothing, that art or riches could furniſh, to raiſe it to a proportionable ſplendor with it (O). He was almoſt thir- Solomon's palaces.

clear from it, whether they were all ſacrificed in one, or in the ſeven days of the feaſt; the latter, indeed, is the moſt probable of the two, but the tenor of the words ſeem to lean more to the former.

(O) One of theſe places is called the houſe of the foreſt of Lebanon (96), though it was at Jeruſalem; the reaſon of its being ſo called, is not certainly known. The Chaldee paraphraſt calls it a ſummer-houſe, or houſe of refreſhment; others think it to have been built in that foreſt, after he had taken the city of Hamath-zobah (97); but the general opinion is, that they gave the name of the foreſt of Lebanon to the city of David, by reaſon of the prodigious quantities of cedar, and other trees, which had been brought from thence to build the temple and other ſumptuous edifices, inſomuch, that it ſeemed as if Lebanon had been tranteen years in building them, ſo that he finiſhed thoſe three magnificent edifices, with all their coſtly furniture, utenſils, and ornaments, within the ſpace of twenty years (P). After this he ſent back a great part of his Tyrian artificers; and to expreſs his gratitude to their prince, who had ſo generouſly furniſhed him, not only with vaſt quantities of ſtones and wood, but alſo with great ſums of gold, he pretranſported to Jeruſalem (98). Upon this account, and perhaps alſo from the fragrancy of the cedar, both the city and temple, as well as the palace, are called Lebanon by the pſalmiſt and ſome of the prophets (99).

(P) Theſe palaces were built with the utmoſt magnificence, whether for the prodigious quantities of gold, ſilver, cedar, and other precious woods, marble, and other coſtly ſtones, the ſtupendous bigneſs of them, or the exquiſiteneſs of the workmanſhip, or for the richneſs of their furniture, and the ſumptuouſneſs of the galleries, porches, courts, and apartments. Among theſe there was one more ſpacious than the reſt, which was called the porch, or hall of judgment, in which was placed the king's throne, and, on each ſide of it, the ſeats of his counſellors. This porch was by far the moſt magnificent of all, becauſe it was both his ſeat of judgment, and the place of public audience, where he ſhewed himſelf, either to his nobles, or to the ſtrangers that reſorted to him. It was placed in the midſt of a flight of rich pillars of cedar, curiouſly carved and covered, or rather inlaid, with gold. The throne itſelf, which was in the faſhion of a niche, was covered with ivory, inlaid, and intermixed with curious ornaments in gold: the aſcent to it was by ſix ſteps, each ſtep being ſupported on each ſide with a ſmall lyon, and the arms of the ſeat with two large ones as big as the life. All theſe and even the ſteps themſelves, were likewiſe covered with gold and ivory. The richneſs of the furniture of theſe ſumptuous edifices may be gueſſed at, by the plate and drinking-veſſels which were uſed in them, which were all of fineſt gold. To theſe he added 300 ſhields of the ſame rich metal, which uſed to be carried before him when he went abroad, and then were ſuſpended along the rows of pillars as an ornament. Beſides theſe, he likewiſe cauſed 200 targets to be made of a larger ſize, which were hung up in ſome conſpicuous place of the temple. All theſe were made of ſome precious wood, and covered with gold; theſe latter amounted to 600 ſhekels each, and the former to three pound weight (100).

preſented him with twenty cities in Gallilee; but Hiram, coming ſoon after to view them, was ſo diſguſted at them, that he could not forbear breaking out into ſome complaint againſt his brother Solomon, and expreſſing his diſſatisfaction by his refuſal of them, and by the contemptible name which he gave to that whole land (Q); upon which, Solomon built them anew himſelf, and planted colonies of Iſraelites in them †. The reſt of his workmen, whether Tyrians or others, together with the Canaanitiſh ſlaves, who were by that time probably become very expert builders, were employed in ſurrounding the city of Jeruſalem with a ſtrong and ſtately wall, and fortifying Millo, Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, Beth-horon, Baalath, Tadmor, or Palmyra, and other places of conſequence; beſides ſeveral other ſtore-cities for his chariots and horſes, for his magazines of corn, wine, oyl, and other proviſions and ammunition. He built moreover ſome fortreſſes in Lebanon, probably to ſecure a free communication between his kingdom and that of Syria. Soon after this he brought under his yoke the remainder of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebuſites, who ſeem to have remained unconquered till his time, and made them all tributaries to him [a]. Theſe were alſo probably forced to his works

(Q) כבול Chabul, which is the name he gave it, comes from כבל, which ſignifies a fetlock; and is ſuppoſed to have alluded to the extream dirtineſs of it, becauſe one could not travel in it without being up to the ancles in dirt.

Joſephus derives it from a Phœnician word, which ſignifies diſlike, and adds, that Hiram refuſed to take them from Solomon upon that account (1); but as we find a city of that name as early as Joſhua's time (2), it is not improbable, that Hiram took the hint from it, and gave that contemptible appellative to all the reſt.

This Chabul, which our author calls Chebalon, was, according to him, ſituated in the neighbourhood of Tyre, or between that and Ptolemais: that of Joſhua could not be far from it; and yet St. Jerom places them on the other ſide of Jordan (4), in that part which was called Decapolis (5).

olomon's avy. To ſupply all theſe vaſt expences, Solomon went and built a navy at Ezion-geber, upon the coaſts of the Red-Sea, and put it under the care of ſome expert Tyrian ſailors, who, with his own men, went with it to Ophir (R), and [b] 1 King. ibid. ver. 22, 23.

(R) It is not to be expected, that our readers will be contented with being told, that Ophir is to us a terra incognita, that has been ſought in vain in all parts of the world, and through every point of the compaſs. And indeed one would hardly believe ſuch a diſcovery to be ſo difficult, conſidering the various indices, by which the ſcriptures ſeem to lead us to it; ſuch as thoſe that follow: 1. That Moſes ſpeaks of Ophir the ſon of Joktan, who went with his brethren and dwelt from Meſha toward Shephar, a mount of the eaſt (6). 2. That the ſame fleet went both to Ophir and Tharſhiſh (7), and ſet out from Ezion-geber, a ſea-port near Eloth, in the land of Edom upon the Red-Sea (8). 3. That the voyage took them up three years (9). 4. That it brought gold, precious ſtones, ſpices, ivory, ebony, and almug-wood, peacocks, and monkeys (10). 5. That Ophir not only afforded the greateſt quantity of gold, but that it alſo exceeded all other gold in fineneſs and value (11); and laſtly, That according to Eupolemus, an antient author quoted by Euſebius (12), the Urphe, or Ophir, from whence this metal was brought, was an iſland in the Red-Sea; not that which we commonly underſtand by that name, which lyeth between Arabia and Egypt, but the great ſouthern ocean, which extended itſelf between India and Africa, and waſheth up to the coaſt of Arabia and Perſia, and was called the Red-Sea from the colour which the perpendicular ſun-beams give it in thoſe hot climates (13). To this let us add, that Joſephus ſays, that Ophir was in India, or was ſince called India, or the land of gold (14), which may probably mean the Aurea Cherſoneſus, now called the iſland of Malacca, over-againſt Sumatra; theſe, one would be apt to think, might have chalked out ſuch a chart, as would have directed us, if not to the very ſpot of ground, yet at leaſt to the region, whence all and in about three years time, brought him back an immenſe weight of gold and ſilver, beſides ſeveral kinds of pre-

all theſe riches came, and yet there are ſcarce any two authors that have ſteered the ſame courſe.

But not to dwell long upon a ſubject that affords ſo little certainty, we ſhall content ourſelves with a bare mention of thoſe who ſeem to have viſibly erred from the point, and then give a ſhort account of thoſe who have ſpoken with a greater degree of probability.

Among the firſt we may rank thoſe who have gone to America for it (15), it being unconceivable, how they could ſteer thither and back again in thoſe early days, without charts or compaſs, with ſo imperfect a knowledge of geography and aſtronomy, and knowing no more of navigation than bare coaſting. If it be ſaid, that this was the method they ſteered by, and that they coaſted along India, China, and the north parts of Japan, to the north part of America, and ſo on to Hiſpaniola, or any other place, whether of Mexico or Peru; beſides that in ſuch a caſe, eighteen months will ſcarce be ſufficient for ſuch a prodigious round, how many iſlands might they have met with in India, that, could have ſupplyed them with all thoſe commodities, and eſpecially with gold? how came they at firſt to have ſuch knowledge of thoſe parts, as to go thither for that metal? Was America peopled ſo early? and if it was, which is ſcarce credible, were either its inhabitants ſuch expert ſailors, as to bring thoſe merchandiſes to ſome famous emporium nearer to Aſia, or did any of the Aſiatic nations fetch them from thence?

2. Thoſe who have gone no further than the coaſts of Africa, or even nearer for it (16), becauſe though it be probable, that ſeveral parts of Africa might abound with gold, ſpices, ivory, and thoſe other merchandiſes, or according to others, that the Indians might bring them thither, yet the fartheſt coaſt of Afric was not diſtant enough from Ezion-geber, to have taken up ſo much time as three years, though we ſhould allow, that they went to a different ſea-port for each merchandiſe; much leſs to thoſe places mentioned by ſome of thoſe authors, which are a great deal nearer to it.

Laſtly, we may reckon among them who have miſſed the mark thoſe who have fallen into the notion, that Ezion-geber was not on the coaſts of the Red-Sea, but of the Mediterranean (17), in order to avoid the difficulty into which Huetius ſtumbled, by

by making the canal of communication between thoſe two ſeas to to have been opened in David's time, which is confuted by ſeveral learned authors (18). But whatever the difficulty be of finding a paſſage from Ezion-geber to the Mediterranean; it cannot be ſuppoſed to have been ſituated any where but on the Red-Sea, without doing manifeſt violence to the text, becauſe there is not one ſingle inſtance of ים סוף Yam Suph, ſignifying the Mediterranean, or any other than the Red Sea; and ſecondly, becauſe Ezion-geber is ſaid to have been beſide Eloth, which laſt is always placed on the Red-Sea (19).

Among thoſe who have conjectured with more probability, we ſhall mention, firſt of all, thoſe who place it with Joſephus in ſome part of the Eaſt-Indies (20), though without adhering too cloſe to the particular place, which each of them has made choice of, whether in the kingdom of Malabar, or the iſles of Seylan or Taprobana (21), or in Siam, (22), or in any of thoſe neighbouring iſlands or kingdoms beyond the Ganges (23), or that of Pegu, whoſe inhabitants pretend to be deſcended from the Jews, whom Solomon ſent thither to work in the golden mines (24); for we think it labour loſt, to ſeek for a country that produced all the different kinds of merchandiſes, which the fleet brought into Judea, when they had time enough to fetch ſome from one place and ſome from another; or, which is equally probable, when they might be all brought by Indian merchants, from ſeveral parts of India, into ſome common emporium. All theſe are probable conjectures, by ſuppoſing the fleet to ſail from the Red-Sea into the ocean, through the Perſian gulph.

Dean Prideaux obſerves next, that it was the voyage to Tharſhiſh, which took up three years going and coming; from which he conjectures, that Ophir might be much nearer Judea, and the voyage performed in leſs time, if they had not been obliged to go quite to the former, for ſome commodities which the other did not afford; and conſequently, that any place in the great Indian Sea, at the diſtance of three years voyage, which yielded gold, ſilver, ivory, ivory, apes and peacocks, might be the Tharſhiſh; and any other, though much nearer, where they could have gold, almug trees, and precious ſtones, might be the Ophir mentioned in the ſcriptures. So that if the ſouthern part of Arabia produced the greateſt quantities of the beſt gold, as he ſhews they did from good authors, then that might be the land of Ophir (25).

But though it be granted, that Tharſhiſh and Ophir might be diſtinct places, and at ſome conſiderable diſtance from each other, yet if the latter had been ſo nigh as ſouth Arabia, and had yielded ſuch plenty of the fineſt gold, almug trees, and precious ſtones, it is ſcarce credible that they would have gone ſo much farther for ſuch inferior trifles as ſilver, ivory, monkeys, and peacocks; it is more likely, that they went fartheſt for the fineſt gold, precious ſtones, and things of greateſt value.

Laſtly, a late author (26) has taken quite a different rout from all the reſt, and thinks, that he has found out the Meſha and Sephar, where Ophir the ſon of Joktan went to dwell; between mount Maſius and the mountains of Saphar, ſomewhere towards Armenia and Media, where are the heads of the Tigris and Euphrates; which rivers might be ſubſervient to this commerce. He adds ſeveral ingenious reaſons for his conjectures, which we cannot dwell upon, and may be better read in the author. The main objection againſt this hypotheſis, and which, we think, he doth not ſufficiently anſwer, is, that the nearneſs of the place doth not admit of a three years voyage, though we ſhould ſuppoſe, with him, that they took a large compaſs about from coaſt to coaſt; and that the three years, mentioned in the text, might mean only three ſummers and two winters, or thirty months.

Upon the whole then, the moſt probable conjecture, and beyond that it is impoſſible to go, is, that Ophir was in ſome of thoſe remote rich countries of India beyond Ganges, and perhaps as far as China or Japan; which laſt doth ſtill abound with the fineſt gold, and with ſeveral other commodities in which Solomon's fleet dealt, as ſilver, precious ſtones, ebony, and other valuable ſorts of wood; to ſay nothing of ſpices, peacocks, parrots, apes, and other ſuch creatures †; and by its diſtance doth beſt anſwer to the length of the voyage.

All that we ſhall ſay farther is, that this Ophir gold was in great plenty in Judea even in David's time, ſince he left 3000 talents of those precious woods the king did bestow in adorning the galleries about the temple, and in making a great number of musical instruments for the service of God [d].

ALL this time, Solomon was still mindful of the concerns of religion, repairing to the temple at the solemn festivals, and settling the courses of the priests, levites, musicians, and other officers of the temple, according to the model of his father; and making all proper regulations for maintaining the service of God, with a splendor and magnificence equal, at least, to that of his kingdom [e]. Upon all which accounts he is justly observed, more than once, to have exceeded all the kings of the earth.

The queen of Sheba's visit to him.

AMONG the great persons whom his fame brought to Jerusalem, the most considerable was the queen of Sheba (S), of it for the service of the temple, besides the 5000 talents which the princes of the people offered for the same purpose (27). Now as we can hardly believe either of them to have been so munificent, as to have given more than a certain proportion of it; should we suppose it to have been even a third part, there must have been at least 24,000 talents of that metal in his kingdom; this prodigious sum could never be heaped together from the bare spoil of the neighbouring nations; it is more reasonable to believe, that having conquered the Edomites, and taken Eloth and Ezion-geber, David set himself about opening a commerce from thence, by the assistance of Hiram's expert sailors; so that his son did but improve what the father had begun, by enlarging and fortifying those two places and peopling them with the best mariners and ship-builders, and, in a word, by encouraging navigation and commerce to such a degree, as made him by far the richest prince of his time, and his kingdom the most flourishing in the world.

(S) Josephus calls her Nicaulis, and says, she was queen of Egypt and Ethiopia (28); that Saba was the metropolis of the latter, till Cambyses called it, by his sister's name, Meroes (29). The Ethiopians, accordingly, pretend, that she was queen of that country, and preserve still a list of her successors (30). They add, that she had a son by Solomon, whom she sent to be brought up by him; they call him Meilik or Menilehek, and pretend, that twenty-

a princeſs of ſuch excellent wiſdom and extraordinary opulence, that ſhe ſeemed to have come to vie with the Jewiſh monarch, by the ſumptuouſneſs of her equipage, the richneſs of her preſents, and the number of hard queſtions ſhe put to him. She brought with her a vaſt number of camels, laden with gold, precious ſtones, and ſuch rich ſpices and perfumes, as had not till then been known even in Solomon's court. By all theſe one may gueſs at the ſplendidneſs of her equipage and retinue; and it is not to be ſuppoſed, that ſhe would have engaged with a prince ſo univerſally famed for wiſdom, if ſhe had not had ſome conſiderable ſhare of it herſelf: but, after having tried him with all the ſubtil and enigmatic queſtions ſhe had prepared for him (T), ſhe found in him ſuch a readineſs in ſolving, twenty-four of their kings are deſcended from that prince ſucceſſively down to Baſilides, who reigned in the middle of the 17th century (31). Some antient writers do likewiſe acknowledge, that that country was ſometime governed by women (32).

The Arabians, on the other hand, claim this queen as their own; they call him Balkiſh, and pretend, that ſhe was queen of Arabia, had her reſidence in the city of Mareb, which they make the metropolis of the province of Saba. They have preſerved alſo her genealogy, as well as the hiſtory of her journey to Judea, which they have ſtuffed with other fables; among others, that ſhe was married to Solomon; and that, after her return into Arabia, that prince uſed to keep an epiſtolar correſpondence with her, by means of a bird which they called Hudhud, a kind of lapwing or puet, which uſed to carry letters between them (33).

But, ſetting aſide theſe trifling ſtories, the opinion of thoſe who think that that princeſs came from Arabia, ſeems certainly the moſt probable of the two, among many other reaſons, becauſe ſhe is called, in the goſpel, the queen of the South, and is ſaid to have come from the uttermoſt parts of the earth (34); which anſwers exactly to Arabia Felix, which lieth ſouth of Judea, and is bounded by the ocean. To which we may add, that it abounded with gold, precious ſtones, and fine perfumes, more than any other country thereabouts.

(T) We have ſeen in a former note, that it was part of the diverſion of princes in thoſe times to puzzle one another with riddles and hard queſtions. An annaliſt tells us, that among other ways that this princeſs tried to poſe the king, ſhe took a number of boys ſolving, and ſuch a ſagacity in explaining his anſwers, that he ſeemed even to prevent her thoughts [f]; inſomuch, that ſhe owned herſelf fully ſatisfied, that he was not, without juſt reaſon, eſteemed the wiſeſt prince of his time. The king did then entertain her with a view of the temple, of his palaces, and gardens, of his court, tables, and of the richneſs of their furniture, the great number and excellent order of his ſervants, ſtables, chariots, guards, and, in a word, of all the magnificence that reigned both in his court and in the city. So many ſurpriſing inſtances of his wiſdom and greatneſs could not but ſtrike that princeſs with the deepeſt wonder; which as ſoon as ſhe could recover herſelf from, ſhe owned with a kind of extacy, that the half of it had not been told her. After this, ſhe expreſſed her extreme ſatisfaction in the moſt reſpectful terms, and preſented the king with 120 talents of gold, a great number of precious ſtones, and rich perfumes. Solomon, on the other hand, was too generous not to make her ſuitable returns, and diſmiſſed her with the ſtrongeſt proofs of his munificence (V) [g].

HITHERTO we have ſeen nothing in that prince's life, but what gives us the higheſt idea of his wiſdom, piety, and magnificence; but the remainder of his reign proved far otherwiſe, and Solomon, emphatically called the wiſe, boys and girls, which ſhe had brought with her, and having arrayed them all alike, ſhe preſented them to him, to ſee which way he would take to know thoſe of one ſex from thoſe of the other. Wherefore he ordered them to waſh their faces before him; and eaſily found out the difference, by the robuſtneſs and effeminacy with which each ſex performed his command. The reader may ſee his authority for this ſtory in the author himſelf (35).

(V) Joſephus adds, that the Jews had a tradition, that the queen of Sheba brought with her the firſt branch of that precious balſam-tree, or balm of Gilead, which Judea came afterwards to be ſo famed for. He mentions likewiſe a grove belonging to the houſe of Lebanon, which was ſuch a maſter-piece of art, that it raiſed the admiration of that princeſs, above all the reſt of his ſtately works (36).

wiſe, beloved of God, and admired by all the world for ſo many excellent vertues, did become ſuch a ſlave to the paſſion of love, in his old age, that he ventured to marry an amazing multitude of ſtrange women, without diſtinction of nation, country, or religion, and without the leaſt regard to God's expreſs commands to the contrary; till at length he but too ſadly verified the divine warning [h], by ſuffering himſelf to be ſeduced into all manner of idolatry. The number of his wives amounted to 700, beſides 300 concubines, or wives of the ſecond rank; and his complaiſance for them went ſo far, as to build altars and temples to all their deities; inſomuch, that the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem, if not the city itſelf, was filled with idols and temples; and the mount of Olives, which was over-againſt it, was defiled with two altars, one to Chemoſh, the god of Moab, and another to Moloch the god of the Ammonites. Such a ſhameful defection could not but be highly diſpleaſing to God; and Solomon was ſoon after made ſenſible of it, when he appeared the third time to him in a dream, and told him, that his ingratitude would coſt his ſucceſſors the loſs of his kingdom, the tribe of Judah excepted, which he would leave them, in conſideration of his former promiſe to David, for whoſe ſake he alſo forbore to rend the other tribes from him till after his death. Whether this ſevere denunciation awaked him to repentance, or whether he died immerſed in his idolatry and luſt, the text doth no where tell us; what the opinion of Jews and Chriſtians is about it, may be ſeen in the next note (W). He died in the fortieth year of his reign, and about

(W) Among thoſe that believe, that Solomon did heartily repent of all his extravagancies, are, among the Jews, the Talmudiſts, who affirm, that God ſent Aſmodeus to ſtrip him of all his glory, and drive him from his throne; upon which, that prince wandered about all the cities of Iſrael, weeping, and crying out, I, the preacher, was once king of Iſrael (37). 2. The generality of rabbies, antient and modern, if we except the author of Eccleſiaſticus, who finiſhes his elogy with an account of his crimes, and the ill effects which it cauſed in his poſterity, without ever mentioning any thing about his repentance (38); theſe pretend to have about the fifty-eight of his age, and was buried in the ſtately ſepulchre of his father David, and ſucceeded by his ſon Rehoboam [i]. Joſephus gives him eighty years reign, and ninety-four of age [k]. Were that indeed true, his impieties have a tradition, that in the height of his remorſe, he cauſed himſelf to be dragged ſeveral times about the ſtreets of Jeruſalem; and that he came to the temple with five bundles of rods, deſiring the doctors to chaſtiſe him for his faults; which they refuſing to do, out of regard to his dignity, he ſcourged himſelf ſeverely before them, and thinking himſelf unworthy to reign any longer, he ſtripped himſelf of every thing, and went a begging about the kingdom (39). Some of them have gone another way to work, and have affirmed, that it is falſe, that his heart was enſnared by women to ſin, or that he built any altars to Moloch, or any other heatheniſh deity; and ſay, that the text means no more, than that he would have done it, if he had not been with-held from it by God's ſpecial grace (40). As for Joſephus, he only attributes his vices to the weakneſs of old age, without ſaying any thing of his repentance (41).

The Chriſtians, both ancient and modern, who have embraced the notion, that Solomon repented before his death, are too numerous to be quoted here; we ſhall inſert their names in the margin (42), and mention the principal reaſons which have led them to it. In the firſt place, many of them have followed the notion of ſome of the fathers above quoted, that the book of Eccleſiaſtes was the reſult of his penitent meditations, after he was returned to a ſenſe of himſelf, and theſe are very numerous (43). There are, indeed, in that book a number of expreſſions, which are very like thoſe of a perſon, who feels a ſenſible remorſe for his paſt extravagancies, and is deſirous to forewarn others againſt them (44).

ties might well enough be attributed to his extreme dotage; perhaps alſo this was the motive, that induced the Jewiſh

 hiſtorian

Another argument for his repentance is taken from the promiſe, made by God to his father, where, ſpeaking of Solomon, whom he had choſen to build his temple; he adds, I will eſtabliſh his kingdom for ever: I will be to him a father, and he ſhall be a ſon to me: If he commit iniquity, I will chaſtiſe him with the rod of men:——But my mercy will I not cauſe to depart from him, as I did from Saul: and much more to the ſame purpoſe (45).

It is likewiſe ſaid in another place (46), that Rehoboam and his ſubjects walked in the way of David and Solomon but three years; and afterwards that he did evil in the ſight of the Lord (47). Solomon's way, therefore, being put with that of David, and oppoſed to that of his wicked ſon, argues, according to them, that it was right; which could not have been ſaid of it, if he had died impenitent.

Some pretend, that the Proverbs were written after his repentance, and quote two places for it, the one, where he complains, that he was more brutiſh than any man, having neither underſtanding, wiſdom, nor knowledge of the holy one (48); for they pretend, that Agur there is Solomon: the other is ſtill wider, being only, according to the ſeptuagint verſion, which makes him ſay, At length I repented, and have applied myſelf to live after a better rule; whereas in the original he only ſays, that having obſerved the field of a ſlothful man over-run with nettles——he conſidered well about it, and received inſtruction (49).

Laſtly, ſo willing are they to make a penitent of him, they quote the words, And Solomon ſlept with his fathers, and was buried, &c. (50), as a token of his repentance; becauſe there is nothing reproachful added to them, as is generally when a wicked king dieth impenitent; ſuch as, that he did evil in the ſight of the Lord; that he perverted his way; that he made Iſrael to ſin; and ſuch-like.

Notwithſtanding all theſe reaſons, many learned fathers, as well as modern authors, have not ſcrupled to call his repentance in queſtion, and ſome of them even to deny it (51). We ſhall ſubhiſtorian to ſpin out his life ſo far beyond the text. Solomon is recorded to have written a great number of books; of which we have only his Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, and the Canticles; all the reſt are loſt, as well as thoſe of the prophets Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo, who are ſaid to have penned the hiſtory of that prince * (X).

* 2 Chron. ix. 29.

WHILST join ſome of their reaſons for this opinion. 1. Solomon's ſins of idolatry and love of ſtrange women are recorded in the ſtrongeſt terms; but not a word is mentioned in the whole ſcripture about his forſaking them. 2. God, being highly offended with him, actually cut off ten tribes from his poſterity, according to what he had told him (52). Would he have executed it ſo punctually, if Solomon had repented? 3. David and others, who repented of their ſins, had not only part of the puniſhment abated, but their converſion is particularly recorded? Why ſhould Solomon be the only perſon whoſe repentance is omitted? Could he write the book of Proverbs, or of Eccleſiaſtes, after his converſion, and yet leave all the monuments of his idolatry to continue? or, if he had deſtroy'd them, Why was it not recorded? or rather, Why it is ſaid, that they ſubſiſted till Joſiah's time (53), that is, about 350 years after his death? What proofs are there, that the book of Eccleſiaſtes was not wrote before his defection, rather than after it? Laſtly, as to the Rabbinical traditions, doth not the authority of the book of Eccleſiaſticus, mentioned above, out-weigh them all, and doth not that ſeem to imply, that he died in his ſins? Upon the whole then, we ſhall not venture to conclude any thing on either ſide, much leſs enter into the more dark and dangerous queſtion about his ſalvation, which almoſt all the authors above quoted, and many more, have preſumed to handle with greater freedom than certainty.

(X) Several other books have been attributed to Solomon, eſpecially thoſe of Eccleſiaſticus, the Wiſdom and the Pſalter of Solomon, which are now univerſally owned to be of more modern date. The latter conſiſts of 18 pſalms, artfully collected out of the other pſalms and ſome of the prophets, a copy of which is in the Vienna library, and placed between the two former books (54); they ſeem alſo to have been in our Alexandrian manuſcript, by their being mentioned in the index, however they came to be torn, or loſt out of it. As for the other writings, which the Greeks and Arabians attribute to that prince, they are leſs worth enquiring after: ſome of them are written in the

WHILST Solomon ſpent the laſt years of his life in pleaſure and indolence, the ſeeds of the threatened defection were ſowing both in Iſrael and out of it; ſo that when his ſon Rehoboam came to the crown, he had three potent adverſaries to encounter againſt. The firſt was Hadad, king of Edom, who bore a mortal hatred againſt Iſrael, ever ſince David's general had cauſed ſuch an univerſal maſſacre in that kingdom. He was now returned from Egypt, where he had been forced to take ſanctuary, during David and Solomon's reigns [l]. The ſecond was Rezin, a ſubject of the king of Zobah, who fled likewiſe from David's conquering ſword, and having put himſelf at the head of a band of brave warriors, went and eſtabliſhed a petty kingdom at Damaſcus, and never ceaſed annoying Iſrael, and revenging David's old hoſtilities on the Zobeans [m]. But the moſt dangerous of the three was Jeroboam, a young daring man of the tribe of Ephraim, whom Solomon had formerly made overſeer over his tribe and that of Manaſſeh, in the carrying on of his works. This man had been told by the prophet Ahijah, that God would give him the ten tribes, which were to be rent from Solomon's ſucceſſors: and either upon this account, or for ſome particular miſdemeanour, he had been forced to fly into Egypt, to avoid the king's reſentment, and there probably he concerted the magic ſtrain, others upon natural philoſophy, and others upon moral ſubjects (55). Some indeed pretend that the magic books were written by demons, who envied his glory, and wanted to aſperſe his fame, by making him the author of them, but that prince, who was not only monarch of the world, but whoſe power extended over all creatures, and even over ſpirits, cauſed all thoſe writings to be locked up in a ſtrong iron cheſt, and buried under his throne; out of which, however, they were fetched after his death, by ſome demons or magicians, and publiſhed again under that monarch's name (56). There are ſome eaſtern authors, who attribute the invention of the Syriac and Arabic letters to him (57), and ſome make him the author of the book of Job (58); all without any foundation.

with the king of Edom, about causing an insurrection in Israel. As soon, therefore, as he heard, that Rehoboam was upon the throne, he returned from Egypt to watch a proper opportunity for it, and that weak prince soon after gave him such a one as his heart could wish.

Rehoboam. Rehoboam was gone with his court, and the elders of all the tribes, to receive their homage at Shechem, but they refused to acknowledge him, unless he promised to lighten their yoke, which, they complained, his father had made too heavy for them. The king took three days to consider of an answer, and, as he had attained to the fortieth year of his age, one might have expected, that he would have hearkened to the wholesome advice of his grave counsellors, and given the people some fair promises, which if he had, it is possible, he might have deprived Jeroboam, who was at the head of the mutineers, of an occasion of revolting; but he unfortunately preferred that of some hot-headed youths, who had been brought up at court with him, and instead of soothing the people on the third day, he answered them in a haughty tone, That he designed to govern them with greater severity than ever his father had done, and that, if they dared to murmur, he would use scorpions instead of whips to chastise their insolence. This inconsiderate answer did so provoke them, that they disclaimed all further allegiance to the house of David, and having murdered Adoram, whom the king had sent to appease the tumult, ten of the tribes chose Jeroboam to be their head. Judah and Benjamin, however, did cleave to Rehoboam, and conveyed him with all speed to Jerusalem, to avoid any insult being offered to him by the revolters. As soon as he was come thither, he caused an army to be raised out of the two tribes, which mustered 180,000 valiant men, to reduce the rest to their obedience; but, whilst they were prepareing for a battle, the prophet Shemaiah came and acquainted them, that this defection was from God, and persuaded them to desist, which they readily did for the present, though there were continual bickerings between those two kings all their life. Jeroboam, on the other hand, thought on nothing, but how to secure his new-gotten kingdom, and took the advantage of that peaceful interval, to rebuild Shechem and Penuel, the former of which he made the place of his residence (Y). But there was still one thing, which who choose Jeroboam to be their king.

(Y) These two places had been in a manner destroyed, the former

which he feared might, in time, reconcile the ten tribes to the houſe of David, namely, their going three times a year to Jeruſalem, and Jeroboam did not ſufficiently rely upon the prophet's promiſe, to run the riſk of becoming the victim of the people's inconſtancy. This apprehenſion made him ſacrifice religion to his ſafety, and to ſet up a couple of golden calves, the one at Dan, and the other at Bethel, which were at the two extremities of the kingdom, to which places he commanded the people to repair for the worſhip of God, without going to Jeruſalem. He likewiſe built ſome temples and altars in the high places, and becauſe the Levites did cleave to Rehoboam, he made prieſts to his deities out of the lees of his people, without regard to tribe or deſert [n].

THE dedication of the two calves was proclaimed through Iſrael, and a great concourſe of people had flocked to Bethel, when a prophet was ſent thither by God, to denounce the deſtruction of the new altar, by a future king of Judah, named Joſiah, and, for a proof of his prediction, he told them, that it ſhould then receive ſuch a crack, that the cinders would run out through the rent; and the thing happened accordingly upon the ſpot. Jeroboam was ſtanding by the altar, being juſt going to offer incenſe upon it, (Z), and when he heard the prophet's threaten- His idolatr mer by Abimelech (59), and the latter by Gideon (60). This laſt was an important place on the other ſide of Jordan, very proper to keep the two tribes and a half in awe. Shechem was alſo a ſtrong place by nature, about 40 miles from Jeruſalem (61), and ſo conveniently ſituate to become the metropolis of this new kingdom, which it continued to be till the building of Samaria by Omri, and reſumed that dignity after this latter had been deſtroyed by the Aſſyrians. We find it called Sichar in the goſpel (62), which is a term of contempt, which the tribe of Judah gave it after their revolt, and ſignifies Drunkard.

(Z) It ſeems by this action, as if Jeroboam had deſigned to join the high-prieſthood and the royal dignity together in his own perſon. The places he made choice of to ſet up his two idols were not only very commodious on account of their ſituation, but had been frequented, time out of mind, by the people. Bethel was had in great reverence, as having been reſorted to by the patri-

ing, he ſtretched out his hand to cauſe him to be apprehended, but, to his great ſurpriſe, felt it withered in an inſtant. Upon his ſubmiſſion, however, he had it reſtored again, and invited the prophet to his houſe, intending to have rewarded him for the cure, but he, having been expreſly forbidden to ſtay in Bethel, even to drink a cup of water, refuſed his offer and went his way. He was, nevertheleſs, unadviſedly brought back by another prophet, who pretended a new command from God; but whilſt he was refreſhing himſelf at his houſe, he was told by him, that his diſobedience would be puniſhed by a ſpeedy and extraordinary death, which happened accordingly ſoon after; for, as he was returning into the land of Judah, he was killed by a lyon, which did afterwards lie quietly down by his carcaſs, without offering any further violence either to it, or the beaſt he rode upon.

Jeroboam was nothing moved at theſe extraordinary events, but continued debauching the people from the worſhip of God [o]. At length, his ſon Abijah being fallen into ſome dangerous diſeaſe, he took it into his head to ſend his wife in diſguiſe to Ahijah the prophet, who had foretold him that he ſhould be king over the ten tribes, to know whether he would recover. Ahijah, though blind with age, knew her at her firſt coming, and, having called her by her name, bid her go and tell her huſband, that ſince he had proved ſo ungrateful to God, and had filled Iſrael with idolatry, the death of the child would be the leaſt puniſhment that ſhould fall upon him, for that his poſterity ſhould be cut off, ſo that they which died in the city would become the food of dogs, and thoſe that died in the field ſhould be devoured by the crows, all which was verified by the ſequel accordingly. Notwithſtanding all theſe threatenings, Jeroboam perſiſted ſtill in his idolatry, and gave thereby no ſmall advantage to the king of Judah [p].

archs, and conſecrated in a peculiar manner by Jacob, after he had ſeen the glorious viſion we read of in Geneſis (63); and Dan was become famous, or rather infamous, for the idol which had been brought thither from Micah's houſe, and for the concourſe of people that went afterwards to ſacrifice to it (64).

(63) Ch. xxviii. 12. & ſeq. vid. & Ch. xxxv. 1. & ſeq. (64) Judg. xviii. paſſ.

WHILST Jeroboam was ſtrengthening himſelf in Shechem, Rehoboam was doing the ſame at Jeruſalem; he built and fortied a conſiderable number of places in Judah and Benjamin, put gariſons in them, and ſtored them with arms and ammunition. At the ſame time, the tribe of Levi, which was diſperſed over Iſrael, being diſpleaſed with Jeroboam, came flocking to Jeruſalem from their reſpective cities, beſides a vaſt number out of the other tribes, who abhorred his calves and idolatries, and came thither to ſerve God according to the law of Moſes; ſo that he ſaw his ſubjects in a little time as numerous as thoſe of his revolted rival [q]. But that weak prince had ſcarce continued three years in the true ſervice of God, before he fell into the vileſt idolatries, and even outdid the revolted Iſraelites in them; inſomuch, that his memory is branded for having ſuffered the people to ſet up groves, and to provide them with men and women, fit for the moſt abominable and unnatural practices [r]. For theſe God ſtirred up a potent adverſary againſt them, Shiſhak king of Egypt, who came and took many of their fenced cities, and drove the wealthieſt of Judah into the metropolis for ſhelter. Here the prophet Shemaiah took occaſion to upbraid them with their wickedneſs, which had brought this diſtreſs upon them; he threatened the ruin of the city; and his ſpeech had ſo good an effect upon them, that they humbled themſelves before God, and, by acknowledging the juſtice of this puniſhment, avoided the ſeverity of it [s]. Shiſhak contented himſelf with ſtripping the temple and palaces of all their golden ſhields and veſſels, and left them to ſubſtitute in their room others of a baſer metal. This happened in the fifth year of Rehoboam, after which he reigned 12 years longer peaceably, except a few ſkirmiſhes with the king of Iſrael, and died in the 18th year of his reign. He had 18 wives and 60 concubines, and by them 28 ſons and 60 daughters; but of all his wives, he loved Maacah, the daughter, or rather grand-daughter, of Abiſhalom [t], by whom he had four ſons, the eldeſt of whom he preferred to all his other ſons to ſucceed him, for which end he had him brought up under him, whilſt he diſpoſed of all his children in other cities of his kingdom, to be educated under proper tutors, in a manner ſuitable to their rank Abijah's reign.

JEROBOAM had reigned eighteen years in Iſrael, when Abijam, or Abijah, as he is called in the book of Chronicles, came to the crown. He immediately put 400,000 men in arms, and went and incamped with them upon mount Zemaraim, upon the borders of Ephraim, where Jeroboam met him with an army of double that number. The two kings being within hearing of each other, Abijam began with upbraiding his competitor with his baſe extraction and baſer actions; in that, from being a ſervant to Solomon, he had taken the advantage of Rehoboam's weakneſs, to deprive him of the largeſt ſhare of his kingdom, and had endeavoured to ſecure it by debauching the people from the worſhip of God, to the moſt abominable idolatries; he concluded with telling him, that he could expect nothing, but ruin and deſtruction, as a juſt puniſhment for his rebellion to his God, and to his prince, who came againſt him with an army of men, which had faithfully adhered to the ſervice of both. Jeroboam was too hardened a politician to ſuffer himſelf, or his men, to be intimidated by ſuch reproaches, and whilſt he ſeemed to give him the hearing, he had cunningly ordered a body of men to file round the hill, and to ſurpriſe him in the rear, whilſt he attacked him in front; and this was ſo punctually executed, that the king of Judah ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by the enemy before he was aware of it. This ſurpriſe cauſed an univerſal outcry in his army, and would in all likelihood, have injected an univerſal pannic, had not providence declared on their ſide, ſo that they gained a complete victory over the Iſraelitiſh army, of which there fell 500,000 on the ſpot. Abijah purſued his victory, and retook ſeveral conſiderable places from them, particularly that of Bethel, and weakened Jeroboam ſo much, that he never could recover his ſtrength again, during the ſhort time of his reign, which laſted but three years in all. Abijah left 14 wives and 22 ſons, and was ſucceeded by Aſa; his hiſtory was written by the prophet Iddo [y]. All that is further recorded of him is, that he followed the ſinful ways of his father, inſtead of ſerving God with the ſame ſincerity that David had done [z]. About two years after Jeroboam

Jeroboam alſo died (A), after having reigned in Iſrael 22 years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Nadab [a].

Asa ſucceeded Abijam in the twentieth year of Joro- Aſa's reign, boam. He was a religious prince, and as the ten firſt years of his reign were bleſſed with peace, he ſpent a great part of that time in purging his kingdom from the heatheniſh abominations, which his predeceſſors had introduced in it. So ſincere was his zeal in that good work, and piety. that he ſpared not his own mother, but depoſed her from the regal dignity which ſhe had abuſed, by patronizing idolatry, and erecting a grove for the worſhip of ſome idol; both which he cauſed to be deſtroyed, with all the other monuments of irreligion, except the high places, which he endeavoured in vain to divert the people from. He alſo put his whole kingdom in a good poſture of defence, by fortifying ſeveral important places, and entertaining an army of 580,000 men, 300,000 of which were of the tribe of Judah, famous for handling the target and ſpear; the reſt, which were moſt of Benjamin, are likewiſe celebrated for their uncommon dexterity in the uſe of the ſhield and bow [b]. His riches increaſing with his might, he likewiſe adorned the temple with a quantity of gold and ſilver veſſels, in the room of thoſe which the king of Egypt had carried away. In the ſecond year of his reign, Nadab ſucceeded Jeroboam in Iſrael; but nothing happened remarkable during his two years reign, except his cleaving to the ſins of his father, and his being killed at the ſiege of Gibbethon, a fortreſs belonging to the Philiſtines, by Baaſha, a man of the tribe of Iſſachar, who, having ſeized upon the kingdom, deſtroyed the whole race of Jeroboam, according to the prophet's word [c].

Aſa, who truſted more in his God, than in his own ſtrength, was nothing terrified at this numerous hoſt, but came againſt him with his army; and after a ſharp battle which was fought at Mareſhah, did totally rout the Ethiopians, and returned to Jeruſalem laden with their ſpoil. At his return he was met by a prophet, who encouraged him with freſh promiſes from God, that he ſhould ſtill prove ſucceſsful againſt his enemies, provided he continued firm in his zeal and obedience to God. Soon after his arrival at his metropolis, he ſacrificed a conſiderable portion of the ſpoil to the ſervice of God, and had the pleaſure to ſee multitudes flock to him from ſeveral of the revolted tribes, whom either his zeal or ſucceſs drew away from Baaſha, the new-made king of Iſrael.

Makes an alliance with Benhadad.

It was, probably, this continual defection, which cauſed a ſeries of ſkirmiſhes between the two kings, and obliged the latter to build the fortreſs of Ramah, to ſtop the communication between the two kingdoms, he was then leagued with the king of Syria, and Aſa, afraid of engaging two ſuch powerful enemies, found no better expedient, than to bribe Benhadad to break his alliance with him, and to cauſe ſome powerful diverſion in his kingdom. To this end, he ſent him all the gold that he could find, both in his own treaſury, and in that of the temple; which had ſuch an influence upon the Syrian king, that he took all the fenced cities of the tribe of Naphthali, and obliged Baaſha to deſiſt from his enterpiſe, to go and defend his territories [c]. As ſoon as he was departed from Ramah, Aſa iſſued out a proclamation, and ordered his ſubjects, none excepted, to tranſport all the materials of that fortreſs to Geba of Benjamin, and to Mizpeh in the tribe of Judah, and

We have followed the author of the 2d book of Chronicles, which affirms, that there was peace during the firſt ten years (68); and that Aſa offered great ſacrifices at Jeruſalem in the fifteenth year of his reign, as a thankſgiving for his late victory (69).

and to fortify thoſe two places with them. In the mean time, the prophet Hanani took the liberty to come and reprove Aſa for his weakneſs, in ſeeking help from Benhadad, when he had been ſo lately victorious over the Ethiopian hoſt; but the king, who was by this time grown impatient, by reaſon of a diſtemper in his feet, probably the gout, was ſo exaſperated at his boldneſs, that he caſt him into priſon. He was likewiſe guilty of ſome cruelties towards other perſons, upon what pretence the text doth not ſay, but it is likely, that his diſeaſe had inclined him to it, becauſe it is obſerved to have leſſened his confidence in God, and to have ſent him to the phyſicians for help [f]. He died in the 41ſt year of his reign, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Jehoſhaphat (C).

His diſeaſe; and death. Year of the Flood, 2085. Year before Chriſt, 914.

BAASHA all this while continued in the idolatries of Jeroboam, and in conſtant war with the king of Judah; when Jehu, the ſon of Hanani, came from the Lord to tell him, that ſince he had imitated his predeceſſor in his ſins, he ſhould likewiſe ſhare in his puniſhment, and be cut off with his poſterity. Baaſha died ſoon after, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Elah, who aſcended the throne in the 26th year of Aſa's reign; he had ſcarce reigned two years before he felt the effects of Jehu's prediction; he was then at the ſiege of Gibbethon, where Zimri, who commanded over his chariots, ſlew him, and ſeized upon his kingdom. Zimri's reign laſted but ſeven days, Omri, another general officer, being choſen king by the army: yet found he time enough, in that ſhort ſpace, to deſtroy the whole race of Baaſha, even to his fartheſt relations. Omri left Gibbethon, and came to beſiege him in Tirzah; but before he could enter that city, Zimri went into the royal palace and ſet it on fire, and burnt himſelf in it [g]; however,

(C) The book of Kings doth barely ſay, that he was buried with his anceſtors *; but that of the Chronicles (70) adds, that he was embalmed, and laid upon a ſtately bed, covered with ſpices and odoriferous drugs; and that they made a great burning for him; from which ſome have concluded, that the cuſtom of burning the bodies of princes began from Aſa, and that they depoſited the bones and aſhes in their ſepulchres. We have endeavoured to confute this notion, and to reconcile the ſeeming contradiction of theſe two accounts in a former note, to which we refer the reader †.

however, he reigned long enough to shew himself unworthy of the kingdom, by his propensity to Jeroboam's idolatry.

Omri had another competitor, Tibni, the son of Ginath, whom one part of the people had elected king; but the party of Omri, being much the stronger, soon persuaded the rest to join with them; so Tibni was killed, and Omri reigned unrivalled. This happened in the 31st year of Asa's reign.

DURING the first six years of his reign, Tirzah being then the royal palace of residence, Omri bought the hill of Someron, or Samaria, of one Shemer for two talents of silver, and built the city of that name upon it, which he made afterwards the metropolis of his kingdom. We have nothing more recorded of him, except that he reigned another six years in Samaria, in all the sinful ways of his predecessors, and was succeeded by his son, who proved still more wicked than any of them [h].

Ahab king of Israel.

Year of the Flood, 2081. Year before Christ, 918.

Ahab began his reign in the 38th year of Asa's; his unlawful marriage with Jezebel, the daughter of Eth-Baal, king of Zidon, proved a constant source of idolatries and wicked deeds in him, and of plagues and misfortunes to his kingdom. His complaisance for her, made him suffer her to introduce the worship of the Zidonian deities, which consisted in human sacrifices, and in the most abominable ceremonies *. These were at first introduced into his court, for which a sumptuous temple, an altar, and grove had been built to Baal in Samaria; but as his weakness suffered him to assist at those hellish ceremonies, his example soon spread the infection through his whole kingdom. However, the prophet Elijah was sent to him very early, to deter him from his wicked courses, by assuring him, that God would shortly punish the land with a grievous famine, during which there should be neither dew nor rain to refresh the earth, until he obtained it again by his prayers; after which he went and concealed himself, during the space of three years (D) [i].

As

Jehoſhaphat King of Judah.

WHILST Ahab and his idolatrous queen were propagating their impieties in Iſrael, and murdering all thoſe, whether prophets or others, who dared oppoſe them, Jehoſhaphat, who ſucceeded Aſa about the latter end of the fourth year of Ahab's reign, was deſtroying idolatry, and promoting the pure worſhip of God in his own kingdom, with ſuch zeal and application, that it drew upon him and his people the greateſt proſperity and ſucceſs. He was thirty-five years old when he began his reign, and the firſt thing that he ſet about was the pulling down of all the monu- His piety, ments of idolatry, and ſodomitical groves, which his father had not been able to aboliſh; and, in the third year of his reign, he ſent ſome of the chief officers of his court, with a competent number of prieſts and levites, with copies of the Pentateuch, to inſtruct the people throughout his kingdom. At the ſame time, he fortified all the conſiderable and ſucceſs. places of the land, and put gariſons in them, as well as in thoſe which his father had taken from the kings of Iſrael. Beſides theſe, he had the moſt numerous army of any of his

As ſoon then as he had foretold the famine, he was forced to fly from the fury of Jezebel, and retired into ſome cavern upon the border of Cherith, a brook which falleth into the Jordan, where he drank of the water of it, and was furniſhed twice a-day with bread and fleſh by the ravens. He ſtayed not long there, becauſe the exceſſive drought had dried up the brook, but went to Zarephath, a city of Zidon, which laboured alſo with the famine. There he met with a poor widow gathering a few ſticks without the walls of the place, having but ſo much flour and oil left as would make one cake, which ſhe deſigned for her ſon and herſelf, without knowing how to procure more when that was ſpent. The prophet, tired with his journey, aſked her for a mouthful of bread, and a little water to drink; and ſhe having acquainted him with her condition, he bid her not fear, but bring him what he deſired, aſſuring her, that as long as the dearth laſted, her barrel and cruiſe ſhould not ceaſe furniſhing her with meal and oil enough to ſupport them. The thing happened according to his prediction, and he continued with her, till he was commanded to return to Samaria. During his abode with this hoſpitable widow, her only ſon chanced to die; and ſhe, in the height of her grief, could not forbear accuſing the prophet, as the cauſe of her misfortune. Upon which Elijah took the child from her, and carried him up to his bed, and having ſtretched himſelf upon him, and prayed to God on his behalf, he reſtored him alive to her again (71).

his predeceſſors, it conſiſting of above 1,100,000 fighting men (E). Upon all theſe accounts he was ſo proſperous and powerful, that none of his enemies dared moleſt him; the Philiſtines and Arabians were tributaries to him; and his allies were ſtill increaſing his wealth by their preſents [k].

THUS it fared with that religious prince and his ſubjects, whilſt war and famine were the reward of Ahab's impiety in the kingdom of Iſrael.

Elijah's meeting with Obadiah.

HOWEVER, at the end of a three years famine, Elijah came and ſhewed himſelf to Obadiah, governor of Ahab's houſe, as he was going in ſearch of ſome freſh ſprings of water, to ſave that little cattle they had left, whilſt the king himſelf went another way upon the ſame errand. Obadiah was a pious man, and had ſhewed an uncommon zeal for the god of Iſrael, by ſaving 100 of his prophets from Jezebel's fury, and ſupporting them with food in their concealment, during the whole time of the famine. As ſoon, therefore, as he ſaw Elijah, he fell down at his feet, and gave him a reſpectful welcome; but when the prophet bid him go after the king, and acquaint him with his arrival, he modeſtly excuſed himſelf from ſo dangerous a meſſage, being afraid, leſt, if the ſpirit ſhould catch him away, inſtead of appearing before the king, his life ſhould anſwer for the diſappointment; for, added he, there is ſcarce a nation or kingdom, from which Ahab has not exacted an oath, to bring you back to Samaria, where-ever you were found. At length upon the prophet's promiſing that he would ſhew himſelf to the king, Obadiah went and ſtopt his farther ſearch, by acquainting him with Elijah's return, and his promiſe of a ſpeedy rain. Elijah accordingly appeared, and the firſt greeting between Ahab and him

(E) We have had elſewhere occaſion to ſpeak of this prodigious number of ſoldiers *, and to ſhew, that they were not kept like our ſtanding armies in conſtant pay and duty, but that their names were ſet down in the king's muſter-rolls, in order to be ſummoned to arms, whenever occaſion required it; which, conſidering the ſmall compaſs of the land, might be done with great eaſe, and in a very little ſpace; after which they returned to their families, and followed their uſual occupations. We may alſo ſuppoſe, that the gariſons might be relieved in the ſame manner every three months, more or leſs, that every one might have time to mind his private affairs between thoſe intervals.

him was ſuch, as might be reaſonably expected between a wicked haughty monarch and a perſon of that prophet's character. After ſome mutual invectives on both ſides, Elijah deſired, that all Iſrael might be gathered at mount Carmel, with all the prieſts of Baal whom Jezebel maintained; which being done accordingly, he reproved the people for halting between two opinions, and dividing their ſervice between God and Baal. "You ſee, ſaid he, that "I am the only prophet of the lord that is left, and thoſe "of Baal are 450; let them offer up a bullock to Baal, "and I will offer another to the God of Iſrael; and let "the deity, whoſe ſacrifice is conſumed by a preternatural "fire, be henceforth the only object of your worſhip." As ſoon as the people had expreſſed their aſſent to his propoſal, the prieſts of Baal were ordered to begin. They hewed their bullock in pieces, and laid it upon the wood of the altar, and called upon Baal from morning till noon; and not finding the leaſt ſymptom of anſwer, they began, according to their cuſtom, to cut themſelves with knives, till the blood ran down upon the ground *. All this while Elijah plied them with the moſt biting ſarcaſms, bidding them to cry louder, for Baal, no doubt, was a great God, and would hear them, unleſs he were either aſleep, or more advantageouſly taken up. At length, when it was come about the time of offering the evening ſacrifice, he reared up an altar of twelve ſtones, according to the Moſaic law, and laid the wood and victim upon it; and, having cauſed a deep trench to be digged round it, he ordered them to pour water upon the altar once and again, till the trench was overflowed. He then called upon God with a loud voice, begging of him, that he would ſhew himſelf to the whole people, to be the only God in all the world; upon which a fire fell down from heaven, which conſumed the victim, wood, and altar, and dried up all the water in the trenches; at ſight of which, the people fell upon their faces, and cried out, The Lord is the only God. The prophet then, addreſſing himſelf to the people, told them, that if they were really perſuaded of it, they ought to ſeize on thoſe falſe prophets, pointing to the prieſts of Baal, who had ſeduced them from his worſhip to ſerve that filthy deity, and take them to the brook Kiſhon, and put every one of them to death there. The people readily obeyed the motion; and Ahab, whether the late miracle made him approve their zeal, or whether he thought it dangerous to obſtruct it, ſuffered them to be hurried away to death. Elijah then adviſed the king to make what ſpeed he could to Jezreel, to avoid being caught by the rain, which would ſhortly come down in great plenty, as it did accordingly. As ſoon as Ahab had reached his palace, he acquainted his queen with what had happened at Carmel, and what ſhameful check her favourite deity had received there, in the ſight of all Iſrael. One would expect, that the long-wiſh'd-for rain, obtained by the prophet's prayer, might have comforted her for that misfortune, and have inſpired her with an uncommon reſpect for his perſon; but it happened quite otherwiſe, and the death of ſo many of her prophets threw her into ſuch a rage, that ſhe vowed to ſend the author of it after them by the next day. And Elijah was forced a ſecond time to fly for his life (F) [1].

(F) The prophet ſeems, at this time, to have been under ſuch apprehenſions, that he could not ſtay till providence directed him what courſe to take, as he had done in his laſt flight. He ſtopped not till he came to Beerſhebah, a city in the land of Judah, and near 150 miles from Samaria, where having diſmiſſed his ſervant, he continued his march one whole day towards the wilderneſs of Petrea. At length, being quite ſpent with the journey, and tired with life, he laid himſelf down under a juniper-tree, and, after ſome bitter complaints, fell aſleep. He was ſoon after awaked by an angel, who bid him refreſh himſelf with ſome food, and when he looked about he found a cake of bread and ſome water, and did eat and drink, and fell aſleep again. The angel awoke him again, and bid him eat once more, before he went on his journey, which he told him would be a long one; and ſo it proved indeed, for he went, upon the ſtrength of it, forty days, till he came to mount Horeb, where he found a convenient cave to lodge in. Here the word of the Lord came to him, and aſked him what he did there, and he anſwered, that he was the only prophet of the Lord, whom the idolatrous Iſraelites had not ſlain, after they had broken his covenant and deſtroyed his altars; and that, becauſe he had been zealous enough to reprove them for it, they ſought his life alſo. The voice commanded him then to ſtand upon the mount where he ſhould hear the Lord paſs by him; that he ſhould hear a ſtrong wind capable of rending the rocks aſunder, and afterward an earthquake, and then a flame; but that the Lord would not manifeſt himſelf in any of theſe, but in a ſmall and ſtill voice. Accordingly, when Elijah heard the voice he wrapped his face in his mantle, and the Lord commanded him to go back, by the wa

By that time Ahab had reigned 18 years, Benhadad, king of Syria, came at the head of 32 petty kings, and a numerous army, and laid ſiege to Samaria; where, notwithſtanding his great forces, and the arrogance with which he threatened both king and city, he was beat by a handful of men, who ſallied out upon him at mid-day, with Ahab at their head; and forced to fly with a prodigious loſs. He endeavoured, on the following year, to retrieve his credit, and was defeated again by the Iſraelites with a terrible ſlaughter, and himſelf in danger of being taken priſoner in the city of Apheck; but, upon his ſending from thence a ſubmiſſive meſſage, Ahab received him with an amazing generoſity into his chariot, and brought him to his pavilion, where they made an alliance together; after which, he generouſly diſmiſſed him without any further ranſom. The particulars of theſe two famous actions the reader will find in the hiſtory of Syria †. As ſoon as Benhadad was departed, one of the ſons of the prophets preſented himſelf before Ahab, with his face all beſmeared with blood and dirt, and complained, that, during the action, a Syrian priſoner had been committed to his cuſtody, with a ſtrict charge not to let him eſcape, under pain of death; but that, whilſt he buſied himſelf about one thing or other, the priſoner was fled, and himſelf now in danger of being puniſhed for his neglect. Ahab, who believed the fact to be really way of the wilderneſs, or by the deſart paths, to Damaſcus, and there anoint Hazael to be king of Syria, Jehu to be king of Iſrael, and Eliſha to be prophet in his room; telling him, that thoſe three ſhould not ſheath their ſwords, till Ahab's impious race and his idolatrous ſubjects were utterly cut off by one or other of them; all which happened accordingly, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place.

In his return he paſſed by the grounds of Eliſha, the ſon of Shaphat, where he and his ſervants were ploughing, and caſt his mantle upon him. Eliſha, ready to follow him, begged leave to entertain him at a feaſt, whilſt he took his leave of his friends, but it doth not appear, that he ſtayed to partake of it, and indeed the place was too near Samaria and Jezreel, and it was dangerous for him to ſtay there; however, he went after him as ſoon as they had made an end of eating. Neither doth it appear from the text, that Elijah went to anoint either Hazael or Jehu; it is moſt likely, that that ceremony was not performed till after his tranſlation, as will appear by the ſequel.

really as he told it, made no scruple to pronounce him guilty of death; but the prophet, wiping his face, and discovering himself to the king, soon let him know, that he had passed his sentence against himself, and that since he had let so powerful an enemy of Israel go free, when God had delivered him into his hand, his life should pay for that of his prisoner. Ahab was struck with such surprize at the boldness of the stratagem, that he went away to Samaria full of grief and indignation (G) [m]; nevertheless, he kept his word with the king of Syria, till his detaining of Ramoth-Gilead, a city which belonged to Israel, contrary to his promise, obliged him to invade his territories about three years after [n].

In the mean time, Ahab suffered himself to be seduced by Jezebel to an inhuman deed, which proved fatal to him and to his whole family. Naboth, an inhabitant of Jezreel, had a vineyard contiguous to the palace, which Ahab offered to buy, or barter for another piece of ground, intending to make an herb-garden of it for his house; but, as it was reckoned scandalous to sell an inheritance, Naboth was uncourteous enough to refuse the offer, to the great mortification of the proud king. Jezebel was acquainted with it, and being resolved at once to procure the vineyard, and to punish Naboth for his refusal, she sent a letter to the elders of Jezreel, sealed with the king's signet, commanding them to proclaim a fast, and to hire some loose fellows to swear treason and blasphemy against him, and then to stone him to death for it. The Jezreelites, not daring to disobey her orders, sent her word soon after of Naboth's death, and she acquainted Ahab with it; but whilst he was taking possession of the ground, the prophet Elijah

(G) Josephus (73) calls this prophet Micaiah, and adds, that the king caused him to be put into prison for his boldness, which is not unlikely, because when Ahab was afterwards going against Ramoth-Gilead, and had sent for him at Jehoshaphat's request Ahab expressed a particular aversion against him, because he was ever prophesying evil against him, and when he had foretold his overthrow at Ramoth, he condemned him to the same punishment (74).

Elijah came to him from God, foretold the deſtruction, that his murder would bring upon him, upon Jezebel, and upon all his whole houſe; that the dogs ſhould lick his blood, where they licked that of Naboth, that Jezebel ſhould be devoured by dogs, and all his poſterity utterly cut off. This dreadful ſentence from ſo conſiderable a prophet, did ſo alarm the king, that he rent his cloaths, returned home, filled with the deepeſt grief, and, by a timely repentance, obtained a gracious reſpite; ſo that the calamities, that were to fall upon his houſe, did not happen till after his death [o]. It is probably about this time, that he is ſuppoſed to have made his ſon Ahaziah copartner of his crown, or perhaps only his viceroy (H), whilſt he humbled himſelf in ſackcloth and aſhes, to avoid the impending judgment of God [P]; but this change was but ſhort lived, and he ſoon returned to his former impieties.

ALL this while, Jehoſhaphat had enjoyed a profound peace, and ſpent his time, partly in ſtrengthening his kingdom, promoting his naval trade, and making all the proper regulations for the utter aboliſhing of idolatry, and promoting the worſhip of God. He is blamed only for two things, his not totally demoliſhing of the high places, and his making of alliances and affinity with Ahab (I). It was

(H) At leaſt this is the only expedient by which chronologiſts can reconcile the anachroniſms, which one meets with between the books of Kings and Chronicles, the one beginning their reign from the death of their fathers, and the other from the time of their being raiſed to a partnerſhip with them. The reader may ſee an inſtance of it in archbiſhop Uſher's annals (75), both in Ahab above-mentioned, and in his contemporary Jehoſhaphat, who raiſed alſo his ſon Jehoram to be his viceroy, or partner. It may be further obſerved, that this method became very expedient, if not abſolutely neceſſary, in dangerous wars, in which the kings uſed to lead their own armies, and often loſt their lives, to appoint their ſucceſſors, and to leave them vicegerents of the kingdom during their abſence, upon which account, this wholeſome cuſtom prevailed alſo among many other eaſtern nations.

(I) This affinity was in ſuffering his ſon Jehoram to marry Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, a moſt wicked princeſs, who proved the author of great miſchiefs in Judah (76), and by whom he had a ſon named Ahaziah, who afterwards ſucceeded his father, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place.

in consequence of this last, that he came down to Samaria to pay a visit to him, having left the care of his kingdom to his son Jehoram. By this time, Ahab had resolved upon retaking Ramoth-Gilead from the Syrians: he took therefore that opportunity of asking his royal guest to assist him in the enterprize, to which he readily consented, but desired first of all, that God might be consulted, concerning the success of that expedition. Ahab immediately gathered 400 of his prophets to the gate of Samaria, where the king of Judah and he sat, each on a stately throne, and, upon his asking of the question, they one and all promised him, that he would come off victorious. Some of them pretended likewise to foretel his success, by some antick and awkward representations and gestures; but with such seeming eagerness and assurance, as rendered them suspected to Jehoshaphat, who therefore begged, that if there were any other prophet of the Lord, he might be sent for and consulted. There was indeed such a one as he desired, Micaiah the son of Imlah, but his strenuous veracity had made him odious to the king; however, he was obliged in complaisance to Jehoshaphat to send for him, and he, being before acquainted with the flattering promises of the false prophets, by the officer who brought him, did likewise answer, in a jocose tone, that the expedition could not fail of success; but the king, observing that he did not speak seriously, adjured him to tell the truth in the name of God; upon which, Micaiah told him, that he would certainly lose the day, with his life, that his army would be defeated, and that God had suffered his prophets to be possest with a lying spirit, that he might go and meet his death where he expected a victory. The king, however, was so far from being deterred by his speech, from his favourite enterprise, that he caused the prophet to be kept in a dungeon with bread and water, until he returned victorious, and went resolutely upon his own ruin; and Jehoshaphat, being too easily persuaded to accompany him, did narrowly escape sharing in the same fate: we have seen the ill success of this expedition in a former chapter *. Ahab, wounded by a random shot, died in the evening, and, as soon as his death was known, his generals caused a retreat to be sounded through his army, and both sides withdrew before night. The king's corpse was brought to Samaria, and buried in the royal sepulchre, and his bloody armour, chariot, and harness, were brought to a pool in that place to

to be waſhed, where the dogs coming to lick his blood verified Elijah's prophecy againſt him [q].

JEHOSHAPHAT, on the other hand, having thus happily eſcaped, returned to Jeruſalem, and in the way was met by the prophet Jehu, who reproved him, in the ſevereſt terms, for entering into a confederacy with the impious king of Iſrael, and told him, that if God had not had a greater regard for that zeal which he had expreſt for his ſervice, than to this laſt and unworthy action, he had certainly have ſuffered him to fall with his idolatrous ally. The king, become ſenſible of his error by this reproof, and by his late danger, endeavoured to retrieve it by a more aſſiduous application to every thing that related, either to religion, or the good of his kingdom. To do this the more effectually, he took a progreſs through a great part of it, diligently examined how the prieſts inſtructed the people, the judges and magiſtrates adminiſtered juſtice, and every where exhorted them to their duty, with a zeal worthy ſo good a prince [r]. Year of the Flood, 2102. Year before Chriſt, 897.

IN the mean time, Ahaziah, who had ſucceeded his father Ahab, both in his kingdom and idolatry, happened to fall through a grate of his dining-room, about the ſecond year of his reign, and was ſo hurt by the fall, that his life was deſpaired of. In this extremity he ſent meſſengers to conſult Beelzebub, the deity of Ekron, about his recovery; but theſe were met by Elijah, who ſent them back with this mournful meſſage to their maſter; that, ſince he had ſent to the god of Ekron, as if there had been none in Iſrael worth conſulting, he ſhould never ſtir more from his bed, till he was carried to his grave. At their return, they acquainted the king, who was ſurpriſed at the ſuddenneſs of it, that they had met a prophet, who ſent them back with the ſentence of death from the Lord; and upon their deſcribing him, that he was a hairy man, girt with a leathern girdle, he knew him to be Elijah, and died ſoon after, according to his prophecy [s] (K). It was well for Jehoram, that he had so good a prince with him, for when their army was ready to perish with thirst, Elisha, at his request, obtained a miraculous supply of water, which did at once refresh the confederate army, and, by the redness which it did cast at sun-rising towards the Moabitish host, did so scare them, that Israel gained a complete victory over them, as we have seen elsewhere †.

At length, towards the latter end of his reign, Jehoshaphat saw his kingdom invaded by the Ammonites and Moabites, with a mixed multitude of other nations, and with him in an humbler manner than the two former, not only escaped their fate, but prevailed upon him to go to the king, where he only confirmed his first message, and went his way.

Soon after this, that extraordinary prophet was translated into heaven in a fiery chariot, and left a double portion of his spirit with Elisha, who from that time became as famous in Israel, for his zeal and miracles, as his master had been (77), as we shall see in the sequel of this history. As soon as he had lost sight of his master, he took his cloak, which was fallen from him as he was taken up, and with it divided and repassed the Jordan. Here he was met by a company of prophets, who, perceiving that the spirit of Elijah rested upon him, prostrated themselves before him, and having observed to him the pleasant situation of Jericho, whose soil, however, was unhappily barren, through the brackishness of its water; he went with them to the fountain-head, and flung a pitcher full of salt into it, from which time it always yielded sweet water, and the land became fruitful.

Elisha went from thence to Bethel, and, in his way, was met by a parcel of idle boys coming out of that place, who cried to him in mockery, Come up thou bald man. These were, in all likelihood, the children of some of the worshippers of Baal, who had been taught to shew an unusual disrespect for the prophets of God. This seems at least very probable, from the punishment which befel them; for the prophet had no sooner cursed them in the name of God, than 42 of them were torn in pieces by two she bears out of the wood (78).

with ſuch ſpeed, that they were already got as far as Hazazon-Tamar, or Engedi, that is within 36 miles of his capital, before he knew any thing of it. In this ſurpriſe he had recourſe to God, proclaimed a ſtrict and general faſt; and went at the head of the people, who were aſſembled at Jeruſalem upon that occaſion, to the temple, where having implored the divine aſſiſtance, in an humble and pathetic prayer, he was anſwered by the prophet Jahaziel, that God would ſpeedily deliver him from thoſe invaders in ſuch an extraordinary manner, that he ſhould have nothing to do but ſeize upon their ſpoil. Accordingly, on the next morning, the king went out againſt them with a ſmall army, whom he ſtill encouraged, as they went on, to rely wholly upon God; but they ſoon beheld that which did it more effectually, their enemies ſeized with a kind of pannic phrenſy, ſlaughtering one another with greater fury than themſelves could have done; till they were all cut off. The plunder they found among the ſlain being more than they could well carry, they only picked out the richeſt, which they were three days gathering *, and on the fourth, they halted at a convenient valley, to return thanks to heaven for their victory, and from that day the place was called Berachah, or Bleſſing (L). The army, in their return to Jeruſalem, marched at the ſound of muſical inſtruments, accompanied with canticles ſung by levites, after which Jehoſhaphat ended his days in peace [t]. (L) This valley is ſuppoſed, by many Jews and Chriſtians, to be the ſame which is mentioned by the prophet Joel (79), and that it will be the ſcene of the univerſal judgment (80). Others think, that the valley of Jehoſhaphat, there mentioned, is between Jeruſalem and the Mount of Olives (81), or in the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem (82); but we can ſee nothing in that paſſage that refers either to the laſt judgment, or to this Valley of Bleſſing, and it is moſt likely, that, by the valley of Jehoſhaphat, the prophet meant no more, than the literal ſenſe of the word imports, Jehoſhaphat ſignifying the judgment of God, which may be applied to any place where God doth inflict his judgments upon offenders of any kind.

then king of Israel, and as impious as his father Ahab, obtained his consent, to send some ships of his own to Tarshish along with his fleet; for which Jehoshaphat was severely rebuked by the prophet Eliezer, who foretold him, at the same time, the loss of that fleet, which happened accordingly; for which reason he never would let any of the ships of Israel mix with his own [u]. He died in the 60th year of his age, after he had reigned 25 years, and was succeeded by his son Jehoram. His history is said to have been written by the prophet Jehu [w], which book seems to have been lost, with many others, at the captivity.

His death.

Judah and Israel immersed in idolatry.

Jehoram, who, as we observed before, had born a share in the government of Judah towards the latter end of his father's reign, did no sooner see himself alone upon the throne, than he began to undo all that his pious father had done, and to bring upon himself and his house all the curses that had been pronounced against that of his father-in-law. Judah and Israel seem now but one kingdom, and one scene of all manner of idolatry and wickedness: they are both governed by kings of the same name; Jehoram, king of Judah, is influenced by his wife Athaliah, the impious daughter of Ahab, and Jehoram, king of Israel, by his mother Jezebel; this walks in all the abominations of his father, and that introduces them into his own kingdom, after they had been abolished by his two predecessors; both of them bringing down the heaviest judgments from heaven; the one, by forsaking the ways of his pious father, and the other, by continuing in those of his impious one; or what was still more surprising, whilst the king of Israel did endeavour so far to reform from him, as to destroy the Phœnician idols which Ahab had reared up, and contented himself with the idolatrous worship of the two golden calves [x], that of Judah was adopting those very deities in his kingdom, and even in Jerusalem [y]. Thus whilst the former forsook the God of Israel, and the other did but imperfectly return to him, both were involved in the same guilt, and in the same punishment; with this difference, however, that that of Israel is entirely cut off, with his whole posterity; whereas, in that of Judah, an infant

JEHOSHAPHAT had left a numerous iſſue, and diſpoſed of all his ſons into ſeveral cities of Judah, under proper tutors, and with incomes ſuitable to their rank; but he was ſcarce cold in his grave, before his impious ſon ſignaliſed the beginning of his reign, with an univerſal maſſacre of them, and of all the nobles of his kingdom, who either dared to oppoſe, or diſlike, his cruelty [z]. After this, being wholly influenced by his impious queen, he gave himſelf up to idolatry, and ſet up the worſhip of Baal, both in his kingdom and metropolis, in imitation of his father-in-law. For theſe he was ſeverely reproved, by a letter ſent him by Elijah, a little before his aſſumption; wherein that prophet likewiſe foretold him, among many other evils, the almoſt total extirpation of his poſterity, and his own death, by an incurable diſeaſe in his bowels [a].

THE firſt token of the divine diſpleaſure, which he felt, was the revolt of the Edomites, who refuſed to pay him the uſual tribute. Jehoram went out againſt them, and beat them; but they ſoon recovered ſtrength enough to ſhake off the yoke, and to ſet up a king of their own over them, as we have ſeen elſewhere *; and in ſo doing they verified Iſaac's prophecy, that Eſau's poſterity ſhould, in time, ſhake off the yoke of Jacob [b]. At the ſame time, Libnah, belonging to the prieſts, in the tribe of Judah [c], and upon the frontiers of Idumea, revolted from Jehoram probably to Edom, though the text ſays not to whom [d]; but theſe were but the preludes of the judgments that were to fall upon him. His kingdom was preſently after invaded by the Philiſtines and Arabians, and theſe penetrated even to Jeruſalem, and carried off all the riches of that metropolis, together with Jehoram's wives and all his ſons, except only Jehoahaz, who was the youngeſt, and ſucceeded him after his death. Jehoram was ſoon after ſeized with an incurable diſeaſe in his belly, probably a bloody flux, which laſted two years, and weakened him to ſuch a degree, that his bowels came out, and he died with extremity of his pain. He was buried in a ſepulchre by himſelf, probably by reaſon of the corruption and ſtench which attended his diſeaſe, and without the uſual ceremony of burn-burning ſpices and other odoriferous drugs about his body, or any other royal pomp. He reigned eight years [e], four with his father Jehoſhaphat, and the other four by himſelf: his diſeaſe having made him incapable of governing his kingdom, obliged him to make his ſon Jehoahaz, otherwiſe called Ahaziah, viceroy, who ſucceeded him about a year after, and in the 12th of Jehoram king of Iſrael [f].

WHILST Judah was in this diſmal plight, Eliſha was working wonders for Iſrael. We have ſeen elſewhere, what a miraculous cure he wrought upon Naaman, a famous general of the king of Syria, and how he diſcovered all the ſecret deſigns of that prince to the king of Iſrael †, and by that means prevented the Syrians, for ſome time, from ſucceeding in their attempts againſt him. But at length Benhadad came up, not by ambuſhes and ſtratagems as formerly, but with a numerous hoſt, and beſieged Samaria ſo cloſe, that it began to labour under a very pinching famine; inſomuch, that an aſs's head was ſold for fourſcore pieces of ſilver, and a ſmall meaſure of pulſe (M) for five. (M) As moſt tranſlations have rendered the word חֲרִיוֹנִים Chirionim, by doves dung, they have given commentators a vaſt deal of trouble to find out ſuch uſe for it, as might anſwer this exceſſive price that was given for it, that a meaſure, which held but ſix eggs, ſhould ſell for above eleven ſhillings. It were endleſs to mention all their various conjectures (83), we have therefore followed the learned Bochart's verſion (84), who proves, that the word doth, among other things, ſignify a kind of peaſe, common in all thoſe countries, and which the Jews in particular uſed to parch over the fire for food (85), in the ſame manner as they did their corn.

As to what we read of further, that an aſs's head was ſold for upwards of nine pounds of our money, though it was an unclean creature, and forbidden by the law of Moſes, we muſt attribute the eating of it, at that time, to their extreme want of proviſion, which in all ſuch caſes may be allowed to diſpenſe with law.

ed, is not eaſy to gueſs, but what might increaſe this grievous famine was, that it had begun ſome years before in the land, inſomuch, that Eliſha, who timely foreſaw it, ſent his kind hoſteſs the Shunamite, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter, out of the kingdom, to ſeek for food where ſhe could get it, whilſt himſelf tarried in the college of the prophets, and now and then afforded them a miraculous ſupply of food [g], till the Syrian army forced him into the city. By this time the extremity, to which Samaria was reduced, ſeemed either to have obliterated all the former ſervices of that prophet to the king; or, more probably, to have rendered him ſuſpected of being ſince gained over to the Syrian intereſt, ſince he ſuffered the city to labour under theſe difficulties, without interpoſing his miraculous power, as he had done upon other occaſions. His ſuſpicion at length broke out with unuſual fury, upon the following dreadful occaſion: The king was taking a melancholy turn round the walls of the city when a woman came to him and begged for juſtice againſt another woman, whom ſhe had admitted to eat a ſhare of her boiled child, upon condition, that when they had made an end of him, her own ſhould be likewiſe dreſt to ſupply their common want, and who had now hid her own child, and refuſed to let her partake of it. Such a ſhocking ſtory, accompanied with all the tokens of deſpair, could not but fill the diſtreſſed monarch with the utmoſt horror: he rent his clothes, and his fleſh appeared covered with ſackcloth, and not knowing how to vent his grief otherwiſe, he ſwore, that Eliſha's head ſhould pay for the diſtreſs of the people; and ſent immediately an officer to take it off. Eliſha was aware of it, and was complaining of the king's cruelty to the elders of Iſrael, who were at his houſe juſt as the meſſenger of death was entering it. However, the prophet found means to get him ſtopped at the door, till the king himſelf appeared, and then, after he had repreſented to him the unreaſonableneſs of puniſhing an innocent perſon, for a calamity which was ſent from above [h] (N), he deſired him to have but patience till till next day, by which time there would be such a supply of provisions in Samaria, that a bushel of fine flour should be sold for a shekel of silver, and the rest in proportion. By this means the prophet saved his life, and though the king could scarce give credit to him, yet he thought it more advisable to defer his resentment, till he saw the success of this wonderful promise.

The thing, however, happened according to his prediction. On that very night some lepers, who lodged on the outside of the gate, and were ready to die with hunger, resolved, whatever betided them, to go into the Syrian camp, in hopes to find either some lucky supply of food, or, at the worst, to be put to a speedier death, than that of starving. They were surprised to find their tents full of provisions and baggage, but empty of inhabitants. As soon therefore as they had satisfied their hunger with what they found at hand, they ventured further into the camp, and found it still the same; and after they had conveyed away a considerable quantity of rich plunder, they began to blame themselves for not acquainting the famished Samaritans with the happy news. The king, as soon as he was acquainted with the story, suspected it to be a stratagem of the Syrians, contrived to intice him out of the city; but, upon his sending a party to examine further into the matter, he found, that they were really fled with the utmost precipitation, and had left their tents, horses, and richest baggage

[but whether the prophet, or the messenger, or the king, is not easy to determine] said, lo! this judgment is from the LORD, and what or why, should I wait any longer for the LORD? They seem therefore to be the words of a man in a kind of despair, and to have been rather spoken by Jehoram, and to imply thus much, if it be true, that this evil, or this famine, is sent us from the LORD, it is in vain to wait any longer for a deliverance from him. It is likely therefore, that the king had designed, before this unnatural accident happened, to have surrendered the city to the king of Syria, and had been dissuaded from it by Elisha, with promise of some speedy relief. Under these dreadful circumstances therefore, he goes and upbraids him with it; Has God, said he, reduced us to such extremity, that mothers are forced to eat their children, and wouldst thou still flatter me with vain hopes of some relief, till all my subjects are perished with hunger and misery, when I might, and ought to have saved their lives by a timely surrender? Whereupon, the prophet appoints the precise time of their despaired of deliverance to be on the very next day.

baggage behind them; for, on the foregoing night, the Lord cauſed them to hear an extraordinary noiſe of chariots, horſes, and armour, which made them conclude, that Jehoram had hired the kings of Egypt and other neighbouring nations againſt them *. This ſpread an univerſal pannic through the whole camp, that they did not ſo much as ſtay to mount their horſes, but fled in the utmoſt confuſion on foot, leaving beſides an immenſe variety of rich plunder, ſuch a quantity of proviſions behind them, that a meaſure of fine flour was ſold for a ſhekel, and the reſt in proportion, at the gate of Samaria, according to the word of Eliſha. At the ſame time, a nobleman who had ventured to declare againſt the poſſibility of ſuch an unexpected plenty, and had been anſwered by the prophet, that he ſhould ſee it without taſting of it, was appointed by the king to ſtand at the gate of the city, to prevent any diſorders, and was notwithſtanding his care trod to death by the preſs, and verified Eliſha's prophecy [i]. The ſiege raiſed. A great plenty in Samaria.

Soon after this unexpected deliverance, the prophet, whether out of diſcontent, or by divine impulſe, took the way to Damaſcus, where the king lay ſick, being quite exhauſted through old age, fatigues, and diſappointments. What the deſign and reſult of that viſit was, the reader may ſee in the hiſtory of Syria [k]. In the mean time, the king of Iſrael entertained himſelf, during his abſence, with the recital of his wonderful actions, from the mouth of his ſervant Gehazi (O); who among other things, was giving him an account of his raiſing of the child of his Shunamitiſh

(O) This ſervant, we read, two or three chapters before, had, for his covetouſneſs, inherited Naaman's leproſy (87), which was, according to Eliſha's word, to ſtick to him as long as he lived, and ſuch perſons were obliged to live apart from the reſt. It is therefore ſomewhat ſurpriſing, that the king of Iſrael would converſe with a man, whom the meaneſt perſon in the kingdom would have carefully avoided. All that can be ſaid to it is, either that he was made to ſtand at a convenient diſtance, and with his mouth covered; or that the king's curioſity made him overlook ſuch nice circumſtances at that particular Juncture.

(P) The occaſion of this miracle was as follows: The woman, who was rich and childleſs, having obſerved the prophet to paſs very often by her houſe, as he went through the city of Shunem, prevailed upon her huſband to build him a bed-chamber, and to put a bed, table, and candleſtick in it, and to invite him to lodge there as often as he pleaſed. Eliſha, deſirous to gratify them for their hoſpitality, aſked his ſervant what he might do for them; and being anſwered that they had no children, he called the woman, and told her, that in due time ſhe ſhould embrace a ſon, as a reward of her kindneſs to him. She was accordingly brought to bed of a child; and when he was grown big enough to go and divert himſelf with reapers, he was one day brought home ſick, and expired about noon in his mother's arms. As ſoon as he was dead, ſhe laid him on the prophet's bed, and made what haſte ſhe could do to mount Carmel, where he then was; and as ſoon as ſhe came in ſight of him, ſhe fell at his feet, and acquainted him with her ſon's death. Eliſha, ſurpriſed that the Lord had never revealed this accident to him, gave Gehazi his ſtaff, and bid him run with all poſſible ſpeed, and lay it upon the dead child; but the woman not daring to truſt to that, embraced his legs, and begged, that he would come with her, which he readily complied with. The ſervant, however, was got to the houſe long before his maſter, and had laid the ſtaff upon the child, but without any ſucceſs. At length, the prophet went up himſelf, and laid himſelf upon the child, mouth to mouth, calling ſtill upon God to reſtore him to his ſorrowful mother, which he at length obtained; and whilſt ſhe received him with a maternal joy, ſhe owned, that ſhe was now more than ever convinced, that he was indeed a prophet, and that the words of truth were in his mouth (88).

During the famine, one of the prophet's widows came to Eliſha, and complained, that her huſband died in debt, and that her two ſons were now upon the brink of being ſeized and ſold by the mercileſs creditor. The prophet, moved with compaſſion, and unable to aſſiſt her any other way than by a miracle, aſked her what ſhe had in her houſe that could be turned into money; and being anſwered, that ſhe had nothing left but a poor cruiſe of oil, he bid her go and borrow as many veſſels of her neighbours as ſhe could, and to fill them out of the cruiſe; which ſhe did, and the oil did not ceaſe flowing out of it, till ſhe had filled all the other veſſels ſeven years of famine. He had ſcarce made an end of the ſtory, when the woman herſelf came, in a luckly hour, to petition the king for her land, which had been confiſcated during her abſence, and gave Gehazi, who preſently called her to mind, an opportunity of being both evidence and advocate for her. So many favourable circumſtances could not but render her ſuit ſucceſsful; but the king did even grant her more than ſhe aſked, and ordered an officer to accompany her, and ſee, that ſhe had not only her land, but likewiſe the ſeven years income of it refunded to her [1].

By this time, Hazael having murdered Benhadad, and invaded his throne, according to the word of Eliſha, Jehoram, who was then at peace with the king of Judah, thought it a favourable juncture to try his fortune againſt Ramoth-Gilead, which his father had attempted in vain. He ſent at the ſame time to Ahaziah, who had ſucceeded his father in Judah, and invited him to accompany him in that enterprize. Ahaziah, who was then but twenty-two years of age veſſels. Eliſha then bid her ſell as much of it as would pay the debt, and keep the reſt for her own uſe †.

After this, Eliſha tarried ſome time in Gilgal, with the reſt of the prophets; and having one day ordered ſome pottage to be made for them, one of the ſervants went to gather a lap-ful of herbs, and inadvertently cut ſome wild gourd, or night-ſhade, among them; as ſoon as they had taſted it, they cried out that death was in the pot; but when he was apprized of it, he cauſed ſome meal to be thrown into the pottage, after which they eat it without fear or danger (89).

At another time, a man having brought him a preſent of firſt-fruits, being twenty barley loaves, and ſome new parched corn, Eliſha bid his ſervant to ſet it before the company, who were about 100 in number. The ſervant heſitated ſome time, thinking it inſufficient for ſuch a multitude; but upon his telling him, that there would be more than enough for them, he obeyed, and found it even as his maſter had ſaid, for they all ate their fill, and left ſome of it remaining (90).

age (Q), being the youngeſt of all his brethren, who had been carried away captive in his father's days, was wholly conducted by his mother Athaliah, and by ſuch counſellors as ſhe pleaſed to appoint to him. And, as he followed all the impious ways of his father, he made no difficulty to enter into a confederacy with the king of Iſrael. This expedition ſeemed at firſt more ſucceſsful than the former; but in the event it proved the fatal ſource of endleſs misfortunes to Iſrael, by giving Hazael an occaſion of exerciſing all thoſe cruelties which had been foretold by Eliſha. Neither did it prove leſs fatal to Jehoram; the city was indeed taken, but himſelf was ſo deſperately wounded in the attack, that he was forced to return to Jezreel to be cured, leaving Jehu at the head of a number of forces to ſecure the place, whilſt the king of Judah probably returned to Jeruſalem. In the mean time, Eliſha ſent one of the young prophets to Ramoth, where he ordered him to anoint Jehu king of Iſrael privately, and to tell him, that he was appointed by God to execute his vengeance againſt the whole race of Ahab, even to the impious Jezebel, whoſe carcaſs ſhould ſhortly be devoured by dogs, whilſt all the reſt of his family were condemned to periſh by his ſword. The prophet had no ſooner executed his commiſſion, and poured the oil upon his head, than he fled out of the tent, with all ſpeed, to avoid being examined about it. But Jehu did not think it proper to have the conſpiracy known, till he had reached Jezreel, and ſurpriſed the wounded king there, before he could be in a condition to oppoſe him; he therefore told them, that if their hearts went with their mouths, they ſhould ſuffer none to get out of Ramoth, to go and acquaint the king with the news, whilſt he rode with all ſpeed at the head of his men to Jezreel, which he did immediately after. As ſoon as he came within ſight of the place, the watch alarmed at the ſight of a troop that drove with ſuch uncommon ſpeed, acquainted the court with it; and the frightened king ſent two meſſengers to enquire, whether they came peaceably or not. But Jehu having made them both turn behind his chariot, and the centinel having acquainted the king with it, he ſent word of it to the king of Judah, who was come to viſit him, and theſe two went with their guard againſt Jehu, who by that time was known by the centinel by the furiouſneſs of his driving. The place where they met one another was the vineyard for which Naboth had loſt his life; and here Jehoram aſked him, whether he came peaceably: but Jehu ſoon gave him proof of the contrary, by upbraiding him with his, and his mother Jezebel's, murders and idolatries, and by putting himſelf in an hoſtile

At the ſame time, the king of Judah, frighted at this bloody tragedy, endeavoured to avoid ſharing his brother's fate, by flying through the private road that led to the garden-houſe; but Jehu commanded a party of his men to ride after him, which they did, and having overtaken him at the aſcent of Gur, they gave him ſo many deſperate wounds, that he died of them by that time he had reached the city of Megiddo, and was carried to Jeruſalem, and buried with his anceſtors, having reigned one year, and leaving only one ſon, a child, who afterwards ſucceeded him, when he was yet but ſeven years of age.

The kings of Iſrael and Judah killed by him.

WHILST Jehu's men went in purſuit of Ahaziah, Jehu himſelf marched directly towards the royal palace of Jezreel, where Jezebel the queen-mother, who was by that time informed of her ſon's fate, was waiting to give him ſuch a haughty welcome, as did not well ſuit with her preſent circumſtances; but ſhe hoped, perhaps, that he would ſhew ſome regard, if not to her quality, yet at leaſt to her ſex; perhaps alſo ſhe did think, that ſhe had ſtill charms enough, in ſpite of her years, to captivate the new monarch, eſpecially after ſhe had improved them by art, and with the richeſt ornaments. She was looking out of a window when Jehu entered the palace; and, in a haughty tone, aſked him, whether he expected a milder recompence of his rebellion, than his predeceſſor Zimri had formerly met with. Jehu ſtayed not to give her an anſwer, but obſerving ſome eunuchs ſtanding on each ſide, he commanded them to throw her out of the window, which they did, and in the fall ſome of her blood was daſhed againſt the wall, and her body ſoon after trampled to death, by the horſes that were in his retinue. As ſoon as he and his company had refreſhed themſelves in the palace, he gave orders to ſome of Jezebel's ſervants to go and bury her corpſe, ſeeing ſhe was of the royal blood; but when word was brought to him, that the dogs had devoured it all except her ſkull, the palms of her hands, and the ſoles of her feet, he made uſe of that circumſtance, to convince his attendants of the truth of Elijah's prophecy [m].

But that prophet's ſentence did not ſtop at theſe three impious perſons, the whole race of Ahab was included in it, and he had left ſeventy ſons who were all brought up under governors in Samaria. Jehu, therefore, did not think fit to enter into that capital, till he had tried, whether the chief magiſtrates of it had courage enough to undertake any thing for the poſterity of their late king. To this end, he ſent letters to them, ſeemingly to exhort them to make choice of one of the braveſt of Ahab's ſons, and to ſet him upon the throne. But they, who did rightly gueſs at the meaning of ſuch a meſſage, and were but too much intimidated by his late ſucceſs againſt the kings of Judah and Iſrael, choſe rather to ſacrifice that unhappy race to Jehu's known valour, than to run the riſk of turning it againſt themſelves. They therefore ſent a deputation to him, to acquaint him, that they would do nothing but by his commands, which they were ready to execute, as ſoon as they ſhould receive them; whereupon, he ſent them an order to put all the young princes to death, and to bring their heads in baſkets to him by the next day; which was punctually complied with. The bloody preſent of ſeventy heads was ſent to Jezreel on that very night; and Jehu ordered them to be laid on heaps at the gate of Samaria; and, on the next morning, the elders of that city came, and preſented themſelves before him there. As ſoon as he ſaw them, he ſpake to them to this effect: "You do, in all probability, look upon me as the ſole "author of all this bloodſhed, as the murderer of your "late king, and the uſurper of his throne; but if I con- "ſpired againſt Jehoram, did not you murder all theſe "young princes, in whoſe defence you might have ſtood, "if you had thought fit. Know you therefore, that nei- "ther you, nor I, have done more than executed the ſen- "tence, which had been pronounced againſt Ahab's po- "ſterity. But I have not yet finiſhed my taſk, as long as "there remain any of his kinſmen, counſellors, prieſts, "or any of the abettors of his crimes." This was his next work, and he did not leave Jezreel, till he had put them all to death.

70 Sons of Ahab killed.

Jehu took then the road to Samaria, and in his way he met forty-two princes of the houſe of Judah (S), who were going going down to pay a viſit to thoſe of the houſe of Ahab, all whom he alſo cauſed to be ſlain upon the ſpot. After this, he met with Jehonadab the ſon of Rechab (T), and took

we have often obſerved, that it means alſo brother's children; and theſe are called ſo accordingly, by the author of the Chronicles (97). The place where they were ſlain is called in the original, בור בית־עקד Bor Beth-Heked, or, the pit of the houſe for binding or ſhearing, which was either a place of ſheep-ſhearing, or, as ſome fancy, took its name from the young princes being bound and put to death there (98). It is not unlikely neither from the text, that they, having heard of the ſlaughters that had been made in Samaria, and that Jehu was going thither in perſon, might hide themſelves, either in that pit, or in ſome of the ſhepherds huts, to avoid falling into his hands.

(T) The Rechabites, ſo famous in ſcripture for the auſtere ſingularity of their life, were not content to excel in common moral virtues, but affected to diſtinguiſh themſelves from the reſt of the world, by a peculiar abſtinence from wine, from dwelling in houſes, from poſſeſſing either houſes, vineyards, or fields, and from all kind of agriculture (99).

Who the author of this inſtitution was, whether the Jehonadab here mentioned, or any other either before or after him, is far from being agreed. If we may believe a modern critic (100), he hath found the etymon of Rechab in the רכב Rekeb, or chariot of Elijah, and that of the Phariſees, his ſuppoſed diſciples, in the פרשים Phraſhim, or horſes of it (1). So that, according to him, the words of Eliſha ſhould not be rendered as we do, My father, my father, the chariot of Iſrael, and the horſes thereof; but, My father Rechab, &c. or at leaſt the former called themſelves Rechabites from the Rechab, chariot, and the latter from the Phraſhim, or horſes of it. Purſuant to this, our author obſerves, that when Joaſh, king of Iſrael, came to viſit Eliſha as he lay on his death-bed, he addreſſed him likewiſe in the ſame words, My father the chariot of Iſrael, and ſo on (2.) He even ventures to prove that inſtitution older than the flood; which, allowing his far-fetched etymology, will be no difficult taſk, if we can but ſuppoſe, that Enoch, was tranſlated in the ſame kind of vehicle (3).

On the other hand, another bold critic (4) pretends, that it did not begin till about the time of Jeremiah, and that this Jehonadab,

nadab, for whom Jehu ſhewed ſuch regard, was only a perſon of the ſame name with the founder of that Rechabitiſh life, and that he was too great a courtier, and too fine a gentleman, to be author of ſuch an unpolite inſtitution. What he offers to prove the one, and diſprove the other, of theſe points, having more of oratorial confidence than ſolid reaſoning, we ſhall not trouble our readers with it. Sure it is, that thoſe Rechabites, whom Jeremiah ſpeaks of, expreſs themſelves in ſuch terms, as argue nothing leſs than the recentneſs of their inſtitution (5).

Between the extremes of thoſe two above-mentioned authors, are thoſe who believe, that Hobab the ſon of Jethro, of whom we have ſpoken elſewhere, as he was a Kenite *, was the founder of the Rechabites; that Rechab was one of his names, and Jehonadab one of his deſcendants; and, laſtly, that Heber the Kenite was alſo an obſerver of the Rechabitiſh inſtitution (6). Serrarius is of the ſame opinion in moſt of theſe points, but diſtinguiſhes two ſorts of Rechabites, the one inſtituted by Jethro, or Hobab, and the other by Jehonadab (7); but all this is ſaid without foundation. We ſhall ſay nothing of thoſe who pretend, that they were, either of the tribe of Judah (8), or of that of Levi (9), or that they were Rechabites, or deſcendants of Jethro, by the father's ſide, and Levites by the mother's, and, as ſuch, that they were employed in much the ſame offices of the temple with the Nethinims (10). It is plain the author of the book of the Chronicles calls them Kenites, deſcended from Kemarh, the father of the houſe of Rechab (11), though it doth not appear, that all the Kenites obſerved the inſtitution of Jehonadab, but only thoſe who were his immediate deſcendants.

For theſe reaſons, we rather chuſe the moſt-received opinion, that Jehonadab, Jehu's friend, was the founder of it, he being the only one of that name mentioned in the ſcripture, and nothing urged on any hand that can give any of the contrary opinions the face of probability. Jehu's behaviour to him, and his inviting of him to be an eye-witneſs of his zeal for the God of Iſrael, and of the havock he was going to make among the worſhippers of Baal, argues him to have been an eminent perſon, not only for sense and virtue, but also for his uncommon piety and zeal; and as such he might have fallen into this new life, and enjoined the observance of it to his posterity, perhaps through some disgust which he took at court, or at the idolatries of the Israelites, which made it needful to separate from them, by living in the pure and untainted country, to avoid the danger of being either corrupted by them, or hated for not being so. The Kenites not being of the seed of Israel, many broils and disputes might have arisen between them about the possession of lands, which might make him disclaim even the use and culture of them. The almost continual depredations to which Israel was exposed from their enemies round about, to say nothing of famine and pestilence, made the pastoral life seem to him much more eligible, because in such cases it was more easy to remove into better or safer abodes, in imitation of the ancient patriarchs. Wine was of too ensnaring a nature, and might in time have tempted his descendants into a looser and more luxurious life; for which reason, he thought it necessary to forbid the use of it. Lastly, whatever other private motives might determine him to that kind of primitive life, he seems chiefly to endear it to his descendants by the prospect of health, ease, and length of days (12). How far the horrid debauchery, both in religion and morals, which reigned as well in Judah as in Israel for a considerable time, to say nothing of the frequent conspiracies and rebellions which happened in the latter of those kingdoms, might contribute to determine, if not to force, a man of his character to this kind of retired life, we need not say.

The question will only be, how he could bind his posterity to the observance of it. But here we need not repeat what has been said upon other occasions, concerning the power of parents in cases of the like nature *, because we do not find, that Jehonadab did lay them under any curse, in case of disobedience; on the contrary, we find, that the prophet Jeremy was directed by God to bring them to an apartment of the temple, to set wine before them, and invite them to drink it, which would have been an unworthy action, if they had been under an indispensible obligation of abstaining from it; and, on the other hand, the Rechabites refused it, not because their father had laid them under any curse if they disobeyed them, but because he promised, that they should live many days in the land wherein they were strangers, if zeal for that deity, than any of his predeceſſors; and ordered all its prieſts, prophets, and votaries, to be preſent at

if they obeyed his voice (13); which promiſe, being alſo made to thoſe who honoured their parents (14), might the more incline them to that ſtrict obedience, for which they are ſo highly commended by God, in the place above quoted. We may add farther, that their retiring into Jeruſalem during the time of the ſiege, which was a breach of the injunction, without being ſo much as blamed for it by Jeremiah, is a proof, that they were not under an indiſpenſible obligation to live in tents and in the country. Though even here, we think, it had been much better for them to have removed further out of Nebuchadnezzar's way, inſtead of ſheltering themſelves in the city; where they not only ſuffered all the common calamities of a long ſiege, but were, in all likelihood, carried away captive with the tribe of Judah; for we find ſome of them, at their return from Babylon, who ſettled themſelves at Jabeſh, or Jabez (15); and the ſeptuagint and vulgate have theſe words in the title of the 70th which is our 71ſt pſalm, A Pſalm of David to the ſons of Jonadab and the firſt captives; but as they are not in the Hebrew, we ſhall lay no farther ſtreſs upon them.

What became of them afterwards, whether they continued to obſerve their father's injunction, and whether the Phariſees, Aſſidees, and Eſſenians, were their followers, is foreign to our preſent purpoſe, and may perhaps be inquired into, when we reſume the Jewiſh hiſtory after the captivity. It is true, the Rechabites had a promiſe from God, as a reward of their obedience, in theſe words, Jehonadab, the ſon of Rechab, ſhall not want a man to ſtand before me for ever (16); but this phraſe is far from implying, that they were either prieſts or levites, and as ſuch ſhould continually miniſter at the altar, as ſome have fancied (17); or, that they ſhould have a ſeat in the great ſanhedrin (18), which, we have proved elſewhere, was not yet in being †. The reader will ſee ſome better expoſitions of the words in the authors quoted in the margin (19), which it is out of our province to dwell upon. Sure it is, that if our Jehonadab was the founder of this inſtitution, his deſcendants did ſtrictly obſerve it during the ſpace of 300 years, whatever became of them afterwards; for ſo long it was between Jehu and the Babyloniſh captivity. A Jewiſh traveller of the

at it, none excepted, under pain of death; and as ſoon as they had filled the temple with them, from the one end to the other, he commanded a body of men to go in, and put them all to the ſword, in the middle of their worſhip. After this, he took down all the idols and ornaments of that abominable deity, and burnt them out of the temple, and cauſed that building to be demoliſhed, and turned into a common jakes. But this metropolis was not the only place that had reared temples and altars to Baal, for the infection had ſpread itſelf throughout the kingdom; wherefore he did not ſtop his hand, till he had entirely cleared it of that kind of idolatry; and this he did with ſuch zeal and diligence, that God, highly pleaſed with it, ſent him word by a prophet, that the kingdom of Iſrael ſhould remain in his poſterity till the fourth generation. Happy had it been for him, if this promiſe had encouraged him to have extirpated likewiſe the worſhip of the golden calves of Dan and Bethel; but he unhappily followed Jeroboam's politicks as long as he lived; for which reaſon, God began to cut Iſrael ſhort, even from the beginning of his reign; ſo that Hazael greatly prevailed againſt them, and took a great number of towns from the two tribes and half on the other ſide of Jordan, beſides ſome other frontier places on this ſide, and ravaged all the places he came to, putting all the inhabitants to the ſword in the moſt inhuman manner (V), as we have ſeen in the Syrian hiſtory.

the 12th century (20) doth, indeed, tell us, that they are ſtill in being, and ſtrict obſervers of their old inſtitution. He gives us alſo a fine deſcription of their country, princes, government, and other particulars; but that author is ſo well known to deal in fables, and the account itſelf is ſo fully confuted by the learned Conſtantine L'empereur, that we ſhall leave it to his Jewiſh brethren to credit it, without giving our readers the trouble of reading it here.

(V) It is not eaſy to gueſs at what period of Jehu's reign this cruel war happened; Uſher doth make no mention of it till the time of his ſon (21), but we have ventured to place it nearer the beginning of the former, both here and in the Syrian hiſtory (22), which is according to the chronology of our Bibles; for though God had promiſed, that the crown of Iſrael ſhould continue in his ſtory †, Jehu died in the 28th year of his reign, and was buried in Samaria, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Jehoahaz [n].

WHILST Jehu was aboliſhing the worſhip of Baal in Iſrael, the impious Athaliah was uſing her utmoſt efforts to root out, not only that of the living God, but even the remembrance of it, out of Judah. The death of her ſon Ahaziah, and of forty-two princes of his houſe, followed by that of Jezebel, by the hands of a perſon, newly raiſed to the throne of Iſrael by divine command, filled her with ſuch an abhorrence both for the race and the God of David, that ſhe reſolved not to ſheath her ſword, till ſhe had totally extirpated the one, and thereby invalidated all the promiſes of the other. But whilſt ſhe was wreaking her utmoſt fury againſt the ſad remains of the houſe of Judah, providence conducted thither Jehoſheba, the daughter of the late king Joram, who was then married to the high-prieſt Jehoiada [o]; and that pious princeſs found means to ſave young Joaſh, her brother Ahaziah's ſon, who was then but a year old, from Athaliah's ſword, and to convey him and his nurſe out of the palace, unperceived by that bloody queen. This infant prince was carried into the temple, where he was brought up under Jehoiada's care, and kept there with the utmoſt privacy till he was ſeven years old. During thoſe ſix years, Athaliah tyrannized over Judah without controul, filling Jeruſalem with blood, and deſtroying the ſervants of the true God, that ſhe might the more effectually eſtabliſh the worſhip of Baal through the kingdom. By this time, her murders and impieties were grown to ſuch a height, that Jehoiada ſaw himſelf forced to put a ſtop to them, by producing the only remains of David's race, at once to convince the people, that God was ſtill mindful of his promiſe to that holy monarch, by preſerving him, as it were by a miracle, from the common ruin; and to inſpire his deſ-desponding subjects, with a brave desire of shaking off the bloody yoke of the reigning tyranness. To this end, he privately called some of the chiefs and elders of Judah, upon whose valour and fidelity he could depend, and having bound them under the strictest oaths of secrecy, he shewed them the young monarch; told them by what means he had been saved; and exhorted them to stand now, if ever, in the defence of their young king, of their religion, and liberty. The desponding chiefs, who thought, that the cruel Athaliah had wholly extirpated David's race, and had lost all farther hopes in the promises made to his posterity, received the news of their preserved king with a surprising joy; and, to give him an immediate proof of their future zeal and attachment, they paid their homage, and took an oath of fidelity to him, promising the high-priest at the same time, that they would go out of hand, and raise what forces they could, whilst he strengthened himself in the temple, by retaining and arming all the priests, levites, and Nethinims, who should otherwise have gone out in their courses, to make way for those who came thither to vacate at the divine service. All this was done with such secrecy and dispatch, that the temple was filled with armed men, unto whom Jehoiada appointed their several posts; by which time the generals without had raised a sufficient number of men, ready to second them upon the first signal. When the day appointed was come, the young monarch was brought out, and conducted into the priests porch, attended with a numerous train of armed levites, and there the high-priest anointed, and crowned him, and administered the usual oath to him upon the sacred volumes. He was immediately after seated upon a throne, where he received the homage and loud acclamations of all the people, who made that sacred place ring with, Long live king Joash.

Year of the Flood, 2121. Year before Christ, 878.

AMONG the numerous crouds, whom this noise brought to the temple, was the frighted queen, but whether alone, or attended with her guard, the text doth not say. She ventured directly into the priest's porch, from which her sex and idolatry excluded her, and as soon as she saw the young king seated on his throne, attended with such numbers of armed men, she rent her cloaths, and, in a desperate fury, rushed in amongst them, crying out treason; but Jehoiada, fearing lest his zealous levites should pollute that sacred place with her blood, ordered her to be hurried out of it, and to be put to death. The king was soon after after conducted from the temple to the royal palace, and the news of this happy change proclaimed throughout the kingdom. The high-prieſt, who by this time was in the higheſt eſteem both with king and people, took hold of this happy juncture of the public joy, to root out once more the worſhip of Baal; he began with exhorting them to renew their covenant with God, to renounce Baal and all other falſe deities, and to adhere ſtrictly to the Lord. This was alſo immediately performed with uncommon readineſs and zeal; and as a mark of their ſincerity, they began with the temple of Baal, where having ſacrificed Mathan, the infamous prieſt of it, at the foot of its altar, they pulled the whole fabrick to the ground; nor did they ſtop their hand, till they had likewiſe deſtroyed all the other temples, altars, and other monuments of that idolatrous worſhip, which Athaliah and her predeceſſors had reared up, both in Jeruſalem and Judah. On the other hand, Jehoiada, who, by reaſon of the king's minority, was at the head of all affairs, both religious and civil, was making a new reformation at court and in the temple, by naming thoſe, who had ſhewed the greateſt bravery and zeal in the late revolution to the higheſt poſts in the government, inſtead of thoſe of the late uſurper; and by reſtoring that regularity in the divine ſervice, which had been interrupted during the reigns of ſo many impious monarchs; but more particularly by an expreſs prohibition to all ſtrangers, and idolatrous apoſtates, to enter into the temple of God, and by ſetting porters at the gates of it, to prevent all unclean perſons, of what kind ſoever, entering into it [p]. This gives us reaſon to ſuppoſe, that it had been expoſed to ſuch ſecluded perſons, during the laſt reigns.

Joaſh's piety and zeal.

THUS did the divine providence preſerve the race of David from the brink of deſtruction, and Joaſh, who was proclaimed king in the 7th year of his age, and of Jehu's reign, continued to teſtify his grateful ſenſe of it, by his uncommon zeal for the worſhip of God, during the good high-prieſt's life. One of his firſt cares, after he was come to age, was to repair the dilapidations which had been made in the temple. To this end, he ordered all the prieſts and levites to take their yearly circuits through all the cities of Judah, and to raiſe voluntary contributions among the people, people, beſides the pole and redemption money (W); to be employed in finiſhing thoſe repairs. But the prieſts, who looked upon the latter as an encroachment upon their revenues, executed his orders with ſuch ſhameful ſlowneſs, that he was forced to ſend for them, and to reprove them for their negligence, and for their miſapplying of the ſacred money; and to diſcharge them at once, both from the repairing of the temple, and from receiving any further ſums towards it. The whole care of the work was committed to the high-prieſt, and other proper officers; and, to prevent all further delays and miſapplication, a capacious cheſt was ordered to be ſet up in ſome public place in the temple, where the money was depoſited, till it amounted to a ſum ſufficient to ſet about the work; which it very ſhortly did, through the generoſity of the chiefs, elders, and other wealthy men of Judah, who poured in their preſents with uncommon readineſs and munificence. This money was immediately diſtributed among faithful workmen, who carried on the work with ſo much uprightneſs and diligence, that, without being called to any account for the ſums they received from time to time, they finiſhed it to the ſatisfaction both of the king and people, and refunded the overplus into the king's hands. This, together with what was left in the cheſt, was by Jehoiada's direction employed in making gold and ſilver veſſels for the uſe of the temple, ſuch as cenſers, trumpets, ſpoons, forks, and the like (X), inſtead of thoſe which Athaliah had

(W) The pole-money is ſuppoſed to have been the half ſhekel, which every ſoul was obliged to pay, firſt to the tabernacle, and afterwards to the temple, which continued to be paid till the deſtruction of it. As for the redemption-money, it was ſuch as was to be paid to the prieſts, either to be acquitted from certain oaths or vows, or for exchanging one beaſt for another, and ſuch like; of which we have ſpoken at large heretofore. This latter was certainly one part of the prieſt's income, which the king had no power to alienate from them, unleſs it were by way of repriſal for the former, namely, pole-money, which ought to have been employed in keeping the temple in repair, and which, it ſeems, they ſunk into their own pockets, leaving that building to go to ruin.

(X) There ſeems to be a contradiction between the book of Kings, and that of the Chronicles; the former tells us, that none of this money was employed in making veſſels for the temple (23), and had conveyed from thence into the temple of Baal [q]. But Joaſh's zeal did not long ſurvive Jehoiada's life. That good old prieſt died in the 130th year of his age, and for his faithful counſel, as well as ſignal ſervices to the king and nation, was buried in the royal ſepulchre of Jeruſalem, and with him ſeemed to expire the remembrance of all that he had done. Soon after his death, the baſe princes (Y) of Judah, tired with diſſembling a zeal for God, which that pontiff's authority had only forced from them, came and proſtrated themſelves before the king, deſiring, that they might have leave to return to their old way of worſhip, which they had been uſed to in former reigns; which the eaſy king, pleaſed perhaps with their uncommon ſubmiſſion, having too readily granted, they immediately forſook the temple and worſhip of God, and ſet up new altars to thoſe filthy idols which they had formerly been uſed to worſhip in their groves with the moſt abominable ceremonies. This ungrateful defection, after ſo ſignal a deliverance, was not, however, puniſhed, till they had been often forewarned, by ſeveral prophets, of the miſchiefs which it would bring upon them. But when they proved deaf to all thoſe divine admonitions, God ſtirred up the Syrian king againſt them, who began to pour ſome ſmall number of troops into the land, and to commit ſevere outrages in Judea, whilſt the cowardly Jews, though much ſuperior in number, were delivered into their hands, as a puniſhment for their idolatry [r]. Among thoſe prophets who dared to reprove the king and his nobles, and to aſſure them that theſe would prove only the preludes of worſe miſchiefs, was the high-prieſt and the latter affirms the contrary (24); but the matter is eaſily reconciled, by ſuppoſing, that the firſt means only, that none of that money was uſed to thoſe purpoſes, till the repairs of the temple, for which it was raiſed, were fully finiſhed.

(Y) The author of the book of Chronicles calls them by that name (25), not as being of the royal blood, for thoſe had been all deſtroyed by Athaliah, ſo that there were none alive then but Joaſh's children; but here is meant only the chiefs of the families of that tribe, which, as well as thoſe of the other tribes, are often dignified with that title (26).

priest Zechariah, the worthy son and successor of the late Jehoiada; but his zeal cost him his life. The impious king caused him to be stoned to death in the very court of the temple, without regard to either the sacredness of the place, or of his character, as a prophet and high-priest, or to the great services of his father, to whom he owed both his life and kingdom. However, Zechariah, being full of the spirit of God, foretold to them, as he was dying, that God would speedily punish the murder upon the king and them, both which happened soon after accordingly: for Hazael, flushed with the success he had had against Judah, and with the vast quantity of spoil which he had sent from thence to Damascus, came up against Jerusalem, and made a terrible slaughter among those Jewish princes, who had been the first authors of that defection. The king himself found no other way to escape, either sharing of their fate, or a shameful slavery, but by stripping the temple and his own palace of all their treasure, and giving it as a ransom to the Syrian conqueror, who thereupon left Jerusalem, and returned to Damascus [s]. Joash, however, did not escape the divine vengeance, and though he then laboured under some grievous disease, his own servants conspired against him, and murdered him in his bed, in the 40th year of his reign, and crowned his son Amasiah in his stead. Joash was by this time in such abhorrence for the murder of the high-priest, that it proved not only the occasion of his own, but also of his being deprived of the royal sepulchre, for though he was buried in the city of David, yet the text says, that they did not deposit his body in the sepulchre of his ancestors, but in some place apart [t].

AMASIAH succeeded him in the twenty-fifth year of his age, by which time Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, having reigned 17 years in Israel, had left the kingdom to his son Joash. During this time, nothing considerable had happened in that kingdom, except that their idolatries had also exposed them to the cruel oppressions of the king of Syria; till Jehohaz's repentance and prayer obtained a kind of miraculous deliverance [u]; for the fuller account of which, we shall refer the reader to a former chapter †. What happened during his son's reign, we shall see in its proper place; in the mean mean time, the young king of Judah had no ſooner ſettled himſelf upon his throne, than he cauſed the murderers of his father to be put to death. However, it is here obſerved, that he ſpared their children, according to the law of Moſes, which forbids them to be puniſhed for their father's crimes [w]; from which one may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that all his predeceſſors were not equally ſtrict obſervers of it. The truth is, that Amaſiah had ſeen ſuch ſevere judgments inflicted upon Joaſh his father and his apoſtate chiefs, as made him a long time afraid to imitate them; though he forgot them but too ſoon, and, like Joaſh, having began his reign piouſly and ſucceſsfully, he made as impious and tragical an end of it. His ſignal ſucceſs againſt the Edomites of which an account has been formerly given *, promiſed to him by God himſelf, did but too much ſwell the heart of that young monarch; he had an army of 300,000 fighting men, and had hired 100,000 more of the king of Iſrael, when he was going upon that expedition. But a prophet came to him, and commanded him, in the name of God to diſmiſs thoſe auxiliaries, aſſuring him, that ſuch idolatrous troops would only be an invincible obſtacle to his ſucceſs, if he perſiſted in making uſe of them. The king, upon the point of obeying, was only ſollicitous how to get back the 100 talents of ſilver which he had already paid for them; but the prophet having told him, that God was able to repay them to him with advantage, he diſmiſſed the Iſraelitiſh troops, not without great reſentment and heart-burning on their ſide, of which they failed not to give an ample proof, by burning and ravaging all the countries they went through, in their return home. This broke at once all friendſhip between thoſe two monarchs, and proved the ſource of a bloody war. Happy had it been for Amaſiah if this had been all, but that infatuated prince, after his victory over Edom, became ſo ſtupidly fond of the idols which he had taken from them, that, as if all his ſucceſs had been owing to them, he cauſed them to be ſet up in Judah at his return, and went ſo far as to burn incenſe himſelf before them. He was ſeverely rebuked for this by a prophet, who aſked him, among other things, what aſſiſtance he could hope for from thoſe falſe deities, which could neither deliver their votaries, nor themſelves, from his hands? But the king who was then too elated to bear either his advice or reproof, aſked him, who who made him his counſellor, and, in a threatening tone, commanded him to hold his peace, and not provoke him to puniſh his inſolence. After ſuch monſtrous inſtances of his folly and ingratitude, we need not wonder, if he was abandoned by God to ruſh into his own ruin.

AMASIAH had indeed cauſe to reſent the ravages which the diſbanded Iſraelites had committed in his kingdom, during his expedition againſt Edom, and had he been leſs proud of his ſucceſs, he might have taken more proper meaſures for doing himſelf juſtice for them; but he ſeems to have been above all theſe conſiderations, and the inſolent challenge which he ſent to Joaz, the then king of Iſrael, and grandſon of Jehu, Come and let us ſee one another in the face, doth plainly ſhow, that he wanted only to try his valour or fortune with him. On the other hand, Joaz had no leſs reaſon to truſt to his own; Joaz, ſoon after his acceſſion to the crown, had been paying a mournful viſit to the prophet Eliſha, who was then lying on his death-bed, to repreſent, to that holy perſon, the melancholy ſtate in which he was going to leave the kingdom, which had already ſuffered the greateſt calamities from the kings of Syria, during the two laſt reigns; and the prophet touched with a ſenſe of it, had propheſied to him, that he ſhould gain three ſucceeding victories over that domineering nation [x]. Joaz therefore, who had by this time given ſuch ſignal proofs of his courage and conduct, by theſe three victories, which he had gained over the Syrians, and by recovering all the places which they had taken from his predeceſſors (Z), could not forbear

(Z) It is not eaſy to determine the time when Jehu won theſe three victories; but however, it is more than probable, that it was long before he received this proud challenge from Amaſiah, as he was then in the 16th year of his reign (27). The text would even incline one to believe, that he began to beat the Syrians ſoon after the beginning of it (28). Archbiſhop Uſher places it in the ſix and ſubſequent years of his reign, when having, as he ſuppoſes, taken his ſon, the brave Jeroboam II. into conſortſhip with him; he left the kingdom under his care, whilſt he went out againſt the armies of Syria (29).

The manner, in which the good old prophet did foreſhow theſe ſignal victories, is too remarkable to be paſt by. The king having expreſt forbear expreſſing the utmoſt indignation at the receipt of this arrogant chartel. The anſwer he returned was couched expreſt his ſenſe for the loſs of ſo great a protector, in the moſt pathetic terms, Eliſha bid him take his bow and arrow in his hand, and put himſelf in a poſture of ſhooting out of his window eaſtward towards Syria; which being done, he put his hand upon that of the king's and bid him ſhoot, and as the arrow went, he cried out, The arrow of the Lord's deliverance, and the arrow of deliverance from Syria; and then told the king, that he would beat the Syrians in Apheck, till he had quite conſumed them. But when he bid him afterwards to ſmite upon the ground with another arrow, and the king had done ſo three times, the prophet was diſpleaſed at it, and told him, that if he had happened to have ſtruck the ground five or ſix times, it would have been a certain ſign of his totally defeating of his Syrian enemy; but ſince he had ſtayed his hand at the third ſtroke, he ſhould gain but three battles againſt him (30). The thing happened accordingly, and Syria, after having been kept under, during Joaz and Jeroboam's reign, began to recover itſelf again, after the death of the latter, as we have ſeen elſewhere †.

As for Eliſha, he died ſoon after; and before the year was out, ſome Iſraelites, going to bury a corps in the neighbourhood of Samaria, perceived a band of Moabites coming towards them, for fear of whom, they caſt the dead body into Eliſha's tomb and fled; but as ſoon as it had touched the bones of the dead prophet, the man revived and ran after them. What uſe a neighbouring church has made of this miracle, in favour of the relicks of their ſaints, is foreign to our ſubject: we have Eliſha's panegyric in few words in the book of Eccleſiaſticus, "Eliſheus, ſays that author, was "filled with the ſpirit of Elijah; whilſt he lived, he was not over-"awed by any prince, neither could any bring him into ſubjection, "no word could overcome him; and after his death he pro-"pheſied, &c. (31)". The Jews add, that the man thus miraculouſly raiſed was called Sallum, and that he begat ſons and daughters afterwards. Some are of opinion, that he had been a wicked man, and, as ſuch, unfit to lie near the ſacred remains of that prophet; others think otherwiſe (32), neither is it worth enquiring which of the two is moſt in the right.

Some authors, however, not content with the miracles that he wrought during his life and after his death, have accompanied his birth with a remarkable one; namely, that one of the golden calves

ed in the moſt ſcornful and mortifying terms, under the allegory of a deſpicable thiſtle, which, having aſpired to an alliance with the noble cedar, had, for his ambition, been cruſhed under the feet of a wild beaſt: he concluded with adviſing him to reſt contented with his late petty victories, and not ſuffer his ambition to drive him into a deſperate attempt, which would end, in all likelyhood, in the total loſs of his kingdom. But Amaſiah, who was not to be humbled by words, was only the more exaſperated at this anſwer, and haſted to go out againſt his rival: the two armies met in the neighbourhood of Bethſhemeſh, where Judah was totally routed. Joſephus adds, that they were ſeized with ſuch a pannic, at the very firſt onſet, that they turned their backs without ſtriking one ſtroke, and left their king at the mercy of the conqueror [y]. Amaſiah was actually taken priſoner, and Joaz marched on with him and his own army to Jeruſalem, where he obliged him to buy his freedom, at the expence of all the gold and ſilver which were found either in the temple or in his own treaſury; after which, having demoliſhed about 400 cubits length of the city wall, and taken ſome hoſtages with him, he returned to Samaria. He did not outlive this victory above one year, after which he was ſucceeded by his ſon Jeroboam, the ſecond of that name, after he had reigned 16 years. As for Amaſiah, though he outlived his diſgrace above 15 years, yet we read no more of him till the latter end of his reign; when, having diſcovered a conſpiracy that was formed againſt him at Jeruſalem, he was forced to flee to Lachiſh, where, notwithſtanding his precaution, he was purſued and murdered by the conſpirators. He was carried back upon horſes to Jeruſalem, and buried with his anceſtors; and his ſon Azariah proclaimed in his ſtead [z].

Jeroboam II. the brave great-grandſon of Jehu, ſeemed ordained by providence to reſtore the kingdom of Iſrael to its priſtine ſplendor and greatneſs. His reign, which laſted 41 years, beſides thoſe 10 which he had ſpent in copartnerſhip with his father, gave him time more than ſufficient to perform that noble work, to which he was encouraged by the prophets Jonah, the ſon of Amittai (A), and Hoſea, the ſon of Beeri, who were cotemporaries with him, and foretold, that he ſhould complete the deliverance of Iſrael which his father had began, notwithſtanding his cleaving to the idolatries of his predeceſſors. Accordingly, he took the Syrian capital Damaſcus, and Hamath, with all their territories; both which had formerly belonged to Judah [a], and all the country on the other ſide of Jordan, from Hamath to the ſea of the plain, or the dead ſea [b]. The particulars of all theſe glorious actions are unknown to us, having been written in the annals of the kings of Iſrael, long ſince loſt. He died in the 41ſt year of his reign, and was buried with his anceſtors in Samaria, and ſucceeded by his ſon Zachariah [c]. Jeroboam's reign was indeed a glorious one, with reſpect to his conqueſts, but it ſtands branded for various idolatries, and for the injuſtice, luxury, rapine, and other immoralities which reigned at that time; inſomuch, that the prophets Hoſea and Amos, who lived in his days, give us a very dreadful account of

(A) This is the ſame Jonah, or Jonas, as he is called in the goſpel (34), who was afterwards ſent to preach repentance to the Ninivites (35). Uſher juſtly obſerves, that he was a native of Gathepher (36), a town in the tribe of Zebulun (37), in Galilee of the Gentiles (38), againſt that falſe affirmation of the Jews; That out of Galilee there never aroſe a prophet (39). It is uncertain, whether thoſe glorious ſucceſſes, which he foretold to the king of Iſrael, were committed to writing, and ſince loſt, or, which is more probable, were only delivered by word of mouth. We have nothing left of him but the book that bears his name, which relates to his being ſent to preach repentance at Niniveh, the metropolis of Aſſyria, and is therefore foreign to our preſent ſubject.

the disorders and debauchery, which were committed both in Samaria and in Israel (B), and were sent to foretel the sad

(B) The former of these prophets seems to accuse the Israelites (40) of the same enormities, as had been formerly committed in Gibeath, where the Levite's concubine had been abused to death (41). He speaks of their having multiplyed their idols to a shameful degree all over the kingdom, for which, and for all their other abominable practices, he denounces a total ruin and desolation to the king and people; which he also lived to see accomplished in the sixth year of Hezechiah, when Israel was carried away captive (42).

Hosea's prophecy begins with the command, which he received from God, to go and marry a common prostitute, and to adopt her spurious brood (43); a command, which has given so much offence to the pious, and has administered such occasion of ridicule to the libertines, that we hope it will not be thought improper to set the matter in a true light, for the benefit of those, who have not leisure, or opportunity, to consult the best commentators upon it. And here we may safely reject the solution of those subtile doctors, who pretend, that God may dispense with the laws of purity; or of those, who look upon this marriage to have been transacted only in a vision, or that it is only a parable; such evasions do often leave a greater difficulty, than they endeavour to remove.

Nothing is more obvious, than that the scriptures, we may add all languages, give to men and things the qualities they formerly had; thus the blind and deaf are said to see and hear, the dead to live, sinners to be reformed, and publicans and harlots [not those certainly who continued such, but those who were converted] to enter into the kingdom of God, before the priests, elders, and outwardly sanctified Pharisees (44). Will it not therefore be more natural to think, with better commentators (45), that the woman, whom the prophet is commanded to marry, had been a common prostitute before she became his wife? The priests indeed were forbid to marry such women, but none else; and provided they were reclaimed by it from their wicked lives, there was nothing in such marriages unworthy of a prophet. On the contrary, it was the propereſt emblem of God's merciful dealings with the Israelites, whom he espoused and adopted, notwithstanding all their former wickedness, and from whom he might justly challenge the suitable returns of obedience, faithfulness, and gratitude;

ſad and total ruin, which their ſins would ſhortly bring upon the whole kingdom. Amos, in particular, was ſent from Judah, where he was a common ſhepherd, to denounce the moſt ſevere judgments againſt Iſrael, even to the total diſperſion of it; which he did under the types of graſhoppers, which deſtroyed all the fruit of the land; of a devouring fire; and laſtly, of a plummet line and a tottering wall, ready to bury the idols of Iſrael under its ruins [d]. titude; but which if they failed of, they could expect nothing but divorcement and rejection, ſuch as a woman in Gomer's caſe would deſerve, if ſhe ſhould relapſe into her former vices, after ſhe had been ſo kindly reclaimed from them (46).

We may add, that Hoſea, or, as the original calls him, הושע Hoſheagh, which word implies a Saviour, was a kind of type of Chriſt, who, we know, came to eſpouſe to himſelf a church, conſiſting, not of righteous, or of thoſe that thought themſelves ſuch, but of repenting ſinners, of all kinds and nations, and to reclaim them from their ſins by his precepts and example, as well as by grace and holy ſpirit. This typical marriage might therefore have a view to him, as well as to the literal ſalvation of Judah, and ruin of Iſrael, with which his prophecies are filled. This may further appear to be the caſe, if we conſider the names, character, and other circumſtances, relating to the children which the prophet had by this woman; particularly their changing of their names from Lo-Ammi, thou art not my people, into Ammi, thou art my people; and from Lo-Ruhamah, ſhe ſhall have no mercy, to Ruhamah, ſhe ſhall obtain mercy; as alſo, their becoming as numerous as the ſands of the ſea; all which ſeem chiefly to relate to the converſion of mankind to the chriſtian religion. But theſe are out of our province.

Hoſea is the firſt, whoſe prophecies we have had tranſmitted in writing; he continued in the exerciſe of his prophetical office near the ſpace of 70 years, during the reigns of Uzziah, or Azariah, Jothan, Ahaz, and Hezechiah. His prophecies are divided into 14 chapters; in the four firſt, he expoſes the various iniquities of the ten tribes; from thence to the 12th chapter, he denounces the puniſhments impending on them, particularly their deſtruction by Shalmanezer. The remainder is full of comfortable promiſes to the godly and penitent: what became of him at laſt, the text doth not tell us, and it is dangerous to truſt to any thing elſe.

by Amaſiah, one of the idolatrous prieſts of Bethel, and by him commanded to return into Judah and propheſy there; which he was forced to do, though not before he had denounced this heavy judgment againſt the meſſenger Amaſiah, that his wife ſhould become an open proſtitute in the city, that his ſons and daughters ſhould fall by the ſword, and himſelf die in a polluted land [e], namely, that of Aſſyria; whither the ten tribes were ſoon after carried away captive, and he, in all probability, along with them (C).

Zachariah. Zachariah ſucceeded his father Jeroboam: he was the great-grandſon of Jehu; and ſo far was God's promiſe to this laſt fulfilled, that the kingdom ſhould continue in his family to the fourth generation; but his threatenings againſt that kingdom did not lag behind, and we may date the downfal of Iſrael from the reign of Zachariah. From that time, we read of nothing but treaſons and rebellions, of murders, anarchy (D), and univerſal deſolation: Zachariah had ſcarce reigned ſix months, before he was publicly maſſacred by Shallum, one of his own domeſtics, accord-

(C) As for Amos, as he was neither prieſt nor prophet, but only called, upon this extraordinary caſe, to the latter, it is probable, that, after his return into the land of Judah, he retired into the city of Tekoah, where he continued to propheſy againſt Iſrael, for ſilencing and expelling him out of their kingdom (47). He foretold, in particular, the calamities which they would fall into after Jeroboam II's death; the murther of his ſon and ſucceſſor; the coming of Pul and Tiglath-pileſer, kings of Aſſyria, againſt Iſrael; and the captivity of the ten tribes. Some other of his prophecies are levelled againſt Syria, Tyre, the Philiſtines, Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites; and ſome againſt the kingdom of Judah. His ſtyle is plain and low, and his expreſſions, ſuch as one might expect from a ruſtic or a ſhepherd. Other particulars relating to his life and death, which we meet with in ancient fathers, we omit, becauſe we neither think them material nor certain.

(D) Our archbiſhop Uſher (48) obſerves here, that there muſt have been an inter-regnum of eleven years and half, before Zachariah aſcended the throne; without which ſuppoſition, it will be impoſſible to make his death and Shallum's ſhort-lived reign to coincide with the 39th year of Azariah king of Judah, in which it is ſaid to have happened (49).

As ſoon as this laſt was ſeated upon the throne, he returned to Tirzah, a city in the tribe of Ephraim, formerly the reſidence of Jeroboam I. [g], which place refuſing to open the gates to him, he put all the inhabitants to the ſword, and committed the moſt horrid cruelties on their pregnant women, that ever were done by the vileſt barbarians. It was not long, however, before he ſaw himſelf invaded by Pul king of Aſſyria (E); and, as he was not in a condition to make head againſt him, he was forced to buy his friendſhip at the price of 1000 talents of ſilver, which he levied upon the wealthieſt of his own ſubjects, whom he obliged to pay 60 ſhekels per head; upon which Pul returned homewards, and Menahem reigned quietly the remaining eleven years of his life, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Pekahiah, in the 50th year of Azariah, or Uzziah, king of Judah [h].

(E) The ſame prelate (50) thinks, that this Pul was the father of Sardanapalus, called from him Sardan-Pul, as Merodach king of Babylon called Merodach-Baladan from his father Baladan. Pul is the firſt king of Aſſyria we find named in ſcripture from the time of Nimrod, and may be reaſonably enough ſuppoſed to have reigned in Niniveh, at the time of Jonah's preaching; and to have been converted by him.

Thoſe who follow the verſion of the ſeventy believe, that Pul was invited by Menahem to come to his aſſiſtance. One of the prophets upbraids indeed the king and people of Samaria, with ſending to Aſſyria for help, for which he threatens them with being ſent thither captives (52); but the original affirms, that he came againſt, or invaded, the land; and the book of Chronicles ſays expreſsly, that God ſtirred up the ſpirit of Pul againſt him, as he did afterwards that of Tilgath-pileſer, who carried away the two tribes and half beyond Jordan into captivity (53). Joſephus reckons this invaſion of Pul to have happened towards the latter end of Menahem's reign (54); but Uſher, whom we follow, places it in the beginning of it.

THE kingdom of Judah all this while enjoyed a perfect peace. Azariah, whom the people had ſet upon the throne, immediately after his father Amaſiah's murder, (that is, as the text expreſſes it) in the 27th year of Jeroboam IId's reign [i] (F), was then but ſixteen years of age, and was wholly directed by Zachariah, not the prophet of that name, who lived after their return from the captivity, but another, who is only known for the great wiſdom and piety of his counſels to the young monarch; ſo that, dureAzariah's piety; ing the life of that faithful counſellor, Azariah became equally conſpicuous for his zeal againſt idolatry, for his pious imitation of his beſt predeceſſors, and for his great and ſucceſs; ſucceſs againſt ſeveral of his neighbours, eſpecially the Philiſtines [k]. He likewiſe fortified his own metropolis, repaired the wall of it, which had been demoliſhed by the king of Iſrael, and built ſeveral fortreſſes and magazines in ſeveral parts of his kingdom, and in thoſe countries which he had taken from the Philiſtines, Arabians, and Mehunims (G). His army conſiſted of 307,500 brave men under the command of two expert generals, Maaſiah and Hananiah, and of Jehiel, his ſcribe, or ſecretary of war, who appointed each band their reſpective turns, according to the muſter-rolls. We ought to obſerve here, that theſe wars of the king of Judah are not recorded in the book of Kings, where his hiſtory ſeems ſtrangely curtailed, but only in that of the Chronicles (56).

cers, all famous for their valour and experience; and a prodigious quantity of arms of all ſorts to ſupply his army with, and which he kept in ſeveral ſtrong ſtore-cities all over his kingdom. To theſe he added the invention of new machines for throwing darts, large ſtones, and other deſtructive materials, from his towers and bulwarks, which are ſaid to have been contrived by ſome of his expert engineers. Whilſt he was thus employed in his military affairs, he did not forget the buſineſs of agriculture; on the contrary, the text ſays, that he was a lover of it, that he had great herds of cattle, a great number of fields and vineyards, of huſbandmen and vine-dreſſers; and that he built towers and cots, and digged wells every where for the convenience of his ſervants and cattle. So that, whether we look upon him in peace or war, he ſeems to have arrived at the height of glory and wealth. Army, and magazines.

But all this he unhappily loſt by one raſh act, his attempting to infringe upon the prieſtly office, and to burn incenſe upon the ſacred altar. He was, however, ſtrongly oppoſed by the then high-prieſt Azariah, at the head of fourſcore other zealous prieſts, who repreſented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the ſons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not deſiſt from it, till he felt himſelf ſmitten with leproſy, in ſuch a ſudden and extraordinary manner, as made him ſenſible, that it was ſent from God, as a puniſhment for his preſumption. The prieſts, as ſoon as they perceived the firſt tokens of that polluting diſeaſe appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but Azariah was by that time ſtruck with ſuch terror and remorſe (H), that he

(H) The reaſon of Uzziah's being thus miraculouſly ſmitten with leproſy is only found in the book of Chronicles. Joſephus (57) adds a very remarkable circumſtance, which accompanied this puniſhment, if we may take his word for it; namely, that, while the king perſiſted to threaten the prieſts who oppoſed his impious deſign, God ſent a miraculous earthquake, which had this double effect, that it opened the roof of the temple, through the crack of which that ray of light got entrance which lighted upon his face, and covered it with leproſy; and, 2. that it rent a mountain in two which ſtood at a ſmall diſtance from Jeruſalem, one half of which having rolled about four furlongs, ſtopt againſt another mountain, choaked the high-way, and covered the king's garden all over with rubbiſh.

he saved them that trouble, and made what haste he could, not only out of that sacred place, but even out of the city, and went to live in a separate house, where he continued, infected with that distemper, secluded from common society, and deprived of the regal power, unto the day of his death, and was buried in a sepulchre, apart, adjoining to that of his ancestors [l]. He died in the 52d year of his reign, and the 68th year of his age [m], and was succeeded by his son Jotham, who had taken the government upon him immediately after his father's seclusion. The author of the Chronicles adds, that Uzziah's history was written by Isaiah the son of Amos [n]; but we find nothing now of him in the writings of that prophet, but his name [o].

His death.

Two years before Azariah's death, Pekejah succeeded his father Menahem in Israel; and, after two years reign, was killed in his own palace by Pekah the son of Remaliah, one of his generals, who ascended the throne about a year

Some of the prophets do, indeed, speak of an earthquake, which happened in Uzziah's days; but, besides, that neither they, nor the sacred historian, mention any thing of its wonderful effects against that monarch; it is plain, Josephus must be out in his chronology, because he makes it to have happened towards the latter end of that monarch's life; (for he says expressly, that he died of grief, soon after his misfortune,) whereas the former of the prophets above-mentioned says, that the earthquake happened in the days of Uzziah and of Jeroboam II. Now it is plain, as the learned Usher observes, that this was long before Uzziah was smitten with leprosy, because his son Jotham, who took the government upon him immediately upon his seclusion, was not born till some time after Jeroboam's death (59). This remark will also hold equally good against the rest of the Jews, who, to make the earthquake and the king's punishment meet, affirm, that they happened in the 25th year of his reign, that is, before Jotham was born. Both therefore, Josephus and they, have joined two events together, to make the king's punishment appear more wonderful, which, it is plain from what has been said above, happened, the one about the middle, and the other towards the latter end of that prince's reign, that is, at about 25 years distance from each other.

a year before Jotham ſucceeded his father in Judah. The character of theſe two princes was very oppoſite: Pekah was a wicked prince, and followed the ſteps of his predeceſſors, ſo that his reign proved troubleſome and unſucceſsful, and ended in a violent death: Jotham was 25 years old when his father died, he was a wiſe and pious prince, and appears to have inherited all his father's virtues without any of his vices, and was bleſſed with extraordinary ſucceſs. Pekah, having made a league with Rezin king of Syria, made an attempt againſt Judah; but he was ſoon forced to go back and defend his own territories againſt Tiglath-pileſer king of Aſſyria, who had invaded the land of Napthali, took the moſt conſiderable towns of it, and carried that whole tribe captive into his own kingdom; whilſt Jotham gained ſeveral conſiderable advantages againſt his neighbours, eſpecially againſt the Ammonites, whom he brought under a yearly tribute of 100 talents of ſilver, 10,000 meaſures of wheat, and the ſame quantity of barley [p]; as we have ſeen elſewhere †. At length, having repaired and beautified the temple, fortified the city, and done many other public acts, Jotham died in peace, after he had reigned ſixteen years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Ahaz. As for Pekah, after he had had the mortification to ſee one whole tribe torn from him by a foreign power, and his kingdom, during the laſt ten years of his reign, reduced into anarchy and rebellion; he was murdered and ſucceeded by Hoſhea the ſon of Elah, in the 20th year of his reign [q], and about three years after Jotham's death. Jotham king of Judah.

HOWEVER, he was more ſucceſsful, during thoſe three laſt years, againſt Jotham's unworthy ſon, whoſe impieties made his reign as unfortunate and inglorious, as that of his father had been glorious and ſucceſsful. He was ſcarce ſeated on the throne, before his kingdom was invaded by the joint forces of the kings of Iſrael and Syria. Ahaz was then under the utmoſt conſternation, at the news of two ſuch powerful enemies coming up againſt him, and ſeem to have expected nothing leſs than the total diſſolution of the Jewiſh monarchy; when Iſaiah the ſon of Ahaz's idolatrous and unſucceſsful reign.

Amos [r] (I), who had began to prophesy even from the latter end of Uzziah's reign, came to him from the Lord, to assure him, that these two princes should try their strength in vain against Jerusalem, which they were then about besieging [s]. At the same time, to assure him, that the final end of the Jewish monarchy, which he feared, was far enough off, he bid him ask a sign of God, though never so hard, and it should be granted to him. Here the king, whether out of respect, or despondency and unbelief, refusing to ask for the promised sign, the prophet assured him, from the Lord, that before that time came, a virgin should conceive and bear a son, and call his name Himmanu-el, or God with us, and so on (K).

(I) Isaiah, called from the womb to be a prophet, (60), and endowed with singular courage and eloquence for that important office (61), is affirmed by the Jews, and believed by many Christians, to have been the grandson of Joash king of Judah (62). His first vision was about the latter end of Uzziah's reign (63); but his prophecies relate to his successors, namely, the first six chapters to Jotham, the six next to his son Ahaz, and the rest to Hezekiah; excepting, that several of them are interspersed, which relate to the Messiah, and to the fate of several foreign kingdoms. He is justly esteemed the prince of the prophets, for the inimitable loftiness and majesty of his stile, as well as for the clearness of his prophecies.

He was highly respected by the good kings, especially by Hezekiah, who sent to consult him upon all emergencies; and as ill treated by the bad ones, especially by Manasseh, by whom he is supposed to have been put to a cruel death, as we have hinted elsewhere †.

(K) This we take to be a much more natural sense of that prophecy, than to suppose, as some have done (64), that such a miraculous child was really born in Ahaz's time, to assure him of the promised deliverance; for as there is not the least mention of such an extraordinary birth, so neither do we see, that there was any

No ſooner had the firſt part of the prophecy been verified, and the city been delivered from the impending ruin, than the impious Ahaz gave himſelf up to the vileſt impieties and idolatries, in which he far outwent the very worſt of his predeceſſors; burning incenſe to every deity, in groves, high places, and in the valley of Hinnon, and burning his very children in the fire, after the manner of other nations [t], till God was pleaſed at laſt to give him up to his two grand enemies. any neceſſity for it, in order to convince the deſponding king, who could not be ignorant of that prophecy of Jacob, that the ſcepter ſhould not depart from Judah —— till Shiloh was come (65); much leſs that he was to ſpring of the lineage of David. But what ſtaggered Ahaz's faith, and made him fear, that the regal power was going to depart from his family, was, that his two enemies had combined to ſet up a ſtranger upon his throne (66). All, therefore, that was wanting to diſpel his preſent fears about it, was for the prophet to aſſure him from God, that this Shiloh promiſed to Judah and David, who was to fore-run the total exciſion of the Jewiſh polity, was to be born in a miraculous manner, and with a divine character, and other remarkable circumſtances, ſuch as he might be eaſily ſatisfied, had not as yet happened in his kingdom.

As for that part of the prophecy which is commonly urged on the other ſide, namely, Before this wonderful child ſhall know good from evil, the land which thou abhorreſt ſhall be forſaken of both her kings (67); we think, that if it be rightly underſtood, it will rather confirm our ſenſe of the prophecy, and that the words ought to be thus rendered: For, (or rather, as the particle כִּי Ki, ſeems to import here,) Nay before this child can know good from evil, this land which thou (קָץ Kotz, not abhorreſt, as our verſion renders it, but) art ſo ſolicitous about, or giveſt up for loſt, ſhall be bereaved of both her kings; by which, we think, ought to be underſtood, not the kings of Syria and Iſrael, for the former could not be called her (Canaan's) king, and the latter had but a ſhare in it at beſt, but the kings of Iſrael and Judah; as it really was before the coming of the Meſſiah.

However, though we have delivered this our own private opinion, we ſhall venture no further upon the argument, much leſs upon ſome other parts of this prophecy, leſt we ſhould be thought to expatiate too far out of our province.

his ill ſucceſs againſt Jeruſalem, went and recovered Eloth, a conſiderable ſea-port town upon the Red-Sea, which Uzziah had taken from him; he repaired and fortified it, drove the Jews out of it, and peopled it with his Syrian ſubjects; and from that time the Jews never could retake it from his ſucceſſors *. What havock he made in his territories, we have already partly ſeen in the Syrian hiſtory †.

A great ſlaughter of his ſubjects.

THE king of Iſrael was ſtill the more inveterate and ſucceſsful of the two, and it is not eaſy to ſay, how far he might have carried on his conqueſts againſt him, had not a prophet been ſent from God to put a timely ſtop to them. He had already killed in one ſingle battle, 120,000 of his braveſt ſubjects, beſides Maazaiah, Ahaz's ſon, and ſome of the nobleſt that were next his royal perſon; and had likewiſe taken 200,000 captive women and children, whom they were carrying away to Samaria; when Obed, that was the prophet's name, ſtopped them ſhort, and aſked them, whether they did not think it enough to have made ſuch a horrid and univerſal ſlanghter of their brethren, unleſs they carried away a much greater number into ſlavery? He added, that though the idolatries of Judah had drawn thoſe heavy judgments upon that unfortunate tribe, yet if they perſiſted to carry thoſe innocent priſoners into captivity, their cruelty would bring down much ſeverer ones upon themſelves. He concluded, with exhorting them to be contented with the rich plunder they had got, and to ſend their captives back to Jeruſalem; which they at length complied with. This ſpeeeh did even work ſo far upon them, that they did not diſmiſs them without ſome ſignal tokens of pity and humanity [u].

Edom and the Philiſtines invade him.

WHITST Ahaz's affairs were in this diſmal plight, the Edomites and Philiſtines did invade other parts of his land; the former of whom carried away a great number of captives, and the latter recovered ſeveral conſiderable frontier towns from him [x]. In this extremity he had recourſe to his old ally the king of Aſſyria, whom to gain to his aſſiſtance, he made no ſcruple to ſtrip both temple and city of all the gold and ſilver. Tilgath-pileſer received his preſents, but, inſtead of coming to aſſiſt him againſt the confederate kings, he turned his whole ſtrength againſt that of Syria;

Syria, under a pretence of cauſing a diverſion (L); and having killed Rezin, and ſeized upon his capital, Ahaz came thither to pay a viſit to him, upon what deſign is not eaſy to gueſs. Among the curioſities which he ſaw at Damaſcus, he was ſo taken with the elegance of a heatheniſh altar, that he cauſed a model to be taken from it, and to be ſent to Urijah the high-prieſt, with orders, that he ſhould cauſe one to be made after it, and to be ſet up in the temple. Urijah dared not diſobey, but cauſed the altar to be made, and to be placed in the room of the old one, which had been ſet up by Solomon; which laſt was put by on the north ſide of it. At his return, the king highly pleaſed to ſee his orders ſo punctually executed, offered up incenſe, and a vaſt quantity of ſacrifices upon it; but he ſoon after cauſed the temple to be ſhut up, whilſt he reared

His idolatry.

(L) This is, at leaſt, the beſt way to reconcile the book of Kings and that of Chronicles, the former of which ſays, that he came to Ahaz's aſſiſtance; and the latter, that he did not, but rather ſtraightned him (68).

Some indeed (69) think, that Ahaz put himſelf too much in his power, and was become a kind of dependent upon him, living in continual fear of being invaded by him. This is indeed far from improbable, ſince he left his ſucceſſor under an obligation of paying a tribute to the Aſſyrians, whoſe general taxed him with rebellion for not paying it accordingly, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. This made Tremellius conjecture to be the reaſon, why he is ſaid to have turned the outward entry, which led from the royal palace to the temple (70), namely leſt Tiglath ſhould aſſault him that way, and ſo break into his palace (71). Another author (72) thinks that the ſame fear made him remove the מוסך Muſſac; or covering of the ſabbath which he agrees, with us, was the throne on which the kings uſed to ſeat themſelves during the ſervice of the temple; and cauſed it to be hid, leſt that prince ſhould carry it away with him. There might indeed be ſome ground for it, if we had the leaſt hint in the text of his coming towards Jeruſalem; but as that is not the caſe, we may ſuppoſe, that Ahaz did remove both that, and all that was valuable in the temple, only to convert it all to his own uſe.

This Tilgath-pileſer is the ſame with Ninus the younger, who reigned in Aſſyria 19 years as will be ſeen in its proper place.

reared altars in every corner of Jeruſalem, and every where elſe to the Syrian gods, which he ſaid had been ſo ſucceſsful againſt him; and having abandoned himſelf to the moſt abominable idolatries, he finiſhed his impious reign in the 36th year of his age, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Hezekiah; he reigned ſixteen years [y], and was buried in Jeruſalem, not in the ſepulchre of David, of which he was eſteemed unworthy, but in ſome other place by itſelf [z].

THE kingdom of Iſrael, all this while was in no better plight than that of Judah: Pekah had paid dear for his ſucceſs againſt it, being murdered by Hoſhea ſoon after his return; that is, in the fourth year of Ahaz (M). This revolution, however, proved ſo diſtaſtful to the Iſraelites, that it cauſed a kind of anarchy, which laſted almoſt nine years; during which time, Hoſhea found it a difficult taſk to keep himſelf upon the throne: and after he had quelled theſe commotions, and began to reign more peaceably, we do not find, that he made any hoſtile attempt, either againſt Ahaz or his ſucceſſor. He had indeed other buſineſs upon his hand, Shalmaneſer had, by this time, ſucceeded Tiglath-pileſer in Aſſyria, and whether Hoſhea had been forced to make uſe of his aſſiſtance to ſettle himſelf upon his throne, or whether his predeceſſor had committed any hoſtilities againſt Iſrael, during his alliance with Ahaz, Hoſhea was by ſome means, not mentioned in the text, become tributary to Aſſyria [a], and was endeavouring to free himſelf from that yoke, by courting So, king of Egypt, to an alliance with him. This attempt proved the ſource of new troubles, which ended at laſt in the total exciſion of the Iſraelitiſh monarchy, as we ſhall ſee very ſoon.

(M) The text ſays (73) in the 20th year of Jotham, but as he reigned but 16 years (74), it can mean no more than 20 years, from the time that he began to reign; that is, in the fourth year of his ſon and ſucceſſor. In the ſame manner we muſt underſtand what is ſaid in another place (75), that Hoſhea began to reign in the 12th year of Ahaz; by which is meant, that he did not properly begin to reign till then, by reaſon of the ſtirs and tumults, which aroſe after the murder of his predeceſſor.

(73) 2 Kings xv. 13. (74) Ibid. ver. 33. (75) Ibid. xvii. 1.

In the mean time, Hezekiah had aſcended his father's throne, in the 25th year of his age, and in the 12th, or, as the text hath it, in the third year of Hoſhea's reign, that is, abating the firſt nine years of anarchy, mentioned in the laſt note. It was not difficult for him to diſcover the ſource of all Judah's misfortunes, and the moſt effectual means to retrieve them: this is what he ſet about with the utmoſt diligence and application. He began with opening the temple, which his impious father had cauſed to be ſhut up, and commanded the prieſts and levites to purify themſelves and it, and to renew the daily worſhip of God, acccording to the law of Moſes. This good work was begun upon the firſt day of the year, it being the ſabbath [b], and was finiſhed on ſaturday the 16th of the ſame month. The king then aſſembled the elders of Judah on the next morning, and went with them to the temple, attended with the prieſts and levites, and a numerous croud of people. Here they began to offer up the proper offerings to expiate the ſins of the nation; after which, they ſacrificed ſuch numbers of burnt and peace-offerings, that the prieſts who aſſiſted at the ceremony, being inſufficient for the ſervice, were obliged to call in the levites to their aſſiſtance, and theſe accepted the office with the utmoſt readineſs and joy (N). All this while, the air was filled with the ſound of the trumpets, and other muſical inſtruments, and with the voices of the ſingers, who accompanied the ceremony with pſalms and hymns, ſuitable to that extraordinary ſolemnity, which was concluded with expreſſions of the utmoſt joy and ſatisfaction, both in the king and people. It could not indeed but be a pleaſing ſight, to ſee

The temple opened, and purified.

[b] 2 Chron. xxix. 3, & ſeq.

(N) It appears by the text, that a great number of prieſts had proved tardy in obeying the king's command, ſo that they could not vacate at the ſervice of the temple, for want of being purifyed, whilſt the levites, who had ſhewed a more than ordinary diligence in complying with it (76), were honoured with that office, from which their inferior rank excluded them. What part they did bear in it, doth not appear; but we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that they helped to kill and prepare that vaſt number of victims, which were then offered; whilſt the prieſts were taken up with making the proper aſperſions with the blood, and offering the fat and fleſh of them, as they received them at their hands.

a king and nation so suddenly turned from the worship of the filthiest idols, to that of the living God [c]. One misfortune there was, however, that the season was past for celebrating the passover; that solemnity was to begin on the eve of the 14th day of that month, and it was now the 17th; but their zeal pointed to them an expedient out of the law of Moses, where it is prescribed, that those, who, by reason of any legal impediment, could not celebrate that festival on the first, should do it on the second month †.

A solemn passover celebrated.

The good king postponed it accordingly, and made use of that interval, to send circular letters through his whole kingdom, to invite his subjects to be present at that feast, on the 14th of the next month. His piety went further; and the miseries, under which the idolatrous Israelites groaned, inspired him with a desire of endeavouring, at least, to work a reformation in that unhappy kingdom: to this end he wrote a most pathetic letter to them, which he sent by proper deputies, wherein he discovered to them the source of all their misfortunes, and exhorted them to return to the worship of the true God, and to present themselves before him at the ensuing solemnity, as the most effectual means, not only to avert his future judgments, but even to obtain from him the gracious recalling of their unhappy brethren, whom the kings of Assyria had carried into captivity [d] (O).

Israel invited to it by the king.

Whilst the king's messengers took their progress from Dan to Beersheba, the Jews were taken up with burning and demolishing all the idols, altars, and other idolatrous monuments, which had been reared in Jerusalem, and flung them into the brook Kedron, so that that metropolis was thoroughly purged, before the appointed festival was come. By this time the city was filled with people, not only from all the parts of the kingdom, but also from that of Israel, out of the tribes of Asher, Zebulun, Manasseh, and Issachar. These did not indeed come in such numbers, there being many even of these four tribes, as well

(O) This shews, that Tiglath-pileser, or his successor, had invaded part of Hoshea's kingdom; and it is probable, that it was at this time that he laid it under a tribute; unless we will suppose with some authors (77), that it had began in Pul's time: see the next note.

well as of the other five, who made a jeſt of the king's pious invitation; not that Hoſhea did in any way oppoſe it, for it doth not appear that he did: On the contrary, as he is recorded to have been far leſs wicked than any of his predeceſſors [e], it is probable, the bad ſituation of his affairs may have induced him to embrace any means, that would render providence more propitious to him. However, thoſe of his ſubjects, who came to the feaſt, either had not had time enough to purify themſelves, or, which is as probable, the very memory of thoſe neceſſary preparatives had been quite obliterated in Iſrael, during ſo long an interval of diſuſe, ſo that they ventured to eat the paſſover with the reſt, without regard to the illegality of it. Some therefore acquainted Hezekiah with it, but the king, who had nothing more at heart than to cheriſh their pious zeal, eaſily overlooked that circumſtance, and only prayed to God to do the ſame. However, for the ſake of thoſe of his own people, who were alſo unpurified, among whom were ſeveral prieſts and levites, he ordered the feſtival to be celebrated another ſeven days, that none might be excluded from it. This ſolemnity, the like to which had not been obſerved ſince the latter end of Solomon's reign [f], inſpired the people with ſuch uncommon zeal, that, as ſoon as they were diſmiſſed from it, they went about deſtroying all the old relicks of idolatry, each in their reſpective countries, the king himſelf encouraging them by his example, till he had utterly cleared his kingdom from them. Even the very braſen ſerpent, which Moſes had cauſed to be ſet up in the wilderneſs [g], did Hezekiah cauſe to be broken in pieces, becauſe he found, that the people had offered incenſe to it, and in contempt called it Nehuſhtan, that is, a piece of braſs [h].

His next care was to reſtore all the branches of the worſhip of God, to make an exact ſcrutiny into the genealogies of the prieſts, levites, and muſicians, in order to ſettle their ſeveral claſſes, according to David's model. He provided for their maintenance by reviving the laws of Moſes, concerning the firſt-fruits, tythes, redemption, vows, and ſuch like, relating to the levitical revenues, and appointed proper officers for receiving them, ſo that by October following, by which time all the fruits are brought in, they had received their income, and proper diſtribu-tion had been made of it among them [i]. Hezekiah, all this while, was bleſſed with ſucceſs equal to his piety; and as ſoon as he found himſelf ſtrong enough to free himſelf from the tribute, which the Aſſyrians had forced from his predeceſſor, he withheld his hand from paying it, and turned his forces againſt the Philiſtines, over whom he got ſuch conſiderable advantages, that he regained, with uſury, all that they had gotten during Ahaz's unhappy reign *.

Iſrael invaded.

It fared quite otherwiſe with the kingdom of Iſrael, and Hoſhea, little thinking how near it was come to its final period, was only thinking how to free it from the Aſſyrian bondage. But Shalmaneſer, who kept, no doubt, a watchful eye over him, did ſoon diſcover and break all his meaſures. To work his overthrow more effectually, and that he might leave no enemy behind to ſtop his progreſs, he took care to ſecure the land of Moab, by razing their two chief cities [k], according to Iſaiah's prophecy denounced three years before [l], and laying waſte all that land and that of Iſrael, till he was come to the gates of Samaria, and had laid cloſe ſiege to it. Hoſhea, who had not been able to make head againſt him, had, however, ſo well fortifyed himſelf in that city, that it held out almoſt three years againſt the Aſſrian king. The text gives us no further particulars, either of this ſiege or war, except that, after the taking of that metropolis, the reſt of the kingdom was forced to ſubmit to the conqueror, and that both the king and all his ſubjects were carried away into captivity, and diſpoſed of into the ſame provinces of that empire, whither their brethren had been ſent in a former reign (P); but we have

And the book of Tobit adds, that the tribe of Naphthali, of which Tobit was, being carried away by Enemeſſar, who is the ſame with Shalmaneſer, was placed in the province of Media, and himſelf in the capital of it, called Rages, where he left ten talents with his kinſman (79). have a dreadful account of it in ſome of the prophets, who deſcribe the diſtreſs of the people in the ſtrongeſt terms [m]. The Aſſyrians committed the moſt horrid cruelties againſt their captives, ripping up their pregnant women, and daſhing their children againſt the ground [n]; and, having reduced Samaria into a heap of rubbiſh [o], and laid waſte all the land, returned home laden with the ſpoil of Iſrael. As for the land into which the ten tribes were carried, it has been ſought in vain by the learned of all ages: what the moſt probable conjecture is concerning it, will be beſt ſeen in the next chapter. This was the ſad and fatal end of the Iſraelitiſh kingdom [p], after it had ſtood divided from that of Judah 254 years [q]. It happened in the 6th year of Hezekiah, and in the 9th of Hoſhea. A great number, however, of the Iſraelites did eſcape with their lives, ſome into Egypt, and a much greater number into the kingdom of Judah; where they weaned themſelves by degrees from their former idolatries and rebellion, and became ſubjects to Hezekiah and his ſucceſſors. On the other hand, the Aſſyrians, Joſephus ſays Shalmaneſer [r], but it was more probably his ſucceſſor, ſent colonies from ſeveral of their provinces, but chiefly from Cuthah, to repeople the land of Iſrael, from whence theſe new inhabitants came to be called Cutheans [s] (Q).

we mentioned out of the Chronicles, and how they are underſtood, belongs to another chapter; but it is plain by this, that there was at leaſt a double invaſion of the land of Iſrael by the Aſſyrians, and a double captivity.

(Q) The text adds (80), that theſe new colonies were like to have been deſtroyed by lions, Joſephus ſays by peſtilence (81), upon their very firſt ſettlement, for their diſregard to God; ſo that they were forced to ſend into Aſſyria, to deſire the king to ſend them ſome Iſraelitiſh prieſts, to inſtruct them how to worſhip and appeaſe him. This being complied with, they ſet themſelves immediately about it, but without forſaking the worſhip of their own gods, which they had brought from their reſpective countries. And here began a new kind of religion, not unlike that of

(80) 2 Kings xvii. 25, & ſeq. (81) Ant. l. 9. c. 14.

Hezekiah, all this while, had enjoyed a profound peace in his kingdom; and Sennacherib, the new king of Aſſyria, contenting himſelf with the tribute which both he and his predeceſſor paid to him, had ſuffered him to enjoy the fruits of his piety and conqueſts; but as ſoon as he found him to fail in it, he came againſt him with ſuch a powerful army, and took from him ſuch a number of fortified cities, in ſo ſhort a time, as ſeemed to threaten nothing leſs than the total ruin of the whole kingdom. Hezekiah, who ſaw his error too late, had no way left to retrieve it, but by a ſpeedy ſubmiſſion; he ſent an embaſſy to Sennacherib, acknowledging his fault, and promiſing him to ſubmit to whatever terms he ſhould impoſe upon him; and accompanied it with the richeſt preſents, for which he was forced to ſtrip the temple and his own treaſury of all their ſilver and gold. This wrought ſo well upon the conqueror, at leaſt for the preſent, that he returned with his army, without inflicting any other penalty, than a yearly tribute of 300 talents of ſilver and 30 talents of gold. But this reſpite, though ſo dearly bought, did not laſt long; for the treacherous Aſſyrian king, who continued ſtill at Lachiſh, did ſoon after ſend his army, under the command of Tartan, Rabſaris, and Rabſhakeh, directly againſt Jeruſalem; ſo that Hezekiah ſaw himſelf in much greater danger than ever of loſing his kingdom and liberty, if not his life.

WHILST theſe were coming againſt him, the king made all proper preparations for a brave defence; he fortified the city, repaired the wall of it, ſurrounded it with another wall, fenced it with towers, and laid in good ſtore of arms and proviſions for the ſiege. He likewiſe cauſed all the fountains about the city to be ſtopped, and the courſe of the brook Gihon, which watered all that region, to be turned another way, to cut off, as much as poſſible, all ſupply of water from the enemy. This done, he called together all his chief officers to one of the gates of the city; and exhorted them, in a grave and pious ſpeech, to rely wholly of the Iſraelites; conſiſting in the worſhip of the true God and of a number of falſe deities. Hence ſprang that mutual hatred between the Jews and Samaritans, the former abominating even the name of the latter, and theſe always diſclaiming any kindred with them in time of adverſity, though forward enough to claim it in time of proſperity (82).

wholly upon God, to behave with becoming valour, and by no means to be diſcouraged at the number and ſtrength of the faithleſs Aſſyrians *. It is not, indeed, eaſy to determine, whether all this was done before his recovery from a dangerous illneſs, or after it, more probably the latter, and that his imminent danger, and the treachery of Sennacherib, brought it upon him; for about this time he was ſeized with a dangerous diſeaſe (R), and forewarned by the prophet Iſaias to ſet his affairs in order, ſince he would certainly die of it. The good king, who, about a year or two before, had received a ſevere reproof from that prophet, and probably alſo about the ſame time from Micah the Moraſhite, for truſting too much upon Egpyt, and ſeeking for help from thence [t], received the dreadful ſummons with inexpreſſible grief, not doubting, in all likelihood, but that he had provoked God by it to ſhorten his days, he being then but in the 38th year of his age [u]. Joſephus attributes this exceſſive ſorrow to another cauſe, namely, his dying then without an heir to ſucceed him [w]; which is not at all improbable, becauſe his ſon was but twelve years old when he aſcended the throne [x]. As ſoon, therefore, as the prophet was gone, Hezekiah turned himſelf towards the wall, and addreſſed himſelf to God in the moſt humble and pathetic terms, accompanied with a flood of tears, which proved ſuch powerful advocates with the divine mercy, that the prophet, who was ſcarce got out of the palace, was commanded by God to return, and carry the dying monarch the joyful news of his recovery, which would prove ſo ſpeedy, that he ſhould be able, within three days, to go to the temple, and pay his thanks to God for it. And, as a farther proof of the efficacy of his prayer, Iſaiah was bid to aſſure him, that his life ſhould be prolonged fifteen years, and himſelf and his kingdom be delivered from the impending danger (S) [y].

(R) This diſeaſe, if we may gueſs at it by the remedy which the prophet applied to it, and by the ſpeedineſs of the cure, ſeems to have been a kind of quincy, or impoſthume in his throat, which was happily broke by the lump of dried figs.

(S) This ſickneſs of the king is, indeed, poſtponed in the ſacred hiſtory,

THESE glorious promiſes did not, however, gain credit with the deſponding king; he could not eaſily reconcile two ſuch different meſſages from the ſame prophet, and therefore thought, that he had a right to inſiſt upon ſome more ſignal proof to aſſure him of the laſt. The prophet ſoon obtained, by his prayers, ſuch an authentic proof, as ſhould at once convince, both him and his whole kingdom, that it was backed with the divine ſanction. It was a retrogradation of ten degrees of the ſun's ſhadow, by the dial of the royal palace (T); after which, a cataplaſm of dried hiſtory, and related after that of his deliverance from the Aſſyrian hoſt (83); but it is plain, that it muſt have happened before it; 1. becauſe the prophet aſſures the king from God, both of that deliverance, and of his recovery; and, 2. becauſe he promiſes him an addition of fifteen years reign (84). Now Hezekiah reigned but twenty-nine years in all (85), from which the fifteen being ſubtracted, it is plain, that he fell ill in the 14th year of his reign, which was the year in which the king of Aſſyria began to invade his kingdom (86).

(T) The text runs literally thus in the original; and the lord brought back the ſhadow of the ſteps, or degrees, which was gone down by the dial, or degrees of Ahaz, ten degrees or ſteps (87), which we purpoſely take notice of here, as we did before of a parallel miracle †, to ſhew, that the ſacred hiſtorian had expreſſed him in ſuch terms, as were within reach of the vulgar, and yet very compatible with the ſolar ſyſtem now commonly received.

It is true, that Iſaiah, who relates the ſtory in almoſt the ſame words, and mentions only the ſhadow, when he puts it to the king's option, whether it ſhould go backwards or forwards, doth add, that the ſun went back ten of the degrees which he had gone (88). But it is plain, that he intends no more than the rays of it. Thus the pſalmiſt ſays; the ſun ſhall not hurt thee by day, nor the moon by night (89); and in Jonah, that the ſun beat upon his head (90), by which can be only meant his beams. There is nothing more common than that expreſſion in all languages, the ſun comes in at ſuch a window, or ſuch a part of the houſe, and the like. The words, therefore, of the prophet may be naturally rendered thus, and the beams of the ſun (being miraculouſly inflected) cauſed the ſhadow to go back over ten of the degrees, or

or ſteps, which it had paſt, upon Ahaz's dial, or flight of ſteps. This was miracle ſufficient to convince the doubtful king, without magnifying, or rather multiplying, it, as many of the fathers, and others after them, have done.

For to ſuppoſe, as they do, that the whole fabric of the univerſe went back, or even that the earth alone did ſo, was not only needleſs, becauſe the buſineſs was not to lengthen the day, as it was in Joſhua, but only to put the ſhadow back ſo many degrees: but it ſeems to carry a further abſurdity; for either this extraordinary motion muſt have been cauſed all at once, which, conſidering the velocity of the earth's motion, much more that of the univerſe round it, is ſcarcely conceivable; or if it was done gradually, it would hardly have been perceived, in caſe Hezekiah had choſen to have the ſhadow go forward inſtead of backward. By the tenor, however, of the whole hiſtory, it ſeems, as if the thing was done in an inſtant, and not gradually. What need then is there to ſuppoſe, that God did interpoſe his miraculous power, to cauſe ſuch a retrogreſſion, even in the bare earth, when the end might be anſwered by the ſole inflection of the ſun's rays? To ſay that either of them was equally eaſy to an omnipotent power, is too unphiloſophical to deſerve an anſwer, becauſe it were abſurd to ſuppoſe, that God acts with leſs œconomy in his ſupernatural, than he doth in his natural, works.

This hypotheſis of the inflection of the rays, which is now the moſt received, becauſe attended with feweſt difficulties, will ſave us a great many needleſs enquiries, ſuch are thoſe that follow; What portion of time is implied by thoſe ten degrees: How much the day was lengthened by it: Whether this miraculous irregularity was afterwards recovered, and the courſe of nature was again haſtened by the ſame miraculous power to its priſtine harmony, either by ſubtracting as much from the night as had been added to the day, or by any other way: Whether the miracle was felt all the world over, or only in Judea: And many more of the like nature.

The Jews, indeed, who are ever ready to help us at a pinch, do tell us, that God, who had already ſhortened one day by ten hours, when wicked Ahaz died, that there might be no mourning made for him, did only reſtore the univerſe in ſtatu quo upon this occaſion. But ſuch an expeditious way of anſwering all thoſe enquiries will ſcarcely be allowed of by any but Jews. However, archbiſhop Uſher, who believed, that the whole frame of heaven went backward at this time, doth yet obſerve, that the divine providence ſo ordered it, that the conſtant and ever pointed, compoſed that noble pſalm, wherein he expreſſes the exquiſiteneſs of his anguiſh and grief, acknowledges the

ſelf like motion and harmony of heavenly bodies, did receive no hindrance from it; he proves it by three previous eclipſes of the moon, out of Ptolemy, whoſe calculation, being traced back from this time, coincide as exactly with the Chaldean account, as if no ſuch retrogreſſion had happened in nature (91); But is not this multiplying the miracle without any neceſſity?

But what confirms ſtill farther our opinion, that all the whole miracle conſiſted in the bare reverſion of the ſun's beams, is, that if either the ſun or the earth be ſuppoſed to have gone back ſo many degrees, it muſt have been perceived all over the world. But the contrary ſeems plain to us, from the embaſſy which Merodach-Baladan ſent to Hezekiah, to inform himſelf about this miraculous phænomenon (92); for if it had been ſeen at Babylon, there would have been no neceſſity for ſending into Judea to know the truth of it; and it is hardly to be ſuppoſed, that he ſent thither to be informed about the cauſe of it. The Babylonians were much better aſtronomers than the Jews, or rather, theſe laſt were known to be perfectly ignorant of that ſcience, as we have ſeen elſewhere †. It ſeems then much more probable, that this retrogreſſion was only felt about Judea; and if ſo, it cannot be better accounted for, than by ſuppoſing an inflection of the ſun's rays.

We need not add, that if it had been felt all the world over, or even beyond Judea, we ſhould certainly find ſome footſteps of it in profane hiſtory, it being hardly to be ſuppoſed, that ſo remarkable a change could go unobſerved, or unrecorded, at a time when the world did yield ſo many good aſtronomers and hiſtorians; or that the memory of it ſhould be ſince entirely loſt, when we can find ſo many footſteps of the ſun's ſtanding ſtill in Joſhua's time, that is, upwards of 730 years before (93). For theſe reaſons, we ſhall wave all farther enquiries, which reſult from the other ſide of the queſtion, and only add ſome few remarks concerning the moſt probable figure of the dial in the text.

And here let it be conſidered, 1. That the original, מעלות Meghaloth, doth ſignify no more than ſteps or ſtairs; 2. That the Septuagint and Chaldee paraphraſts render it, the former ἀναβαθμους, and the latter by אבן שעוא a ſtone of time, accordingly; 3. That the infinite mercy of his divine deliverer, and promiſes to be everlaſtingly thankful for it. The next part of the prophet's promiſe, the deliverance from the Aſſyrian power, did

3. That the Jews did not reckon by, or had even a name for, hours, before the captivity (94); 4. that the invention of gnomon dials is reckoned of much later date, it being attributed to Anaximander, who did not flouriſh till almoſt 200 years after Hezekiah; and laſtly, That there is not a word of a ſun-dial in all the writings of Homer: All theſe will at leaſt amount to a ſtrong preſumption, that it muſt have been a kind of ſteep aſcent, leading up to the gate of the palace, and marked at proper diſtances with figures, ſhewing the diviſion of the day; rather than a regular piece of dial work.

We have indeed a much finer deſcription of it in Grotius, out of one Rabbi Eliah Chomer, who pretends, that it was a regular globe placed in the center of a hollow hemiſphere, on which were drawn, at proper diſtances, the ſeveral lines which divided the day into 28 parts (95); but who can believe, after what has been obſerved above, that ſuch a curious and compound piece of art could be the product of thoſe early times? for our part, we cannot think, that even this flight of ſteps was originally deſigned by the architect to ſerve both for that and for a ſun-dial: on the contrary, it ſeems to us more probable upon the whole, that the latter uſe was owing to obſervation. Some ornaments, ſuch as pyramids, obeliſks, flower-pots, and the like, might have been placed upon the rails or battlements of the aſcent, whoſe ſhadow, being in time obſerved to go over thoſe ſteps, at proper periods of the day, might naturally induce ſome curious obſerver to mark down the ſeveral portions of the day; firſt into four parts, according to the Jewiſh cuſtom of dividing it, and then into as many ſub-diviſions as was thought proper; ſo that all that we think is meant in the text before us is, that the ſhadow of the obeliſk, or whatever other ornament did ſerve inſtead of a gnomon, went back again over ten of thoſe ſteps, which it had already paſt. But what portion of time the ſhadow did uſually take in going over thoſe ſteps, is impoſſible to determine; however, though we have ventured to deliver this our opinion, as the reſult of what we find written upon this ſubject; yet, for the ſatisfaction of ſuch of our readers, as deſire to be further informed about it, we ſhall refer them to the authors quoted in the margin (96).

did not remain long unfulfilled. The generals presented themselves at the foot of the city wall, to demand a parly with Hezekiah's ministers; and as soon as these appeared upon the battlements, attended with vast crouds of people, who came to hear the purport of their message, Rabshakeh addressed himself to them in a haughty and threatening speech, filled with the bittereſt invectives and opprobrious language, not only against the king, but even against the God of Israel. It was spoken in the Hebrew tongue, to inject the greater terror into the listening people; and when they were desired to speak in Syriac to them, instead of complying with their request, they only renewed their threatenings of reducing the kingdom to the worst extremities, unless they prevented it by a timely yielding of themselves captives to the great Sennacherib [z].

THIS vapouring speech was, by the king's order, answered only by a deep silence; but the Assyrian generals being soon after informed, that their master was forced to go back to defend his own territories against Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, who was then invading him; they left Jerusalem and marched directly after him. But before Senacherib departed from Lachish, he sent a threatening letter to Hezekiah, to assure him, that, if he still persisted in his refusal of yielding himself his captive, he would shortly come again with double fury against him, and make him severely feel the effects of his own folly and vain confidence in his God, whom he should find as weak and impotent against his irresistible power, as those of many other nations had hitherto proved. As soon as the king had read the letter, he went up to the temple, accompanied with his chief ministers, and spread it before the Lord, and, in the humblest terms, besought him, that he would make good his late promises, and vindicate his honour against his insolent and blasphemous enemy, who had dared to level the God of heaven to the senseless idols of the more senseless heathen. He had scarce ended his prayer, when he received a gracious answer by the prophet Isaiah, importing, that though Sennacherib would certainly bring back his forces against Jerusalem, yet God would so protect it against them, that they should not shoot an arrow against, nor open a trench before, it; that this proud insulting enemy should be forced to flee with shame and and loſs, and fall at length by the ſword in his own land. This prophecy was likewiſe ſoon after verified. Sennacherib returned againſt Judah, fluſh'd with his late victory over the Ethiopians [a], and breathing death and deſtruction againſt the whole kingdom; but before he could have time to commit any hoſtilities againſt it, the beſt part of his army was ſmitten by an angel in one night, Joſephus ſays with peſtilence [b], inſomuch, that 185,000 of them were found dead by the next morning. This dreadful Judgment did ſo alarm the proud Aſſyrian monarch, that he retired with the utmoſt confuſion and ſpeed into his own capital, where he was ſoon after aſſaſſinated by two of his ſons, and ſucceeded by a third [c]. Thus was Iſaiah's prophecy exactly fulfilled againſt that blaſphemous tyrant [d], and the kingdom delivered from the moſt imminent danger. As for Hezekiah, though one would expect, that ſo many extraordinary bleſſings would have inſpired him with ſentiments of the deepeſt gratitude, yet they wrought a quite different effect upon him; ſo that, inſtead of acknowledging the amazing goodneſs of his great deliverer, he ſuffered himſelf to be ſo elated, that he brought a train of evils upon himſelf and kingdom, which, however, upon his repentance, were adjourned till after his death [e]. Hezekiah was a pious prince, but vanity ſeems to have been his predominant paſſion, and to have been ſwelled to an unreaſonable height by ſuch a wonderful ſeries of ſucceſſes; and God made uſe of the following juncture, at once to make him ſenſible, and to cure him of it.

THE king had, about this time, received a ſpecial embaſſy from Berodach, or, as Iſaiah calls him, Merodach Baladan, king of Babylon, to congratulate him upon his late ſucceſs and recovery, and to inform himſelf about the prodigy of the ſun's retrogreſſion [f]; and, as his ſucceſs and the ſpoils of his enemy had made him exceeding rich, he took a particular pleaſure in entertaining the embaſſadors with a ſight of all the wealth, grandeur, and ſtrength of his court and kingdom (V). This brought Iſaiah to the king, who had had no sooner acquainted him with his own weakness and ostentation, than he received this dreadful message from God; that those very Babylonians, whose eyes he had glutted with all the glory of his kingdom, would, in a short time, not only strip it of all that was valuable in it, but even carry away captive some of his off-spring, and make them eunuchs in their monarch's palace; at which Hezekiah was brought to such a sense of his oversight, that he acknowledged the mildness of his sentence, since he was suffered to end his days in peace [g]. Among others of his public acts, he is recorded to have made a large pool and a conduit, to supply Jerusalem with water; and to have been an encourager of husbandry, himself having numberless flocks and herds in his own pasture-grounds, besides vines and other grounds. He died in peace, in the 54th year of his age and 29th of his reign, according to the words of the prophet, and was buried in the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David. His funeral obsequies were performed with uncommon magnificence, not only in the city, but also throughout the whole kingdom [h] (W).

Manasseh's wicked reign.

MANASSEH was but 12 years of age when he succeeded Hezekiah; and, whether he was naturally vicious, or fell into the hands of wicked counsellors, we may date the ruin people to Jerusalem; which could not but add very much to the magnificence of that court and metropolis, because upon such occasions the wealthy men of the kingdom were used to pour their rich presents into the temple, especially after such signal successes and deliverances as they had lately had; and the text says, that they did so accordingly (98).

(W) Besides the prophets Isaiah and Micah, of whom we have had occasion to speak, Nahum did likewise prophesy in the days of Hezekiah. It is he, who foretold the dreadful destruction of Niniveh, which happened afterwards in the days of Josiah, and describes it in the most lively colours, comparing it to that of No, a populous city in Lower Egypt, lately taken by the Assyrians, who committed the most horrid cruelties against her inhabitants (99).

ruin both of the kingdom and religion from the fatal day of his aſcending of the throne. He ſeems not only to have ſtrove to outdo all his predeceſſors in wickedneſs, idolatry, tyranny, and ſacrilege, but even to have ſhewed an impious emulation to undo all that his pious father had done, and to act in direct oppoſition to him. Hezekiah's firſt care had been to root all idolatry out of his kingdom, and to reſtore the worſhip of God and the ſervice of the temple, to its priſtine order and ſplendor. His graceleſs ſon, on the contrary, made it his ſtudy to baniſh religion and morality out of it, and to revive all the old idolatry, and to introduce new and unheard of deities, idols, and ceremonies; beſides witch-craft, ſorceries, and every wicked cuſtom, that was uſed among the Heathen far and near. Baal became now the favourite object of his worſhip; the ſun, moon, planets, and a vaſt multitude of other heatheniſh gods, had alſo their altars and groves erected to them, both in Judah and Jeruſalem. Moloch and the valley of Hinnon became more frequented than ever, the impious king encouraging his ſubjects to ſacrifice their children there, as Ahaz had done before. But the moſt execrable piece of wickedneſs and ſacrilege was his introducing of the vileſt of idolatries into the very temple of God, and cauſing a graven image of the grove, a filthy idol, worſhipped with the filthieſt ceremonies, to be ſet up in the moſt ſacred (X) place; as if he had deſigned to drive the God of Iſrael out of his habitation, and to diſclaim at once all thoſe great bleſſings, which he had made to David and Solomon, and to all that did worſhip him there [i].

(X) Some think, that he did even cauſe the ark to be taken out of the moſt holy place, to make room for his molten idol; becauſe it is ſaid in the Chronicles, that Joſiah did order the Levites to depoſite it again into its place (100); but from the words which do immediately follow, it ſhall be no longer a burden upon your ſhoulders, or unto you, we are more inclined to think, that the prieſts had timely coveyed it out of the ſanctuary before the idol was brought in; and that it had been kept in their cuſtody till Joſiah's reign.

provoking God to bring such dreadful desolations upon him and his kingdom; that Jerusalem would become like a dish, that is wiped clean and turned upside down. But these threatenings were so far from reforming, that they hardened him the more, and made him seek only for the most violent means to silence not only those prophets, but all that dared to express a dislike to his impieties. Jerusalem became soon after the scene of the most horrid cruelties, which Manasseh, now become a tyrant of the first magnitude, caused to be exercised on prophets and priests, nobles and people, indifferently, till he had filled that metropolis with blood and with butchered bodies, from the one end to the other [k]. At length, providence was pleased to put a signal stop to his bloody career, by delivering him into the hands of some of the chief commanders of the Assyrian army, who came upon him so suddenly, that, seeing no way to escape, he went and hid himself in a thicket. He was, however, soon brought out of it, and loaden with chains, carried away into Babylon, and there cast into a dungeon by Essar haddon or Assaradin, king of Assyria, who, according to Ptolemy's canon, had made himself master of Babylon about six years before, and was by this time become sole monarch over both empires [l].

His murders and tyranny.

Restored to his liberty.

THE text doth neither tell us how this was done, whether by an open invasion, or, which seems more likely, by some sudden incursion, nor in what year of Manasseh's reign it happened; the Jews affirm, that it was in the 22d year, in which they are followed by the generality of our annalists. However that be, the distressed king soon opened his eyes to all his miscarriages and impieties, which his prosperity would not suffer him to see; and, in the bitterness of his soul, did send so many deep sighs to heaven, so humble an acknowledgment of his fault, and such earnest prayers for mercy and pardon, that he at length obtained both that, and a happy deliverance out of his captivity (Y).

How long his impriſonment laſted (Z), or by what means he regained his liberty, the text doth not ſay; thus much is plain from it, that from the greateſt ſinner, he returned the greateſt penitent (A), and from the bloodieſt tyrant, His repentance and reformation.

Archbiſhop Uſher obſerves (2), from the following chapters out of the ſame author, that the kingdom of Iſrael, had not been ſo far emptied of its inhabitants, but that there was a conſiderable remnant of them left behind, the far greater part of whom were carried away captive about the ſame time, and perhaps by the ſame forces, which took Manaſſeh priſoner. This laſt and total captivity, that prelate thinks to have been foretold by Iſaiah about ſixty-five years before againſt Iſrael, under the name of Ephraim (3). We read, indeed, of ſeveral Iſraelitiſh tribes being invited to the paſſover at Jeruſalem in a ſucceeding reign, but we take them to be thoſe who came and ſheltered themſelves in the kingdom of Judah, during the ſiege of Samaria, to eſcape being carried into bondage by the Aſſyrian king; as we hinted under the laſt reign.

(Z) Some will have it, that it laſted as long as Eſſar-haddon lived, that is, as our Chronologers compute it, about ſix years (4). Joſephus only ſays, that the king of Babylon gave him his liberty after ſome time, but doth not ſay how long (5); but the general opinion is, that he was ſet free the very ſame year that he was taken priſoner. This is alſo the opinion of the Talmudiſts, who place both his repentance and impriſonment in the 34th year of his age; and this ſeems the more probable of the two, becauſe the author of the book of Kings makes no mention of this captivity, but allows him his fifty-five years reign, as if no ſuch thing had happened to him.

(A) We have a prayer among the apocryphal books of the old teſtament, intituled, The prayers of Manaſſeh king of Judah, when he was holden captive in Babylon, which, if it was penned by him, expreſſes the greatneſs of his guilt, repentance, and miſery, in the ſtrongeſt terms; particularly with reſpect to the laſt, it has this expreſſion, That he was ſo loaded with iron bands, that he could not lift up his head. But we have a more authentic proof of theſe, the wonderful change that was wrought in him; though we ſhould be loth to deny, that this prayer was compoſed by him, during his impriſonment, becauſe we find an expreſſion in the book of Chronicles (6), which ſhews, at leaſt, that there was ſome ſuch prayer of his compoſing kept upon record; and it is became one of the beſt monarchs. So that after his return, he beſtowed his whole time and application in repairing the damages, which his impiety had cauſed, both in religion and in his kingdom. One of his firſt cares was to clear the ſanctuary and the court of the temple, of thoſe idols which he had cauſed to be ſet up there, and which the prieſts had not had the courage, or power, to remove during his abſence; and to reſtore the ſervice of it to its antient order and ſplendor. He then ſent circular letters throughout his kingdom, exhorting his ſubjects to follow his example, and to demoliſh all the groves, altars, and idols, which had been reared during the former part of his reign, and this was readily complied with alſo by the people every where; only the high places were left untouched, the king, wanting either power, courage, or zeal to go through with theſe, by reaſon of the people's obſtinate fondneſs for them. He took the ſame care to repair and fortify the city and other places of his kingdom; and having reigned peaceably about 33 years after his return from Babylon, he died in the 55th year of his reign, and 67th of his age. He was buried in his own garden, probably by his own choice, the ſenſe of his former miſcarriages not ſuffering him to think himſelf worthy to be depoſited among his anceſtors; and was ſucceeded by his ſon Ammon [m].

His death. Year of the Flood, 2356. Year before Chriſt, 643.

AMMON was but 22 years old when he came to the crown, ſo that he could have obſerved nothing in his father's example, but the greateſt tokens of piety and goodneſs; and yet ſo infatuated was he, that he gave himſelf up to all the vile idolatries of the former part of his reign. He began even to give ſome early proofs, that he deſigned to outdo him in his moſt abominable debaucheries; but before he had reigned two years, a conſpiracy was formed againſt him by ſome of his chief officers, who aſſaſſinated him in his own palace, and buried him in the ſame is ſcarce poſſible to pen one more expreſſive of his miſery and repentance, than this we are ſpeaking of.

It was alſo about this time, or ſoon after it, that the ſiege of Bethulia happened, at which Holofernes was treacherouſly murthered by Judith; but as the ſtory is apocryphal, and has no connexion with the hiſtory of the kings of Judah, we ſhall ſay no more of it here.

ſame garden with his father. They did not, however, go long unpuniſhed: the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, who had had no ſhare in this rebellion, roſe up in arms immediately upon the news of it, and having revenged their king's murder by that of the conſpirators, they placed his ſon Joſiah upon the throne, who was then about eight years of age [n].

IT is amazing to think how the whole kingdom could be ſo ſoon over-run with all kind of wickedneſs and idolatry in the ſhort time of Ammon's reign, after it had been ſo thoroughly purged from them by his father; and yet it was grown to ſuch a degree of impiety, when Joſiah came to the crown, that the prophet Zephaniah, who was cotemporary with him, gives us a moſt dreadful catalogue of the licentiouſneſs and irreligion, that then reigned through the whole kingdom. Among the princes, judges, and magiſtrates, reigned injuſtice, oppreſſion, cruelty, and all manner of debauchery; among the prieſts, pride, avarice, corruption, and a ſhameful traffick of religion; among the people, ignorance and irreligion, men ſwearing with the ſame breath by the LORD and by Malcom; altars reared every where to Baal, to the whole hoſt of heaven, and to all the other deities of the heathen [o]; the very ſanctuary itſelf was again polluted by the filthy idol of the grove, and its court furniſhed with male proſtitutes, and with women who wove hangings, and tents to hide the unnatural and abominable ceremonies of its votaries [p].

IN this ſad and horrid condition was the kingdom, when the infant monarch took the reins of it; ſo that it required nothing leſs than a miracle to reform it. But as Joſiah had been miraculouſly promiſed above 300 years before, by a prophet ſent on purpoſe to Jeroboam at Bethel †, one who was to work the greateſt reformation, that ever was done in the land, ſince it was to reach through the two kingdoms, and this Joſiah was the perſon deſigned by God for that glorious work. However, his tender years would not permit him immediately to undertake any thing, except perhaps adviſing with ſuch pious counſellors, as could beſt inſtruct him, both about what was to be done, and the propereſt means of accompliſhing it. He married in the 15th year of his age, and in the 16th he had a ſon and a ſucceſſor born unto him, whom he named Eliakim (B); after which he ſet himſelf about his premeditated deſign, with a zeal, diligence, and intrepidity, which, conſidering his years and the arduouſneſs of the taſk, could be owing to nothing leſs than a ſupernatural impulſe. His extraordinary ſucceſs and expedition, and the univerſal deſtruction he made, both in Judah and Iſrael, not only of all the idols, altars, groves, and other idolatrous monuments, but alſo of the high places, which ſeveral of his predeceſſors had in vain attempted to aboliſh, do ſhew indeed, that he was aſſiſted by the ſame divine power, that had inſpired him with the deſign. This laſt kind of worſhip was not indeed an idolatrous one, becauſe it was directed to the God of Iſrael, to whom the prieſts, the ſons of Aaron, offered ſacrifices upon thoſe altars, which had formerly been reared by Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob; but it was afterwards expreſly forbid by the law of Moſes, and the tabernacle and temple ordered to be the only places for ſuch ſacrifices, unleſs it was otherwiſe commanded by inſpired perſons, and upon ſome particular occaſions, as we have elſewhere hinted *. The more effectually therefore to cure this obſtinate evil, Joſiah cauſed all thoſe places to be polluted with dead mens bones, and ordered all thoſe prieſts, who had vacated at that unlawful worſhip, to be for ever excluded, both from all ſacerdotal functions, and from the privilege of eating of any holy things. He likewiſe ordered all the wooden idols, altars, and other combuſtible materials, which had ſerved to any idolatrous purpoſes, together with the chariots and horſes, which had been dedicated to

A total reformation in his kingdom.

(B) Probably in full confidence, that God would proſper his deſign, אליקים Eliakim ſignifying, God ſhall eſtabliſh, make to proſper, &c. the text doth not indeed mention the time of his birth, but it is eaſily inferred from being 25 years when he began to reign (7), for his father died in the 39th year of his reign (8), and was ſucceeded at firſt by Jehoahaz, who was younger by two years than Eliakim, whom Pharoah-necho ſet upon the throne ſome three months after (9).

to the ſun (C), the veſſels where the perpetual fire was kept to his honour, the image of the grove, and all that he found of that nature in the temple, to be burnt, and the aſhes of them to be thrown over the graves of their votaries, and thoſe that could not be burnt he cauſed to be flung into the river Kidron.

FROM Jeruſalem he went to the mount of Olives, called alſo the mount of corruption, from the great number of idolatrous altars, which had been ſet up there by Solomon, and repaired from time to time by ſeveral of his impious ſucceſſors, and demoliſhed and defiled them all. He did the ſame at the valley of Hinnon, a place infamous for the horrid cruelties, that were practiſed by the worſhippers of Moloch; and thence marched directly to Bethel, the place

(C) Theſe chariots and horſes, the text ſays (10), ſtood at the entrance into the houſe of the Lord; but whether they were real, or only carved, or molten, is not eaſy to determine. The antient Perſians, we are told, did indeed uſe to conſecrate white horſes and chariots to the ſun, with which they adorned their proceſſions (11); in which they were imitated afterwards by other nations (12). We can ſee no reaſon, therefore, why ſo many learned commentators ſhould ſcruple to ſuppoſe, that the Jews had adopted this, among other far worſe heatheniſh idolatries, and rather chuſe to fancy, that theſe chariots and horſes were only carved, or caſt, and ſet up in a chappel dedicated to the ſun, or barely carved in baſs-relief, or even painted againſt the walls of it; eſpecially, conſidering how ſoon the prophet Amos, and from him St. Stephen (13), charges them with having carried about the tabernacle of Moloch, that is, of the ſun, as we have ſhewed more than once, and the ſtar of their god Remphan.

What convinces us farther, that theſe were real chariots drawn by horſes, and bearing ſome image of the ſun, is, that the text expreſly ſays here, that Joſiah did not burn chariots and horſes, as he would have done, if they had been only carved or painted, but that he took away the horſes, and burnt the chariots (14). The reader may, if he pleaſes, ſee what we have conerning this kind of idolatrous proceſſions, in another place, out of ſome verſes of the 16th pſalm †.

where Jeroboam, the firſt king of Iſrael, ſet up one of his golden calves; which he deſtroyed, together with the groves, idols, and altars, cauſing the bodies of the idolatrous prieſts to be digged up and burnt upon them. It was upon this occaſion, that having obſerved a kind of monumental inſcription upon one of the tombs, he was informed, that it was that of the prophet, who came from Judah to denounce to Jeroboam that total deſtruction of idolatry, which he was then fulfilling; whereupon the good king ordered, that a particular regard ſhould be paid to his aſhes; by this means thoſe of the lying prophet, who had been the cauſe of his diſobedience and untimely death, and had ordered his body to be buried cloſe by him, eſcaped being diſturbed, and perhaps being burned with the reſt. After this, Joſiah took a circuit through all the cities of Iſrael, many of which lay almoſt deſolate, and deſtroyed every where the idols and altars, which either the Iſraelites, or the Aſſyrian colonies, had ſet up, and put all their idolatrous prieſts to death; and having thoroughly purged both kingdoms from every kind of idolatry, he returned to Jeruſalem, had ſet himſelf about reſtoring the worſhip of God and the uſual ſervice of the temple (D).

(D) It is very likely, that the king was encouraged to this good work by the prophet Jeremiah, who began to propheſy in the 13th year of his reign (15). Jeremiah was a prophet altogether miraculous, being choſen to this office even from the womb, and called to the exerciſe of it whilſt he was but a child; he was the ſon of Hilchiah, not the then high-prieſt of that name, as ſome have imagined, but of the race of Ithamar, and lived at Anathoth (16), a place within two or three miles from Jeruſalem, it being the ſeat of one of their anceſtors (17); ſo that it is hardly poſſible, that he ſhould be unknown to ſo pious a prince. It is true, we find nothing like it in his writings; but it muſt be remembered, that he delivered his prophecies at firſt only by word of mouth, and did not begin to pen them down till the fourth year of Jehoiakim; but we find him very early, at the gates of the temple, denouncing God's heavy judgments againſt Judah, and exhorting them to avert his anger, by abandoning their impieties and idolatries (18. As he continued to propheſy till the taking of Jeruſalem, and was often conſulted by ſeveral kings and nobles, we ſhall have occaſion, more than once, to ſpeak of him in the ſequel.

By this time Joſiah had attained to the 26th year of his age and 18th of his reign, and beheld with regret the dilapidations of that ſacred place, which made it neceſſary to have them repaired before all things. To this end, he ordered the great coffer, into which the poll-money and free-will offerings uſed to be depoſited, to be opened, and the money to be diſtributed among ſuch faithful overſeers, as would ſet about the work out of hand; and, to encourage them to be doubly diligent in it, he told them, that he would depend upon their fidelity for their right management of the money committed to them. Whilſt this was doing, the high-prieſt, who probably, preſided over the work, ſent word to the king, that he had found the book of the law (E), which he had ſent to him by the ſecretary

The temple repaired.

The book of the law found.

Zephaniah did likewiſe propheſy in the ſame reign, and much to the ſame purpoſe with what we mentioned of Jeremiah; the main ſcope of their propheeies being chiefly levelled againſt the various abominations committed in Judah and Jeruſalem (19); and both were probably deſigned to exhort the people to imitate the king's zeal and piety, and to prevent them murmuring againſt or obſtructing his reformation.

(E) This is generally agreed to have been the archetype, written by Moſes, and by him ordered to be depoſited, with the ark, in the moſt holy place (20), but which ſome pious high-prieſt had cauſed to be thus hid, in the reign of Ahaz or Manaſſeh, to prevent its being deſtroyed with all the other copies of it; for it plainly appears by the tenor of the hiſtory, that this was the only perfect one left (21).

But it is much diſputed, whether it was the whole Pentateuch, emphatically called התורה, Hathorah, the law; or only Deuteronomy, or even barely the 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31ſt chapters of it. Joſephus, by calling it the ſacred books of Moſes (22), ſeems to declare intirely for the firſt; others have declared for the ſecond (23), becauſe the book of Deuteronomy is a kind of repetition or epitome of the Moſaic law; laſtly, a late commentator, among ſome others, holds the laſt of theſe three opinions (24), and thinks, that nothing more is meant here, than that ſhort ſummary which is found in the 28th and three following chapters of that book, in which are contained all the bleſſings and curſes, which ſo alarmed the pious monarch. This is, indeed,

deed, that part, which, we observed elsewhere, Moses enjoined their future kings to write, and preserve a double copy of, to regulate their conduct by (25), and which he commanded Joshua to set up upon mount Gerizim (26); perhaps it might also be all that he ordained to be read by the priests, in the audience of all the people, every seventh year, at the feast of Tabernacles (27); though it is called the law in all those places.

But if either this short epitome, or even the whole Deuteronomy, was all that the high-priest found hid in the temple, when was the rest of the Pentateuch recovered? If it be said, that there might be some copies of this last still extant, then this summary must have been in it; and it will be surprising, that some one or more should not have been brought to so good a king, after he had given such signal proofs of his piety and zeal; and if any such had been presented to him, he must either have shamefully neglected the reading of it, or if he had not, he could never have been under such surprise and fear, at the reading of that which the high-priest sent to him. We therefore think, with the far greater number of Jews and Christians (28), that it was the whole Pentateuch; and that there might be still several imperfect and mutilated copies dispersed here and there, which might be now rectified by this prototype, after it was now brought to light.

If it be asked, how the king could run over those five books so quickly, as to come presently to those blessings and curses, which are contained in the very latter end of the last of them; it may be answered, that that might be the very reason; for as their manner was to write upon volumes of a considerable length, which were rolled up round one or two sticks, it might so happen, that these last chapters proved on the out-side, and that the king, impatient to know the contents of it, might have curiosity to read in it, before he had unfolded a round or two. We are, however, very far from rejecting the notion of the Jews, who believe, that providence directed him to that very part (29). Some thing like which we find happened under the gospel (30).

What appears most surprising is, that all the copies of the scriptures, which the good king Hezekiah seems to have caused to be written and dispersed about his kingdom (31), should be so soon vanished, in it, againſt thoſe very abominations, with which he had found the whole land over-run at his firſt coming to the crown, he rent his cloaths, and expreſſed the moſt lively tokens of grief, not doubting, but both he, and his whole kingdom, would ſoon feel the effects of thoſe threatenings. There lived at that time, in one of the colleges of Jeruſalem, a famed propheteſs named Huldah; to her therefore Joſiah diſpatched ſome of his prime officers, with the high-prieſt at their head, to inquire, what would be the fate both of the king and people, ſeeing they had incurred the curſes contained in that ſacred volume; and theſe brought him word back from her, that God would not fail to inflict all thoſe ſevere puniſhments upon his faithleſs and ungrateful ſubjects; but that as for himſelf, the concern and remorſe, which he had lately expreſſed for it, had ſo far ſuſpended the divine vengeance, that he ſhould be happily gathered unto his fathers in peace, before the nation felt the dire effects of them.

It was in the ſame year, and probably upon the reading of that ſacred book, that Joſiah became ſenſible, that they had been guilty of a ſhameful neglect of the three grand feſtivals enjoined by Moſes. To retrieve this fault, he aſſembled all the heads of the people from all parts of the two kingdoms to the temple, where, having mounted the royal tribunal, he acquainted them, how they had happily recovered the volume of the Moſaic law, and read it himſelf before them; he then acquainted them with his deſign of expiating, as much as poſſible, their former neglect, by a more careful obſervance of it; and, as the ſolemn feaſt of the paſſover was near at hand, which he was reſolved ſhould be celebrated with the utmoſt ſolemnity, he exhorted them to follow his example, and to prepare themſelves for that grand feſtival. Whilſt the people were purifying themſelves, Joſiah commanded the prieſts to make a more ſtrict ſearch in the temple, and to caſt out and deſtroy all the prophane and idolatrous lumber that was found vaniſhed, that neither Joſiah nor the high-prieſt had ever ſeen any of them, till this one was brought to light. All that can be ſaid in the caſe is, that Manaſſeh, during the former part of his reign, had made ſuch havock of them, that if there were any left, they were only in few private hands, who preſerved them with the utmoſt caution and privacy. The Jews do even add, that he cauſed not only the ſcriptures, but all the books that had the name of God in them, to be deſtroyed.

found in it, and to bring the ark, and all the ſacred utenſils, which had been removed out of it in ſome former reigns, and to depoſite them in their former place and order: All theſe were readily complied with both by prieſts and people; after which they went, in due time, about killing the paſchal lamb. This is again noted to have been obſerved with greater zeal and magnificence, than had been done by any of his predeceſſors ſince Samuel's time. After this, the king took a ſecond progreſs through the kingdom, to purge it of all thoſe abominations, which he might chance to have overlooked at the firſt circuit; he expelled all the wizards, enchanters, and ſuch-like dealers in dark practices, out of the land; ſettled courts of judicature every where, giving ſtrict charge, both to the magiſtrates, and alſo to the prieſts and Levites, to ſee, that the people were inſtructed in, and kept obedient to, the law of Moſes [r].

THUS did that good monarch endeavour, with the ſincereſt zeal, to reſtore the pure worſhip of God through his dominions, and to clear it from all the dregs of ſuperſtition and idolatry; in hopes, if poſſible, to avert his impending judgment from falling upon them. But for all this, the text obſerves, that his anger was not abated in the leaſt againſt the people; and we need not wonder at it. They were, as their whole hiſtory ſhews, ready for every market. They could ſo far comply with their pious monarchs, as to ſhew an outward zeal for God, and a diſlike for idolatry; but what proves their want of ſincerity, whenever they acted ſuch a part, is their readineſs to relapſe into the vileſt abominations, whenever they met with any encouragement for it under a wicked reign. Theſe forced reformations therefore could not but render them more odious in the ſight of God, ſo that having denounced a total deſtruction againſt the land, by his prophet Zepaniah [s] and by the propheteſs Huldah, he haſtened to take the good prince to himſelf, according to his promiſe, that his eyes might not behold the dreadful calamities that were to fall upon his nation.

Joſiah mortally wounded at Megiddo.

JOSIAH had by this time reigned 31 years in profound peace, when Pharaoh-Necho came up againſt the Aſſyrians, or rather Babylonians, as far as the city Carchemiſh, which was ſituate upon the river Euphrates. It is not eaſy to ſay, whether whether Joſiah looked upon the deſign of this expedition to be levelled againſt his own territories (G); or, which is ſtill more probable, whether the kings of Judah were under a kind of tribute and obligation to thoſe of Babylon, ever ſince Manaſſeh had been reſtored to his kingdom; which would have made a breach of faith in Joſiah, to have ſuffered an enemy of theirs to paſs through his territories, in an hoſtile expedition againſt them; or, laſtly, whether he had entered into ſome alliance with them; he came with a powerful army againſt him, and encamped in the valley of Megiddo. Here Pharaoh endeavoured in vain to diſſuade him from concerning himſelf in the war between him and the Babylonians, by aſſuring him by his embaſſadors, that he had no hoſtile deſign againſt him; Joſiah would not be perſuaded, but diſguiſed himſelf, and drove directly againſt him. The text ſeems even to intimate, as if his chief deſign had been to fight him in perſon; but before he could reach him, he received a mortal wound, and was forced to be put into another chariot, and brought out of the field of battle. He died as ſoon as he had reached Jeruſalem [u], in the 39th year of his age, greatly lamented by all his good ſubjects; particularly by the prophet Jeremy, who is ſuppoſed to have compoſed that moſt excellent elegy, known to us by the name of the Lamentations, upon his death [w]; wherein he expreſſes the mournful ſtate of the kingdom,

(F) This place, Iſaiah tells us, had formerly belonged to Sennacherib (32), and was now under the Babylonians; for theſe had, ere now, reduced the Aſſyrian empire under their yoke, as we have hinted in ſome former note.

(G) This valley being in the tribe of Manaſſeh (33), Joſiah might not only reſent his paſſing thro' his territories without his leave, but alſo think, that his deſign was to invade them, notwithſtanding all his proteſtations to the contrary, and his pretended commiſſion from God to make war againſt the king of Babylon (34). It is likely indeed, that this laſt pretence from an Egyptian prince could not make any great impreſſion upon him, becauſe he had only kingdom, with an energy and pathos, which we can better feel than deſcribe. This is the only poetic piece of that kind in holy writ, for length and method; the compoſition is of the acroſtic kind, and as the ſubject of the whole is mourning, which is always moſt naturally and freely vented and expreſt, when confined to number, ſo here every verſe is a ſentence, which abounds ſtill with ſome new, ſtrong, and lively image of the deepeſt grief (H). There was indeed the greateſt cauſe to lament ſo good a prince's fall, ſince with him expired at once the religion, happineſs, and glory of the nation.

Jehoahaz's ſhort reign:

JOSIAH was ſucceeded by his ſon Jehoahaz, whom the people ſet upon the throne, in the 23d year of his age; not in right of ſucceſſion, for he was the youngeſt of Joſiah's (I) ſons, only his bare word for it; and, if real, might be ſuppoſed not to come from the true God, but from his Egyptian deities. But Joſiah was given up to die by this expedition, and was ſuffered to ruſh into it, without conſulting the Lord about the juſtice or ſucceſs of it.

(H) The text ſays indeed, that Jeremiah compoſed a lamentation, which was ſung by a number of ſinging men and women, both at his funeral, and paſſed into uſe afterwards upon all mournful occaſions, and that they are written in the Lamentations (35). And Joſephus adds (36), that they were ſtill extant in his time; by which one would be induced to think, that he meant the ſame with thoſe we have under that name.

But as Joſiah's death was ſudden and unexpected, it is hardly credible, that ſuch a long elegy as this, could be compoſed, and ſet to muſic, againſt his funeral; and is more probable, that that which accompanied his obſequies was much ſhorter, ſuch perhaps as David made upon the death of Saul and Jonathan (37), and was ſince loſt; and this we are ſpeaking of was compoſed in ſome ſubſequent reign, or perhaps, more probably, upon occaſion of the Jewiſh captivity, (38); we find likewiſe, that the prophet Ezekiel was commanded by God to compoſe ſuch another lamentation upon this laſt occaſion *, though not equal to it in beauty and eloquence.

(I) It appears by the firſt book of Chronicles (39), that Joſiah left four ſons, the youngeſt is there, and by Jeremiah, called Shallum, but is the ſame with Jehoahaz (40); it is plain, moreover, that he was at leaſt two years younger than his brother Eliakim, who ſons, but by downright faction. He began to give them early proofs, that he deſigned to reign as wickedly as ſome of his predeceſſors had done, but it was ſoon put out of his power: however, Jeremiah was at firſt ſent to him from God, to exhort him to imitate his father's piety, inſtead of making a ſhew of bewailing his death; adding, that if he did not, he ſhould be carried away captive and die in a ſtrange land [x]. Pharaoh-Necho came accordingly againſt Jeruſalem, in his return from the Aſſyrian expedition, and dethroned him in the third month of his reign; and having ſet his elder brother Eliakim, whoſe name he changed into that of Jehoiakim (K), upon the throne, and laid him under the yearly tribute of 100 talents of ſilver and one talent of gold; he put the captive prince in bands at Riblath, and carried him into Egypt, where he ended his days [y] (L).

who was twenty-five years old when he ſucceeded him, which he did three months after. Archbiſhop Uſher, who thinks, that the people choſe him in haſte, leſt Pharaoh-Necho ſhould ſurpriſe them without a head, ſuppoſes that they exchanged his name Shallum, which they thought unfortunate, becauſe the only king of Iſrael of that name had been murdered in the firſt month of his reign, for that of Jehoahaz, which they thought carried a more promiſeing omen (41).

(K) The ſame learned prelate ſuppoſes this change of names to have been deſigned by the Egyptian king, as an acknowledgment, that he owed his victory over the Aſſyrians to the God of Iſrael, by whoſe command he had undertaken that war againſt them (42); being a kind of abbreviation of יְהוֹיָקִים Jehovah-Jakim, that is the God of Iſrael hath or ſhall make it to proſper, &c. But, as it was the cuſtom of conquerors to give new names to thoſe whom they thus brought under tribute, in token of ſubjection, this laſt ſeems as likely to have been the motive of that change.

(L) It is not eaſy to gueſs what induced the Egyptian monarch to ſhew ſuch preference to Eliakim, and to uſe Jehoahaz with ſuch ſeverity. It can hardly be ſuppoſed, that he laid ſo much ſtreſs upon the right of primogeniture, as to puniſh this laſt for having uſurped his brother's crown; perhaps the Jews have found out, for once, the reaſon of it from the words of Ezekiel; the prophet Jehoiakim's wickedreign.

JEHOIAKIM was nothing terrified by this from following his unhappy brother's steps, nor the people from conforming to his wicked ways; for this Jeremiah was ordered by God, in the very beginning of his reign, to denounce his severe judgments against them, unless they repented. The time chosen for this was the feast of tabernacles, when there was the greatest concourse of people from all parts of the kingdom, and the place the court of the temple. He threatened them, among other things, with the destruction of the city and temple; and for this he was seized by the priests and people, and accused as a seditious person, worthy of nothing less than death. He was, however, acquited and set at liberty by the more equitable princes and elders of the court; who, being persuaded that he spoke by divine command, reminded his accusers of some other prophets, who had formerly denounced the same heavy judgments unpunished and unmolested [z]. Jeremiah was not the only one who was sent upon this dangerous errand; Uriah, another prophet, was forced to fly towards Egypt, for having dared to utter much the same prophecies against Judah and Jerusalem; but the king was so exasperated at him, that he sent some of his men to fetch him back; and as soon as he was come to Jerusalem, he ordered him to be put to death, and his carcass to be thrown among those of the viler sort. Jeremiah had doubtless undergone the same fate, had he not had a powerful protector with the king, Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, who had formerly been in great credit and authority under Josiah, who found means to screen him from the fury of the king and prophet represents that young prince as a couragious undertaking youth, under the figure of a young lion ready for the prey, and concludes this expression; The nations heard of him, he was taken in their snare, and brought into Egypt, loaden with chains (43).

From this passage they conclude, that as soon as he had got himself chosen king, he put himself at the head of an army, resolved to revenge his father's death, and that he was overpower'd by him; but whether Pharaoh came against him to Jerusalem, or Jehoahaz went out against him to Carchemish, they are not agreed; but either of these was enough to induce the conqueror not only to dethrone, but to carry him away prisoner, lest he should in time undertake the same exploit against him (44).

and people [a]; though he had foretold, about the ſame time, the acceſſion of Zedekiah to the crown of Judah, and of Nebuchadnezzar to that of Babylon [b].

ABOUT four years after, finding, that his prophecies had had no effect either upon the king or people, he foretold the deſtruction of Jeruſalem and of the temple, and the Babyloniſh captivity under Nebuchadnezzar, which he ſaid would laſt ſeventy years, ſoon after which that monarchy would be at an end, and the land become deſolate [c] (M). And in the ſame year being ſhut up in priſon, either for that or ſome former prophecy, he cauſed Baruc, who was his ſcribe, to write from his mouth the tenor of the ſame threatenings, and to go and read them in the hearing of all the people, who were then aſſembled at the temple, it ſeems, upon ſome ſolemn faſt (N). Baruc obeyed, and ſome of the chief miniſters, being informed of it, got the roll from him and brought it to the king, who

(M) This captivity was likewiſe foretold, though not in ſuch plain terms, by Iſaiah (45), under the type of Tyre; and alſo by Habakkuk. This laſt, expoſtulating with God about the incorrigible hardneſs of the Jews, is anſwered, that they would be ſhortly invaded and captivated by the Chaldeans (46). He likewiſe foretold the vaſt ſucceſſes of Nebuchadnezzar; and when he repined at the proſperity of that wicked prince and people, he is anſwered, that they alſo ſhould in due time become the ſcorn of other nations, and a prey to thoſe whom they had ſubdued.

(N) Probably that of expiation, which, as we obſerved elſewhere, happened on the 10th day of the month Tiſri, anſwering to the latter end of our September; for it is here obſerved to have been towards winter; and we do not find, that they had any other faſt before the captivity †; neither do they ſeem to have been ſenſible enough of their approaching calamities, to have appointed one for that purpoſe. It is indeed ſaid there, that it was in the 9th month, that the king flung the book into the fire (47); but that interval may eaſily be ſuppoſed to have elapſed, before thoſe nobles were acquainted with the matter, or could find a proper time to inform the impious king with ſuch diſagreeable news.

Jehoiakim's impiety; was then sitting by the fire. He had scarce read a column or two in it, before he cut it in pieces, and flung it in the fire, notwithstanding the endeavours of those that were present to prevent it. Jeremiah and his messenger had doubtless felt the effects of his fury, had they not, as it were by a miracle, been kept out of his reach; however, his impiety did not go long unpunished. The prophet was ordered to write the same denunciations again[d], which were punished. soon after fulfilled, by the coming of the Babylonish king with a powerful army, and a more effectual commission from God, against him and his whole kingdom; as we shall see in due time.

NEITHER were idolatry and contempt of God's worship, the only crimes with which Jehoiakim's reign is branded; he added to them most horrid cruelties and tyrannies, rapines and bloodshed; building and adorning the most sumptuous palaces, by violence and oppression; perverting justice, inventing crimes against the innocent to put them to death, and many more such like impieties; besides his being deaf to the admonitions of so many prophets. For these Jeremiah pronounced at last this dreadful sentence against him; That he should be given up into the hands of his most dreaded enemy, even of Nebuchadnezzar, that he should die unpitied and unlamented, that he should have the sepulture of an ass, and that his carcass should rot upon the ground[e]. By this time also two singular predictions of that prophet had been fulfilled, which ought both to have added weight to the rest, and opened the infatuated prince's eyes to his imminent danger. Jeremiah had, some time before, forewarned him from relying upon the assistance of the king of Egypt, whose army was still at Carchemish, since it would be totally overthrown by the more successful arms of the young Nebuchadnezzar[f], the prince pointed out by providence to subdue, among many other nations, that rebellious one of the Jews. This happened accordingly in the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign, when that young victorious prince, having been taken into partnership of the empire with his father, and sent against the king of Egypt, gave him an entire defeat at Carchemish, took the place, put the whole garison gariſon to the ſword, and beat back the troops that came to its aſſiſtance †.

THIS victory proved the unhappy prelude of Judah's miſfortunes: the conqueror marched directly againſt Jeruſalem and took it (O); rifled the temple of its moſt precious furniture, and the royal palace of its moſt hopeful and beautiful young princes, to be made eunuchs in his own court, according to Iſaiah's prophecy to Hezekiah [g]; and the city of all its choiceſt youths, whether for blood, learning, wit, or beauty, to be likewiſe ſent to Babylon. Among theſe laſt was Daniel and his three companions. Jehoiakim was at firſt put in bonds, and deſigned to be ſent away with the reſt; but, upon his ſubmiſſion and promiſe of paying a yearly tribute to him, the king changed his mind, and left him as a kind of viceroy under him over the kingdom. But, whilſt Nebuchadnezzar was taken up with his other conqueſts he found means to rebel againſt him, after a three years ſubjection and continued about three years without paying him any tribute: his rebellion coſt him dear, for that prince, exaſperated againſt him, inſtead of coming in perſon, ſent an army into Judea, conſiſting of Syrians, Chaldeans, Ammonites, and Moabites, who waſted the whole kingdom, carried away 3023 priſoners; among whom, Joſephus ſays, was the prophet Ezekiel [h]; but it is more likely, that he ſtayed at Jeruſalem till the next reign; took and murdered the unfortunate Jehoiakim, and dragged his carcaſs out of the city gates, where they left it unburied, according to Jeremiah's prediction (P).

(O) This Uſher proves to have happened in the ninth month, from the anniverſary faſt which the Jews have kept ever ſince in memory of that calamity. This is the more worth obſerving, becauſe the ſeventy years captivity, foretold by Jeremiah, muſt be reckoned from this epocha (48).

(P) This laſt circumſtance of the king's death is only inferred from the tenor of the prophecy above-mentioned; for neither the book of Kings, nor that of the Chronicles, make mention of it; the former of which doth even ſay, that he ſlept with his fathers (49); by which muſt be only meant, that he died as they did Jehoiachin's wcikedreign.

HE was ſucceeded by his ſon Jehoiachin, called alſo Jeconiah, and in contempt Coniah (Q), who was then but 18 years old; whether he took the crown contrary to Nebuchadnezzar's mind, or endeavoured to ſhake off his yoke, the text doth not ſay, but only obſerves, that he was as wicked as his father. However, that monarch came up againſt him before he had reigned three months: Jehoiachin came out to him, not in hoſtile, but ſubmiſſive, manner, attended with his mother and his whole court; but they found him inexorable, and were all ſent away captives into Babylon, and died there, according to the prophet's prediction, mentioned in the laſt note. The temple, palace, treaſury, and the whole city were a ſecond time ranſacked, and ſtript of all that was valuable in them; even many precious ornaments and utenſils of the temple, which had continued there ever ſince the time of Solomon, became a prey to the conqueror: he likewiſe tranſported 10,000 men, famed either for their valour or wiſdom; beſides 1000 of the beſt artificers in gold, ſilver, and other metals, and materials; in a word, he left ſcarcely did. Joſephus, who relates this ſtory a little differently, and throws the fault upon the perfidy of the Babylonians, doth, however, own, that his body was caſt out of the city, and left expoſed in the field (50). Other Jews think, that he died as they were carrying him priſoner into Babylon, and that they left his body in the high-way, without farther care (51).

The laſt quoted place out of the Chronicles ſays, that his acts and abominations were recorded in the book of the kings of Iſrael and Judah. Theſe abominations may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to be his idolatries, murders, oppreſſions, and rebellion; but the Targum mentions, moreover, his having the image of Baal upon his forehead; others ſay, that he had ſeveral charms and ſtigmata found upon his body, which proved, that he dealt in deviliſh arts (52); and much more to the ſame purpoſe.

(Q) He is called by this laſt name in Jeremiah, who uttered this dreadful prophecy againſt him (43),—That he ſhould be given into the hand of the king of the Chaldeans;—that he and his mother ſhould end their days in a ſtrange country, wiſhing ſtill in vain to return into their own land: As it happened accordingly not long after.

ly any behind, but the very common people to cultivate the land. Among his captives of note was the famed Mordecai, and, as is moſt generally believed, the prophet Ezekiel. After this he ſet Mattaniah, who was the ſon of Joſiah and uncle to the unhappy Jehoiachin, upon the throne, and changed his name into that of Zedekiah; and, having laid him under a certain tribute, and taken an oath of fidelity and ſubjection [i], returned to his dominions.

ZEDEKIAH began to reign in the 21ſt year of his age, and proved as impious as his late predeceſſors; however, he continued faithful to the king of Babylon ſome few years, during which, he received ſome embaſſies from the kings of Ammon, Moab, Edom, Tyre, and Sidon, who were all under the ſame yoke with him; ſeemingly indeed to congratulate him upon his acceſſion to the crown, but in fact to enter into a confederacy with him againſt the Chaldeans †. The young prince gave but too much heed to their propoſal; but Jeremiah, who was warned of it, ſent to every one of the embaſſadors chains and yokes, which he bid them carry to their reſpective maſters, adviſing them in the name of God to ſubmit themſelves willingly to the king of Babylon, and not provoke him to lay a much ſeverer yoke upon them, by giving credit to their lying ſoothſayers and ſtar-gazers [k]. There were, at the ſame time in Jeruſalem, ſeveral pretended prophets, who endeavoured to perſuade the too credulous king, that, in ſpite of Jeremiah's predictions to the contrary, the captivity would be ſhortly at an end, and that, the ſacred veſſels which had been carried away, would be all reſtored to the temple; to which Jeremiah replyed, that thoſe few, on the contrary, which had been left behind, would be carried off with the reſt. Thus for ſome years, there was nothing ſcrcely to be heard but victory and deliverance on the part of the falſe prophets, and deſolation and ruin from the mouth of Jeremiah. This raiſed him many a bitter enemy, not only in Judea, but even Babylon: for he had taken the opportunity, as often as Zedekiah ſent his yearly tribute thither, to write letters to the captives, exhorting them to bear their yoke patiently, and not to expect a deliverance before the ſeventy years were expired; and they, in return, wrote letters into Judea, to deſire, that he might be apprehended hended and punished, as a dangerous enemy to his country, who uttered, not what the God of Israel, but the king of Babylon, dictated to him [l].

THIS contest lasted some years, during which, his enemies had in vain essayed to stop his mouth, by causing him to be apprehended and imprisoned. The infatuated king was at length persuaded, by his false prophets, to shake off the Babylonish yoke, and that rash enterprise compleated both his own and his kingdom's ruin, and hastened the total destruction of the temple and city. He was then in the ninth year of his reign, when Nebuchadnezzar came with a powerful army, wasted the whole country, seized upon his fortresses, and at length laid close siege to Jerusalem, before Zedekiah could make any provision either for his own defence or escape [m]. It was then, seeing his error too late, he sent privately for Jeremiah, to consult with him what to do; but the prophet only told him, that the city and temple would certainly be destroyed, and himself and all his subjects carried into captivity (R); which answer did so exasperate the king, that he ordered him to be immediately carried into prison [n]. In the mean time Pharaoh-Hophra, or Apries, came with an army against the besiegers: Josephus says, that Zedekiah had made an alliance with him, before he ventured to throw off the yoke [o]; if so, he was the only one that kept it with him; for as for all those other princes, who sent their embassadors to him at the first, it is plain, that they were so

(R) About the same time, Ezekiel prophesied at the captivity (54) much the same things that Jeremiah did at Jerusalem; only with this difference seemingly, that the one said, the king should never see Babylon; whereas the other said expressly, that he should be carried thither prisoner, and end his days there. This seeming contradiction, Josephus tells us (55), staggered the king's faith, and made him give less heed to them; but the difficulty was, rather how to reconcile Ezekiel to himself, who adds, that he should die there, though he did not see it. However, Nebuchadnezzar found out the way of doing it, by putting out that unfortunate prince's eyes.

ſo far from aſſiſting him, that they rather became his enemies and accuſers. However that be, Nebuchadnezzar did not think fit to let the Egyptians come up to him, but raiſed the ſiege for the preſent, and marched directly againſt them. This ſpread ſuch an infatuation among the people in the city, that, looking upon themſelves as already out of all danger, they ventured even to force into their ſervice thoſe very ſervants whom they had but lately diſmiſſed, it being the ſabbatic year; not ſo much out of regard to the law of Moſes, as out of the fear they were in of their revolting to the Chaldeans. The king, however, was not ſo ſanguine, but ſent to deſire Jeremiah to put up his prayers to God for him and the nation; but was anſwered by him, that the Chaldeans would renew the ſiege with freſh vigor, and that his Egyptian allies would leave him to their mercy, and return into their own country. Soon after this, the prophet attempted to make his eſcape, but was caught in his flight, and brought before the princes, who ordered him to be ſcourged and flung into a dungeon. In the mean time, Nebuchadnezzar, having routed the Egyptians, returned to the ſiege, and carried it on ſo vigorouſly, that the inhabitants began to labour under ſuch great ſcarcity of proviſions, that they found it impoſſible to hold it out longer. During this laſt ſiege, the king ſent often to Jeremiah, in hopes of receiving at length ſome comfortable news; but neither his reſentment, nor the grievous things which he was made to ſuffer, could make him ſend a better anſwer, than that they muſt be all carried into captivity. Happy had it been for them if they had taken his counſel, and tried to ſoften their conqueror by a timely ſubmiſſion; but, inſtead of it, the king, to avoid the threatened captivity, endeavoured to make his eſcape by night, attended by his nobles and guards. The Chaldeans, who were ſoon appriſed of it, purſued after them, and brought them back to their exaſperated monarch at Riblah; where he glutted his revenge upon the unfortunate king of Judah with the utmoſt cruelty, by cauſing all his children to be butchered before his eyes, and ordering them immediately after to be put out, that no object might afterwards obliterate the idea of that bloody ſcene. This happened towards the end of the eleventh year of his reign; he was ſoon after ſent into Babylon, loaden with chains, and ended his days in a priſon. Zedekiah's miſerable end. Nebuzar-adan, who commanded them after Nebuchadnezzar's departure, cauſed the two braſen columns, that ſtood in the court of the temple, to be broken in pieces (S), and all the gold, ſilver, and coſtly furniture to be taken away, whilſt the reſt of his army made the ſame havock in the city; and on the third day after his entrance into it, which was the tenth of the fourth month, anſwering to our Auguſt 27 [p], and a ſabbath-day; he ordered the temple, palace, and the whole city to be ſet on fire, and and burnt. burnt to the ground. The walls, towers, and other fortifications were next ordered to be demoliſhed, and all the Jews, down to the very common people, to be carried away priſoners, except ſome few of the baſer ſort, whom he left to till the land [q]. As for Jeremiah, Nebuchadnezzar had given his general ſuch charge concerning him, that he was well treated and ſet at liberty, and went and lived with Gedaliah (T), whom that general left as a kind of governor over the miſerable remnant left behind.

Theſe, together with the large molten ſea, lavers, and many more of the like nature, though all of them maſter-pieces in their kind, had hitherto been ſpared by other conquerors, but became now a prey to the fury or avarice of the Babyloniſh general, who cauſed them to be all carried away, with a vaſt multitude of other ſacred utenſils, ſuch as cauldrons, cenſers, tables, tongs, forks, and many others, whether of gold, ſilver, or copper.

(T) This Gedaliah, was the ſon of Ahikan, a perſon in ſuch credit in all the later reigns, that he had been able to ſkreen that prophet from the reſentment of the king and fury of the people; ſo that it is very probable, Jeremiah, in gratitude to his father, obtained this favour for him from Nebuzar-adan. And this might alſo be the motive that induced him to go and live with him in Judea, rather than to go into Babylon, when that general put it to his option, not without ſome conſiderable encouragements, to invite him to the latter.

(56) 2 Chron. iv. 11, & ſeq.

THIS was the dreadful end of that glorious kingdom, and of the Iſraelitiſh monarchy, after it had ſtood 468 years from the time that David began to reign over it, 388 years from the revolt of the ten tribes from it, and 134 years from the exciſion of the Iſraelitiſh common-wealth [r]; and had continued under the ſun-ſhine of the divine protection, which nothing could have eclipſed, but their almoſt conſtant and horrid ingratitude, and invincible itch of imitating the idolatries and witcheries of other nations: crimes, which though become as abominable to God, as they were univerſally practiſed by mankind, yet ſeem to have flowed from a purer ſource, though corrupted by degrees to this vaſt height, by the amazing degeneracy of mankind; but for this we ſhall refer the reader to the appendix here annexed. How the Jewiſh captives fared in Babylon, will be ſeen in the next chapter: all that remains to be taken notice of, with reſpect to the Jews that were left in Canaan, is, that treacherous and bloody action, which was committed upon Gedaliah, the Jewiſh deputy, by one of the princes of Judah.

HIS name was Iſhmael, he had eſcaped the common fate, by taking timely refuge with the king of Ammon. After Nebuzar-adan's departure, he obſerved, that great numbers of diſperſed Jews flocked to Gedaliah, who gave them a kind reception, and plenty of proviſions to ſubſiſt upon, till they could come to till the land; and being moved with envy, and inſtigated by the Ammoniti ſh king, came to him with ten reſolute fellows to Mizpah, with a deſign to aſſaſſinate him. Gedaliah was indeed warned of his intent, but was ſo far from giving credit to it, that he entertained him with all the tokens of friendſhip and reſpect, and gave thereby the treacherous Iſhmael an opportunity of murdering both him and all the brave Chaldeans he had about him. Two days after, meeting with about fourſcore Iſraelites clad in mourning, who were going to bewail the ruin of the city and temple, and to offer up their devotions there; he by ſome means enticed them to Mizpah, where he murdered them, and threw their carcaſſes into a well. He was returning into the land of Ammon, with a number of priſoners which he made at Mizpah, among whom were ſome princeſſes of Judah, whom the Babyloniſh general had left with Gedaliah; but was purſued by Johanan and ſome other Hebrew captains, who who rescued all the prisoners, and forced him to fly for his life, with only eight of his men.

THIS barbarous action made the Jewish officers, and the rest of the people, so afraid of the Chaldeans resentment, that they began to think of fleeing into Egypt for safety. They consulted Jeremiah about it, who gave them this answer from the Lord ten days after, that if they tarried in Judea, they should be protected from the Chaldeans, but that if they persisted in their design of going down into Egypt, they should all inevitably perish there, and share in the dreadful calamities of that perishing kingdom. This speech, however, was so far from deterring them, who were always bent upon disobedience and contradiction, that, suspecting him to have been instigated by Baruc, rather than inspired by God, they both ventured to go down, and to force them two to go along with them. As soon as they had reached the city of Taphnes, Jeremiah began to foretel the taking of that place, and the desolation of that kingdom by Nebuchadnezzar [s]; which happened accordingly soon after, as we have seen elsewhere *, and shall have occasion again to mention in the next chapter. What became of Jeremiah is not known; some suppose him to have been stoned by his countrymen; but that is meer guess-work, and it is not material enough to enquire further about it.

An APPENDIX,

Concerning the Rise and Progress of IDOLATRY and WITCHCRAFT.

WE hope our readers will not think it amiss, if we close this Jewish history, with a short enquiry into the origin and progress of those two epidemic evils, idolatry and witchcraft, which had so long and so universally infected the world, and more particularly the Israelites; and proved so obstinately rooted in the latter, as to bring a total excision of one of their kingdoms, and so long and severe a captivity upon the other.

We ſhall, however, forbear deſcanting upon the manifold opinions of the learned about this matter, becauſe we think, that they have gone a great way for the cauſes of it, and overlooked thoſe more natural ones which were juſt at their elbow. But here, with reſpect to the firſt of theſe evils, we would be far from rejecting that probable opinion of ſome judicious men [a], which fetches its origin from the promiſe, made to Adam, of the ſeed of the woman, or the Meſſiah and Mediator; from the progenitorſhip of whom Ham and Canaan having been excluded, for their irreverent behaviour towards their naked father, our authors ſuppoſe Canaan might be induced to obliterate and revenge that loſs and diſgrace, by corrupting the true meaning of the prophecy; and inſtead of one mediator, to be born in after-ages of the line of Shem, to introduce the worſhip of a multiplicity of them, not of human race, but of ſome ſuperior nature, among their poſterity. And if it be at leaſt a very probable opinion, that it was this very Meſſiah who appeared in ſome viſible ſhape, and had frequent intercourſes with Adam and the patriarchs; or though even theſe apparitions were, as others will have them, only thoſe of angels, deputed by God, and ſpeaking in his name †, but from whoſe intercourſe he and his curſed poſterity may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been excluded; how natural was it for him to arrogate a ſuperiority over his rival, as well in the number and frequency, as in the intimacy and excellence, of thoſe heavenly viſiters, by rearing an infinite multitude of altars to them. Thus, for inſtance, Egypt was the place, where Miſraim, if not Ham, fixed his abode; and how thriving a ſoil it proved for them, needs not to be repeated here; whereas the holy patriarchs, who offered their ſacrifices to the true God upon thoſe altars only, which they occaſionally reared in thoſe places where he appeared to them, having but a very ſmall number of them, appeared vaſtly inferior to them in this reſpect in the eyes of an ignorant world.

But though this accounts probably enough for the riſe of polytheiſm, yet it leaves us wholly in the dark about the more abſurd and unnatural worſhip of ſtocks and ſtones, under various figures of the planets, and of ſeveral parts of the animal and vegetable creation; which is more particularly cularly the subject of our present inquiry. For we cannot see, which way these can be said, in any sense, to have been introduced in consequence of the former. As for those who derive them from the custom of deifying their heroes, and erecting statues and monuments to them, which came in time to be worshipped, instead of the prototypes, we can by no means agree to them; because it doth not appear to us, that those apotheoses began any thing so early as the times we are speaking of; they seem rather to have been introduced in consequence of the notion of polytheism; so that we must seek elsewhere for the source of idolatry. For as for what we have said on this head in the history of Egypt *, the reader may remember, that we did not give it as our particular opinion, but either as the best account, which the priests of that nation could give for their various kinds of worship to Herodotus, or as the conjectures of that, or other authors, concerning their superstitious and nonsensical mythology.

But as to us, we rather think, that the origin and progress of idolatry is plainly pointed out to us, in the account which Moses gives us of Laban's and Jacob's parting [b]. The reader may remember, that these two, after a sharp contest, being ready to depart, the one into Mesopotamia, and the other into Canaan, agreed to bind themselves and their posterity, by a solemn oath on both sides, to live in peace and friendship with each other. Now the way they took to ratify and perpetuate the memory of this covenant was, the rearing up a heap of stones in the place; which seems, therefore, to have been founded upon some ancient and common custom of that nature, and well known to them both, and only differently interpreted by them, according to their different religions. Jacob, who was a worshipper of the true God, called this monument Galeed, or Gall-hed, a heap of witness, that is, an authentic record of his having appealed to the God of heaven for the faithful performance of the agreement on his part: This was the pure original sense of this ceremony. Laban, on the other hand, interprets it according to the corrupt theology of his time and country, in terms to this effect; this heap be both a Galeed, or record of our mutual oath; וְהַמִּצְפָּה Ve-hammitzphah, and also a watchman, or rather a watch-tower, from which the gods, that is, that of Abraham, and that, or those, of Nahor, may behold behold and puniſh the aggreſſor, when we come to be at ſuch a diſtance from each other, that there will be none elſe to ſee and judge between us.

* Vol. i. p. 561. & seq.

IT is true, indeed, that Laban's words might be capable of a more figurative conſtruction, did not the outcry which he made after his gods [c] ſhew him to have been ſuch a thorough-paced idolater, as to be incapable of being underſtood in any other ſenſe. This made Jacob, who doubtleſs could beſt judge of his meaning, carefully avoid ſwearing by any other oath than by the Dread, that is, by the God, of his father Iſaac [d].

HOWEVER, not to lay greater ſtreſs upon this than we need, it is plain, that if ſuch a cuſtom as this was once introduced, of erecting monuments in memory of any ſolemn covenants, the tranſition was eaſy into the notion, that the Godhead, or rather ſome deity, took its reſidence in it, in order to puniſh the firſt aggreſſors; and how ſoon this might be improved by an ignorant and degenerate world, till not only birds, beaſts, ſtocks, and ſtones, but ſun, moon, and ſtars, were called into the ſame office; though uſed perhaps at firſt, by the deſigning part of mankind, as ſcare-crows, to over-awe the ignorant. This is indeed the moſt that it ever did, even whilſt idolatry was at the heighth; whilſt the more cunning ſort laughed at it, and only made it to ſerve their own ends.

THE next improvement might be that of witchcraft, and the ſame kind of policy might oblige thoſe Matchiavels to wink at, if not to encourage, a numerous herd of inferior knaves, as muſt naturally be bred out of the dregs of this corrupt theology, under the denominations of aſtrologers, enchanters, ſorcerers, teraphim-makers, retainers of familiar ſpirits, ſooth-ſayers, fortune-tellers, and many more of the ſame nature, who were all greedily reſorted unto by the populace upon all occaſions; though in matters, of great moment, they were forced to receive their directions from their principals.

HITHERTO we have avoided meddling with the common opinion, which makes the devil the cauſe of all theſe miſchiefs; if he was really ſo, what we have ſaid will only ſhew how eaſy it was for him to compaſs his end. But tho' the ſcriptures ſeem plainly to intimate ſome kind of intercourſe between ſome men and women and ſome kind kind of ſpirits, as in the caſe of Egyptian conjurers and the witch of Endor; yet we do not find, that the devil is any where charged with having debauched mankind into idolatry or witchcraft, how glad and ready ſoever he might be to encourage them, after men had once introduced the notion of them into the world. This we purpoſely take notice of, becauſe the hypotheſis we are ſpeaking againſt ſuppoſes ſuch an extent of power in him, as would be highly derogatory of the divine goodneſs, whilſt it left the bulk of mankind under a kind of inevitable neceſſity of falling into all his ſnares, with thoſe little aſſiſtances they had, either from the dim light of reaſon, or the book of nature.

THERE is indeed a great deal of difference between ſuppoſing, that the devil firſt blinded mankind, and then led them into all manner of wickedneſs; and ſaying, that men, having ſhamefully corrupted themſelves, proceeded from one wickedneſs to another, till at length, being given up to their abominable luſts, they became the ſlaves of that evil ſpirit, and were eaſily enticed by him into this exceſs of impiety.

WE may add, that mankind, if we except the families of a few patriarchs, carrying their views no farther than this life, their inſatiable deſire after wealth, their care of preſerving it, an unaccountable itch to pry into futurity, and the like, did naturally lead them into all that variety of ſuperſtitious traſh, we have been ſpeaking of. Could any thing therefore more effectually cure the Iſraelites, too prone to imitate them in all theſe, than to make their worldly happineſs riſe and fall, according as they ſhewed the greater abhorrence or fondneſs for every thing that bordered upon idolatry and witchcraft.

THUS then the antient and truly religious cuſtom of ratifying oaths and contracts by ſuch monuments, which was only an appeal to God's all-ſeeing eye, inſenſibly degenerated into the groſſeſt and abſurdeſt idolatry, under the multiform notion of guardian idols or gods, protectors of houſes, lands, kingdoms, &c. Thence ſprung the trades of conjuring each reſpective deity to its particular idol, and uſe; of foretelling things by a pretended intimacy with thoſe deities; the art of ſtar-gazing and aſtrology; of making teraphims, idols, and other charms, offenſive and defenſive, under their proper conſtellations; with the whole train of heatheniſh ſuperſtition, forbid under ſuch ſevere penalties by the Jewiſh law-giver.

BUT

But if this ſhould not ſufficiently account for the origin of witchcraft, what we ſhall add concerning one branch of it, as yet unmentioned, may perhaps do it more effectually; we mean the heretofore ſo much boaſted craft of enchanting ſerpents, inſomuch, that we read of whole nations that pretended to it; and ſome learned fathers ſeem to expreſs ſuch an admiration of it, as if they had really ſeen, or had been ſome other way fully convinced of it. But the notion muſt have been of much older date, ſince the pſalmiſt, ſpeaking according to the vulgar opinion, compares the ſad miſchiefs of an evil tongue to the poiſon of the deaf adder, that ſtoppeth her ears againſt the charms of the moſt cunning enchanter [e]. What pains hath it not coſt ſome antient fathers [f], and, of late eſpecially, the learned Bochart [g], to find out a ſerpent that anſwered the character given here by the pſalmiſt. Deaf ones we need not be at a loſs for; we have a ſort in England, which, though not exactly of the ſame colour with thoſe of our author, but rather of a reddiſh copper hue, ſeem to be quite deaf, and their bite is reckoned mortal: but David ſpeaks of one that ſtoppeth her ear to the charmer's voice; and this has given occaſion for various conjectures, which may be beſt ſeen in the author himſelf. For our part, we ſee no reaſon to underſtand theſe words literally, any more than if he had compared an evil tongue to the voice of a ſyren, the claws of a harpy, the eyes of a baſiliſk, or of any other fabulous creature; we hope, that in neither caſe there is now any neceſſity, either for diſproving the reality of ſuch creatures, or for vindicating the ſacred poet's alluſion to them. All that we pretend here is, to enquire, how the notion of this pretended art came to be introduced, and ſo univerſally received, in the world; and this cannot, we think, be done, without fetching its origin from the old ſerpent in paradiſe [h].

And here we need not obſerve, how much every circumſtance in the hiſtory of his ſeducing the woman; his being, according to the common verſion, called the moſt ſubtle of all creatures, his being choſen by the devil, as the fitteſt inſtrument to deceive her, the curſe pronounced againſt gainſt him by God, and the enmity intailed between his and her ſeed, might contribute to the notion of ſerpents being infected with ſome diabolical peſtiferous quality, which made them thus ſtrangely deſtructive to mankind. But what we would firſt of all take notice of is, that though, in our former account of our firſt parents ſeduction †, we followed the current of all verſions, which repreſent that reptile as the moſt ſubtle of all living creatures, yet the term ערם Harum, which Moſes there makes uſe of, ſignifies quite another thing, namely, in its primitive ſignification, naked; accordingly he ſays, in the preceding verſe, that our firſt parents were ערומים Harumim, naked; ſo that, in a figurative ſenſe, it may properly enough ſignify a harmleſs inoffenſive creature. It ſeems even probable, that the ſacred hiſtorian takes notice of this circumſtance, as one main reaſon of Eve's being ſo eaſily deceived by it; for what could be more fit for the devil's purpoſe than ſuch a one, which was furniſhed with neither legs, claws, horns, or any one ſingle part, even for its own defence? had it indeed been really the craftieſt of all animals, Adam could not but have known it, ſeeing he gave them all names according to their natures; and then Eve could not but have been particularly miſtruſtful of him, ſo that he would have been the laſt that the devil would have pitched upon to tempt her. Hence we would obſerve, 1. That it was chiefly this naked, defenceleſs, and inoffenſive appearance, though adorned perhaps with all thoſe beauties of ſhape, colour, and wings, which we mentioned before under that head *, that gained credit with her; and, 2. That whenever the ſame term is uſed afterwards to ſignify cunning, as it ſometimes doth; it is only the word Harum, naked or ſimple, ironically applyed.

HERE was then a creature, which, from being originally harmleſs and inoffenſive, became the moſt dangerous and deadly one in the whole creation: a wonderful change of nature, to all outward appearance, without change of ſhape; a power to kill infuſed into it, without the addition of any offenſive part; inflicting a ſure and ſpeedy, a painful and unaccountable, death, and yet not able to give the body a greater wound, than that of a ſeemingly ſlight prick. What could an infant world attribute all theſe ſurpriſing effects to, but to ſome deadly occult quality, which the devil devil left behind him with it? or what could be more apt to cultivate that notion, if not to give the firſt riſe to it, than the enmity intailed between mankind and the ſerpent, after the prophetic ſenſe of it had once been obliterated with the far greateſt part of the world? and whence ſhould they expect a remedy againſt this ſuppoſed preternatural evil, but from pretended preternatural means? ſo that though we are far from thinking, that it ſent men to the devil for help, for charms, and enchantments, yet it might eaſily induce thoſe who firſt found out a cure for the bite of thoſe venemous creatures, to aſſume to themſelves ſome ſupernatural ſkill, in order both to gain greater credit and admiration among the people, and to prevent their prying too narrowly into their ſecrets. How much farther theſe pretended enchanters improved this notion of a preternatural, or diabolical, vertue in ſerpents, above all other creatures, is plain, from that vaſt variety of ſurpriſing tricks, which they attributed to them [1]; one of which, and that not by far the moſt extraordinary, was that of ſtopping their ears, that they might be proof againſt all enchantments; and it is this, we ſhall now endeavour to account for.

It is not to be doubted, but theſe cunning artiſts had acquainted themſelves, as far as they could, with all the various kinds of ſerpents; ſome of which, ſuch as our common ſnakes, being found to be perfectly harmleſs, might ſerve them to amuſe the ignorant, by pretending, that they had charmed them into that inoffenſive familiarity, which they beheld with the utmoſt wonder; others, of a more dangerous nature, ſuch as the viper or adder, but which only bite when hurt or provoked, might be either tamed by degrees, and by gentle uſage, or rendered harmleſs by breaking thoſe two teeth, through which they inject their poiſon; the latter therefore might be uſed as an amuſement, and the former to try experiments, to find out remedies; and both together to deceive the world, by ſhewing their pretended capacity, or incapacity, to hurt or kill, according as they were, or were not, inchanted. But as they found their remedies ineffectual in many caſes, and againſt the bite of ſome kinds of ſerpents, they had no other way to ſave themſelves, than by pretending, that thoſe thoſe had a particular vertue, which was proof againſt their charms; and as the deaf kind is the moſt deadly, and hitherto found to be incurable, nothing could be more natural, than for the pretended enchanters to affirm, that their charms conſiſted in the ſound of certain words, pronounced in the hearing of thoſe reptiles, which could therefore have no effect againſt them, becauſe they had the ſkill of turning a deaf ear to them. Hence came the notion of their hearing but with one ear, which they ſtopped either with the end of their tail, or by laying it cloſe to the ground, whenever they found themſelves in danger of being enchanted; and many others equally abſurd, invented on purpoſe to account for the pretended ſuperiority of ſkill in this creature, above that of the enchanter.

THUS we hope, that the hiſtory of Jacob and Laban makes it at leaſt very probable, that idolatry, with all its long train of vain and abſurd, of vile and abominable attendants, was at firſt foiſtered into the world from the primitive notion of God's omnipreſence; which, through the degeneracy and ignorance of the world, which could not perhaps comprehend the poſſibility of the deity being preſent and attentive to every part of the creation, branched itſelf out into that infinite multitude of deities, of various ſizes and natures, as beſt ſuited with their corrupt notions and morals. We may add, that the righteous line of Shem is not the only people, who are recorded to have preſerved this pure and primitive notion, ſince, as we obſerved formerly †, the inhabitants of Thebais, or upper Egypt, did worſhip none but the Cneph, or ſupreme deity, whilſt the lower part of the country was immerſed in the groſſeſt idolatry. How far the early notion of good and bad ſpirits might further contribute to corrupt this pure and primitive ſenſe of God's omnipreſence, and degenerate by degrees into a belief that they were, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, the eyes and hands of the deity, and the inſtruments of his favour or juſtice, we need not ſay; and if this was the caſe, how eaſy was it for the corrupt phyſiologiſts of thoſe times to turn them all into deities, and even aſſign them their ſeveral provinces over every creature, according as they found it beneficial or hurtful to mankind. Hence proceeded, moſt likely, the worſhip of crocodiles, ibis, rats, onions, garlick, and many more among the Egyptians; and of the heavenly bodies, both by them and the reſt of the world *.

Now

† See vol. i. p. 101. * Ibid. p. 96. not. x. & p. 97.

Now there is nothing more plain, than that all this infinite variety of ſuperſtitions was owing to that inſatiable deſire after thoſe various kinds of happineſs, which their vitiated taſte made them ſeek after, according to their different inclinations, from thoſe imaginary diſpenſers of them. So that if the Iſraelites could but have kept themſelves wholly free from it, it would have proved the moſt effectual means, perhaps, of recovering the reſt of mankind, by ſetting before their eyes a whole nation, enjoying the heighth of grandeur and happineſs, not from thoſe fancied deities which engroſſed the worſhip of other nations, from whom they were ſo far from expecting any bleſſings, that they had both them, and their ſtupid votaries, in greateſt contempt and abhorrence; but under the influence of the only ſupreme creator of heaven and earth, whom alone they acknowledged to be the bountiful giver of all good. Here then was at once the ſource of their guilt and unhappineſs, that they thwarted, inſtead of complying with, the deſigns of providence; and, by their ſhameful imitation, confirmed other nations in their deluſions and idolatry, whom they were deſigned to cure by their utter deteſtation of them.

But there was ſtill a farther aggravation of their guilt and impiety, the inhuman cruelties which were practiſed at the worſhip of ſome, and the filthy and unnatural ceremonies which were uſed at that of other, of theſe falſe deities. All theſe may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been invented by crafty and deſigning men, meerly to gratify the depraved appetites of a ſenſeleſs vulgar, in order to make it ſubſervient to their more latent views; but when they came to be adopted by God's peculiar people, in ſpight of all his moſt expreſs prohibitions and threatenings, they carried a much higher degree of guilt in them, becauſe they tended to caſt a double diſhonour upon him, among thoſe wiſer heathens, who were ignorant of his laws againſt them, and yet abhorred them, as being manifeſtly contrary to his nature. For what opinion could they have of the God of Iſrael, or how could they believe him to be the ſupreme being, and yet ſuffer his people to commit ſuch abominations? What muſt even the very Iſraelites themſelves think of him, if they could ſuppoſe, that he would indulge them in thoſe very impieties, for which he had ſo ſeverely puniſhed the nations, whoſe land they now inhabited?

To all this let us add their obstinate unbelief, which hardened them against the most pathetic remonstrances, and dreadful threatenings of their prophets, whom God still sent to them upon all such defections; and who never appeared in greater number, than they did towards the approaching captivity, which their multiplied impieties were hastening upon them, and proved at last the only effectual means of curing them at once of their idolatry and unbelief. Whether the severity of their thraldom, the monstrous variety of superstition, which they beheld among the Babylonians, or the continued exhortations of Ezekiel and other prophets, who were with them in the captivity, contributed most to this extraordinary change, we will not pretend to say, but this is plain, that ever since their return from thence, they have always expressed the greatest abhorrence to those two crimes. Yet even in these two respects, they seem rather to have gone into the other extreme, and to have strove only to atone for former faults, by running into others, if not equal in guilt, yet at least equally dangerous. For the truth of this, we need but refer the reader to what we have had frequent occasion to observe concerning them. Thus, for instance, idolatry, once their most favourite vice, has been since had in such abhorrence among them, that they would not stoop before a statue, though it were to pluck a thorn out of their foot *; and may we not reasonably suppose, that it was in order to make amends for their former unbelief, that they so greedily swallowed down such a number of monstrous fables, of which, those we have quoted in this history out of their Talmud, are but a small scantling; and prefer that pretended oral law or tradition, wherein they find such plenty of materials to exercise their faith, to the sacred writings, wherein they find little or nothing like it? well might our Saviour charge those of his time with straining at a gnat, and swallowing a camel †; and an honest rabbi of theirs advises them to insert the decalogue in their Talmud, as the only means to prevent the shameful and almost universal breach of it amongst them.

HOWEVER, it behoves us to spare and pity them in this respect, since it was their unaccountable fondness for these traditions above the sacred writings, that inspired them with with that bitterneſs and malice againſt the Meſſiah, the redeemer of mankind, which made them perſecute him to that ſlaviſh death, from which we derive our freedom and aſſurance of a better life; eſpecially, ſince their continuing to this day in unbelief affords us ſo irrefragable an argument for the authority of the Old Teſtament, and conſequently for the truth and divinity of the New; into which we are not without ſome ſure hopes of their being admitted in God's good time ‡.

CHAP. VIII.

The Hiſtory of ASSYRIA.

SECT. I.

The Deſcription of ASSYRIA.

WE have already accounted for the name of this country, declaring it to have been derived from Aſhur, its firſt planter after the flood [a], and have obſerved [b], that its name extended very far weſtward over the whole country of Aram, or Syria (A), which at this time Its name.

[a] See vol. i. p. 459. [b] See vol. ii. p. 262.

(A) Bochart (1) divides the Aſſyrians into two ſorts, thoſe properly ſo called, beyond the Tigris, and derived from Aſhur, and thoſe on this ſide of the Euphrates, who derived their name from צור Sur, or Tyre (2), by means of an article prefixed thereto, as in הצורים Haſſurim, but whatever there may really be in this, it will, upon examination, be thought to be of no great weight. The deſcent of the two nations is ſo different, the one from Aſhur, the other from Aram, and their diſtance from each other ſo wide, that we can never think ſo ſlight an accident, as an article perfixed to Sur, ſhould cauſe the potent and ancient nation of the Aramites, or Syrians, to be called, by all the nations about, Aſſyrians; and particularly, when there is ſo much to be ſaid againſt it, as may be found in the next note.

(1) Phaleg. l. 4. c. 34. (2) See vol. ii. p. 331.

gives appellation to moſt of the country between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean. Eaſtward, ſouthward, and northward it muſt alſo have extended its name, where-ever its monarchs had eſtabliſhed themſelves by the fortune of their arms (B).

IF we conſider the monarchy of Aſſyria geographically, we have already done much towards a deſcription of it, in what we have formerly ſaid of the ſeveral countries whoſe hiſtories go before, and which may, in this light, be conſidered as provinces of Aſſyria, and more we ſhall do towards this work in our deſcriptions of ſeveral other countries, whoſe hiſtories are to follow, and which the order, we have hitherto obſerved, requires us to defer to the places naturally belonging to them; and the ſame order obliges us here to confine ourſelves to the proper Aſſyria.

Extent. THE preciſe extent of this country may not exactly be known, and it might be labour quite in vain to attempt to ſettle it; but taking it to have been the ſame with the province of Curdeſtân at this day, it lay eaſtward of the Tigris, and extended almoſt north-eaſt and ſouth-weſt from the ſprings of that river and the lake Van, to the province of Khuzeſtân in Perſia; or, according to Ptolemy, it lay along

(B) Where ever this monarchy extended itſelf, it is apparent, that it extended its name together with its dominions; ſo Meſopotamia, the Aram-Naharaim of the Jewiſh writers, is ſaid (3) to have been called the Mid Aſſyria; and ſo alſo Babylon and Chaldea were reckoned to be a part of that country (4), as well as the reſt, we may ſuppoſe, that owned ſubjection to the kings of Niniveh. In conformity to this, we are told by Trogus Pompeius (5), that the Aſſyrians, by contraction, came to be called Syrians. It was the firſt great monarchy, and its name grew venerable in proceſs of time, even to thoſe who had formerly ſuffered by its power; and hence out of vanity, or from a long ſettled cuſtom, the nations round about affected to call themſelves Aſſyrians, or elſe others affected to call them ſo, or, thirdly, they may have been commanded ſo to denominate themſelves by the conqueror. To diſmiſs this, we would take notice, that there ſeems to be nothing more uncertain, than what the Greeks and Latins mean by Aſſyria and Aſſyrian; they are of ſuch comprehenſive latitude with theſe writers, as to take in all the country and people between the Mediterranean, on the weſt, and the river Indus, on the eaſt.

(3) Arrian. Exped. Alexand. l. 7. p. 453. (4) Ammian. Marcel. l. 23. c. 20. (5) Juſt. l. 1. c. 2. See vol. ii. p. 262.

along the eastern banks of the Tigris, from mount Niphates to mount Zagros, being bounded on the east by mount Choatras. Such was its situation and boundaries, as should seem, and is agreed upon by geographers; but for its exact extent we chuse to pass that over, as a thing uncertain, and not within the compass of our knowledge.

THIS country, which must, in its happy times, have been a land of plenty (C), has almost ever since the fall of its empire been decaying; a misfortune which has been particularly incident to it, by the very nature of its situation, which has, at times, made it the seat of war between potent empires and nations; and it is now become a wilderness, a desart, excepting some little land that may be cultivated about the few and inconsiderable towns which stand within its borders [c], so that there is but little to be said of its productions and properties.

WE have already said as much of the first postdiluvian state of this country and its ancient cities, Niniveh and the rest, as we have been able to gather, so that we have here nothing to do, but to refer back the reader to what of that kind is in the former part of this work [d], and proceed to the division and arrangement of it by the Greeks.

PTOLEMY [e] divides Assyria, beginning from the northwest to the south-east, into the several provinces of Arrapachitis,

[c] Rauwolf's Trav. p. ii. c. 9. [d] See vol. i. p. 370. [e] Lib. 6. c. 1.

(C) A land of plenty and pleasure it must undoubtedly have been; but this may not have been the country designated in scripture (6) by a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land of oil-olive, and of honey, as Bochart thinks (7), and Rauwolf (8); for Rabshakeh, who speaks of this (9), may, as is most likely, have understood his words, as of some of the new conquered provinces of Assyria, and not of Assyria itself, properly so called; so that this does not amount to a positive proof of what is asserted concerning the fertility and amenity of the Proper Assyria; though indeed it must be confessed to be a very strong circumstance to make us believe, it was no ways inferior to the country or countries intended by the text above; we may easily conceive the conqueror would have seized on the best for himself, and not have bestowed it on the foreign captives he made and transplanted.

pachitis, Adiabene (D), Arbelitis, Calacine, or Chalachene, Apolloniatis, and Sittacene, but there is no pretending to set bounds to these several divisions, or assigning to each the cities, that may, in former times, have belonged thereto. Nor are these all the parts of Assyria mentioned by ancient geographers: we have the name of Aturia [f], or Atyria (E), as a part of this country,

(D) The whole country has been sometimes called by the name of this part of it. So Pliny observes (10), that the country of Adiabene was in former times called Assyria; the same says Ammianus Marcellinus (11) who (12) derives the name from two rivers of the country, called Diaba and Adiaba, rejecting the common opinion, which derives it from the Greek word Διαβάινειν transire διὰ τὸ εἶναι πλειοὺς ποταμοὺς ἐν αὐτῇ· ἢ δυσχερεστέραν ποιεῖν τὴν διάβασιν, because of the many rivers which make it difficult to travel or pass (13). Thus is it also, that Suidas (14) accounts for this name; to which he adds fabulously, that here is the mouth of Avernus, which sends up so pestiferous a vapour, that no bird or beast may take in the least scent of it, but death must be the unhappy consequence; and that hence also it was called Adiabene, or Impassable. To pass over other obscurities concerning the derivation of this name (15), Bochart (16) gives it an Assyrian or Chaldean origin, forming it from the Chaldee חדי״ב, or חדי״ב Hadjab, or Hadyab, as it is called by the Talmudists and the Chaldee interpreter; as also חדי״בא Hadjaba, or Hadjava; whence he deduces (17) Ammianus Marcellinus's (18), Adiavena, which whence it became the name of this part of Assyria may be observed anon.

(E) This also, though apparently but a small district of this country, extended itself over the whole, and, according to Bochart (19), was a name synonymous with Assyria, allowing only for the difference of a dialect; the former being the Hebrew, and the other the Chaldee, way of writing this name; the Chaldees constantly converting the Hebrew שׂ Sin into the ת Tau; so that what the Hebrews pronounce Assyria, they pronounce Atyria. Whatever there may be in this, the Greeks plainly took Aturia, or Atyria, to be no more than a province or district of Assyria. Strabo (20) divides Aturia from Arbelitis by the river Lycus; whence it is plain, it was by the Greeks reckoned as a part only of this country, however the name may have been common to all of it.

country, as also Artacene (F) and Chalonitis [g] (G).

AMONG the rivers of Assyria, we may justly reckon the Tigris (H), not only because it bathed all the western skirts of this country, but also because all the other rivers of this kingdom fell into this; as also, because the great cities of this kingdom [h], Niniveh, Ctesiphon, and others, were situated thereon. The other rivers of less note were, the Lycus, the Caprus, and the Gorgus (I), at

(F) This is supposed to have derived its name from the city of Erech (21), or Arec. This is the opinion both of Scaliger and Casaubon (22); and if so, we have nothing to do with it at present, for it was not in this country, but in the land of Shinaar (23), on this side of the Tigris.

(G) This may have been the same with Cala and Calacine, for which we must refer to what we have already said (24) before, only observing, that the Callonites of Polybius (25) may have been the same.

(H) Said to have borrowed this name from the number of tigers on its banks; and the rather, as there are two other rivers in this country, the Lycus and the Caprus, which seem to borrow their names from a cause of the same nature, the one being denominated from a wolf, the other from a goat (26); others derive it from a Persian word, signifying an arrow *; by this, and the former, importing it to be rapid and violent in its course: But this is contradicted by Pedro de la Valle (27), who says, it is a slower stream than the Euphrates; and Thevenot (28) seems to assign a reason why the Tigris should not be so very swift, saying, it is not only more crooked and full of meanders than ever he saw, but also choaked up with islands and great banks of stone. Bochart derives it from its old Hebrew name Hiddekel; and the Arabs, at this day, call it دجلة Dijlat. The inhabitants hereabouts call it Hiddekel to this day (29).

(I) The Lycus and the Caprus, according to Bochart (30), are the two rivers Diaba and Adiaba, or Diava and Adiava. דיבא Diava, at almoſt an equal diſtance from each other, and ſuppoſed to have been all between the two cities of Ninus, or Niniveh, and Seleucia.

CONCERNING

Diava, he obſerves, is lupus or lupinus, wolf, or wolfiſh; דיבא Diava, being Chaldee for a wolf; and hence he derives the Greek Lycus, which ſignifies the ſame. Hadiaba, the name of the other, he derives, or at leaſt is ready ſo to do, from an Arabic word ſignifying ſwift; but this is a moſt obſcure point; and therefore we proceed to take notice, that theſe two rivers are now called, or ſuppoſed to be ſo, the great Zab and little Zab. According to Bochart (31), this latter name is corrupted from Diaba, or derived from the Hebrew זאב Zeeb, which differ but in dialect. Thevenot (32) calls theſe rivers Zarb, but ſpeaks as of but one, which he ſaw fall into the Tigris; he calls it a large river, makes it above half as broad as the Tigris, and obſerves, that it is very rapid, that its water is whitiſh and very cold, which he would ſeemingly account for by its falling from the mountains of Curdeſtân, and being merely ſnow-water. This agrees very well with Bochart's thoughts of the ſmaller of the two rivers above, the Adiaba, which he would have to derive its name from the ſwiftneſs of its courſe; but for dimenſion, might, one would think, better agree with the larger. And here, by the way, our traveller illuſtrates, in ſome ſort, a paſſage in the Nubian geographer (33), who, as he is tranſlated, ſays, the two Zabs are great rivers, and, when united, equal to above one half of the Tigris; though he ſays a little before, their mouths were ſix and thirty miles from each other. It is aſked, how in this caſe theſe two rivers ever ſhould unite? and whether or no the true meaning might not be, that both together would be more than half of the Tigris, or fill the ſame river one half fuller than it would be without them? Thevenot ſeems to anſwer this queſtion by affirming they do.

Bochart (34) alſo ſeems to think the Gorgus and the Caprus are two names in Ptolemy for one and the ſame river; and particularly, becauſe he finds none but the two above mentioned elſewhere; but De Liſle's maps have three, one to the northward of the two Zabs, which is the weſtermoſt of the three, and therein differs from Ptolemy's maps, which make the Gorgus the eaſtermoſt; we leave the reader to make his choice. Hardouin would have this river to be the Zerbin of Pliny, (35). Cellarius (36) knows not what to ſay to it, obſerving only that Γορσος is Velox, which might have tempted CONCERNING the natural and artificial rarities of this once famous land we have nothing material to say, and therefore must here close up this section.

SECT II.

Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade, of the ASSYRIANS.

Antiquity.

ASSYRIA, which stands foremost of all in profane accounts, is in scripture the second most antient kingdom after Babel, or Babylon. It was founded by Ashur, and not by Nimrod, as some have contended (K), who embrace tempted Bochart to think it the same with his Adiaba, which he would have to be denominated from its swiftness.

(K) The text (37) which mentions the first foundation of this kingdom is variously interpreted, either, out of that land went forth Ashur, and builded Niniveh, as it stands in our Bibles, as well as in the best versions of the Greek, the old Latin, and the Dutch; or, he [meaning Nimrod] went out into Assur and builded Niniveh; as it stands in the margin of our Bibles, and as it is translated by Vatablus, Junius, Bochart, Cocceius, Schotan, Heidegger, Spanheim, and Le Clerc. Now the whole of the controversy (38) turns upon this, whether the word Ashur in the text, signifies the son of Shem, or whether it signifies the country of Assyria; for both ways it is often assumed in scripture. Those who are for the last interpretation, are judged to force the text, being obliged to supply a defect in the Hebrew, by inserting a particle [into] to serve their purpose, while those who vindicate the other follow the natural order and construction of the words of the original as they stand. But not to dwell on these grammatical niceties, we chuse to recur to such arguments, as may be reasonably offered to set this matter in a clear light.

It is on all hands allowed, that the land of Ashur, or Assyria, derived its name from Ashur the son of Shem; and, according to what we read in scripture (39), it must have been, that he went out of the land of Shinaar, where all the descendants of Noah were at the time of the dispersion, in order to plant or take possession of the country since called by his name; and can any thing be more natural, than to suppose, that the text before us is meant of brace the Cteſian ſyſtem; and was in the beginning a kingdom diſtinct from Babylon, though in proceſs of time they coaleſced into one, in conſequence of mutual conqueſts. Aſhur departed from the land of Shinaar [i] upon Nimrod's uſurpation, and built Niniveh and other cities, as Rehoboth, Cala, and Reſen; in [k] Niniveh, it is likely, he reſided, and thus erected a new kingdom, which, borrowing his name, was called Aſhur, or Aſſyria. According therefore to our chronology, we have nothing to object againſt the antiquity of the Aſſyrian kingdom, though as delivered by Cteſias [l], and others, who ſome how or other happen to exceed him, as, for example, Syncellus [m], if barely the antiquity of it be conſidered: which would not well ſtand by the Hebrew computation. But by the Samaritan, which we embrace, this boaſted Aſſyrian monarchy, inſtead of running up too far, will fall ſhort by about 358 years, as will appear by this. The whole interval, according to us, between the flood and the birth of Chriſt is 2997 years: the beginning of Cyrus's reign is, by common conſent, fixed to 559, or 560 years before Chriſt: if to this number 350 years be added for the duration of the empire of the Medes, according to Cteſias, and 1300 more for the duration of the Aſſyrian, according to the ſame hiſtorian and his followers, the firſt year of the reign of Ninus, the firſt pretended monarch, will coincide with the 2209th year before Chriſt, or 789 years after the flood; whereas of this migration of his? And who is ſo likely to have founded Niniveh and the other cities as himſelf? except we can imagine it likely, that Nimrod made a conqueſt of this country before Aſhur had well ſettled himſelf in it. If this had been the caſe, the country it is likely, would have been known by his name, rather than by that of his great uncle. We elſewhere (40) read, indeed, that Aſhur founded Babel; but no where is it ever ſuggeſted, that Nimrod went into Aſſyria and founded Niniveh.

(37) Genes. x. 11. (38) Vid. Perizon. Origin. Babylon, c. 4. p. 39. (39) Ubi supr.

It is objected as an improbabilty, that Moſes ſhould introduce a paſſage relating to a branch of Shem, when he was profeſſedly writing about that of Ham; but this is frivolous. Parentheſes of this ſort are common enough in ſcripture; as in that concerning Iſh-boſheth

whereas, according to us, Ashur built Niniveh and founded the Assyrian kingdom about the year 431 after the flood, or 358 years earlier; so that with us, its defect, not its excess, in point of antiquity, may be made an objection to the prophane account of this monarchy. In a word, we have no objection to the antiquity of the Assyrian kingdom, which may claim place among the first; but then we make a wide distinction between this simple kingdom and the grand monarchy, which reared its head many ages afterwards, and that for reasons to be found in the ensuing section.

BEING so destitute as we are of sufficient authorities and instruction, we can say nothing in particular of the government of this people, except what may be gathered from the conduct and deportment of their princes, in the very little we have of their history. That they were a small kingdom under hereditary chiefs for many ages is not to be doubted, no more than that their government was very simple, in conformity to what has been observed and related Government.

Ish-bosheth (41), and in that concerning Hiram's fleet (42), introduced in the midst of other discourse. A late author (43) affirms, the scripture expresly calls the land of Assyria the land of Nimrod. Bochart shewed him the way, and this would go hard against us, if the thing really were so; though, if it was really the case, we might cite the text in Isaiah in the note above, in opposition to the text in Micah, which seems to favour this notion. Micah expresses himself thus (44), They shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword; and the land of Nimrod in the entrance thereof. By this the land of Nimrod seems to be quite distinguished from the land of Assyria: So far is this text, as pretended, from proving they are but one and the same; for the and is sometimes taken disjunctively; but in the passage before us nothing requires it. Several expositors (45), both Jewish and Christian understand thereby the two countries of Assyria and Babylon, which were both united in the Assyrian monarchy about the time of this prophecy; for Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, under whom Micah flourished, was carried away captive to Babylon by the army of Assyria, when Esarhaddon was king both of Assyria and Babylon, as will be seen in the course of this history.

The author (46), we have been contending with, resolving to wrest the thing his way, and citing the text in Isaiah, which we think think makes for us, viz. Behold the land of Chaldeans; this people was not till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness, takes the liberty of inserting the word Nimrod after the word Assyria, distinguishing it by an Italic letter and a comma after it, as if it could be a part of the text. This is entirely inexcusable in him, who is quite angry (47) with Sir Isaac Newton, for a little presumptive addition of the same sort (48). Sir Isaac Newton, indeed, had an hypothesis to serve, and so has our author; so that one would have thought, he might have overlooked a liberty in Sir Isaac, which he resolved to take himself; except he imagined Sir Isaac had not the right to do it he had, which he would be a little puzzled to make out.

(L) There is a difficulty which offers itself with regard to Mesopotamia, which seems to have been very early united under one monarch, and to have affected to rule over its neighbours by the violent means of conquest, when Cushan-rishathaim came over the Euphrates, and made conquest of the children of Israel, exacting from them tribute for the space of eight years (49). Who this Cushan-rishathaim was, and how he came to be so great a king, as he seems to have been at first, is a great obscurity. But by the scripture (50) it appears, this Mesopotamian kingdom, as formidable as it may have been at first, soon mouldered away, and perhaps became extinct, by the successes of Othniel against it (51). Le Clerc (52) observes, there is no mention made of this Cushan-rishathaim, in the Ctesian series of Assyrian kings; and that, according to Eusebius's computation, he should have been cotemporary with Belochus, the nineteenth Assyrian king according to him (53); and tho' Josephus (54) calls him Chusarth king of Assyria, misled by the Ctesian history, he does not see, why we should depart from scripture to pin our faith upon him. It is impossible even to suppose such an inaccuracy in the scriptures, as the calling of this man an Aramite of Mesopotamia, if he had been an Assyrian. All we would add is, that this Mesopotamian kingdom or monarchy was a transitory thing, and that it, in all likelihood, soon broke into the many petty royalties we have observed there in the preceding part of this history many ages afterwards (55).

ſublimity of empire, their government ſeems to have been truly deſpotic, and the empire to have been hereditary, which is all we can ſafely ſay of it.

Laws.

WE have nothing to build upon, or to ſay in particular of their laws. We would preſume, they were few and vague, depending upon the arbitrary will of the prince; for theſe emperors affecting even divine honours, as will be ſeen in their hiſtory, and ſetting themſelves above all the gods of the people they vanquiſhed [p], and ſometimes requiring, that none other under heaven ſhould be worſhipped but themſelves [q], and even preſuming to paſs ſentence on the whole world [r] by the word of their own mouth; it cannot but be imagined, there could not be any ſettled form of law for the government of this people, except we ſuppoſe their kings to have approached ſo very near to the divinity they would have imperiouſly arrogated, as never to change, but to continue always the ſame, which cannot be ſuppoſed.

Religion.

THEIR religion is alſo pretty much in the dark: in general we know, they were idolaters, and that they had their idols and their temples. Niſroch is likely to have been their principal God, at leaſt at one time; but Selden declares *, he knows nothing at all of him (M), and therefore any enquiry after ſo palpable an obſcurity may be needleſs. Nergal was not properly, as ſhould ſeem, an Aſſyrian deity, and we ſhall reſume him when we come to treat of the ancient Perſian religion: Adramelech may perhaps be properly termed a god of this country, and is ſaid to have been repreſented as a mule, or a peacock [s] (N): Ana-

(M) All that can poſſibly be ſaid of him is mere conjecture. Beyer (56), who takes upon him to ſupply, in this reſpect, what is wanting in Selden, ſuppoſes, he may have been Saturn or Belus, or, with Kircher (57), that he was repreſented in the form of a ſhip, in remembrance of the ark; but this is mere fancy, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew in the courſe of this hiſtory and that of Babylon. He is in the Septuagint called Meſarach and Aſarach.

(N) Hence he is thought to have been related to Juno (58).

Anamelech (O), in like manner, is said to have been represented as a horse, or a pheasant, or a quail [t]; but these are all rabbinical dreams, and to be considered accordingly. For this small part of their religion, and something more which we shall recollect in the religion of Babylon, which may have been the very same, we are beholden to the scripture and the Jews, the rest we must more immediately trace out elsewhere, and accordingly look back to the superstitions of the Philistines, Syrians, and Phœnicians.

Derceto (P), who, according to Ctesias [u], must have been an Assyrian deity, has been supposed to be the Philistine dagon, but we have denied it [w], and already given the reasons for our rejection of this notion [x]; and though we have ventured to call her the goddess of Ascalon [y], we considered the country then in subjection to the Assyrians. Derceto, as the Greeks call her, (what her Assyrian name may have been we cannot guess) is plainly an Assyrian deity, of an inferior order, and particularly in subjection to a goddess our author [z] calls Venus, who may have been the Syrian goddess at Hierapolis [a], or the Phœnician Astarte on mount Aphac [b]. Thus we conjecture; but this Assyrian Venus will be more regularly spoken of, when we are to treat of the religion of Babylon, which was doubtless the same with that of Assyria, being derived from one origin, as the two nations were considered to have been by Ptolemy, who calls the kings of Babylon, in his astronomical canon, Assyrians. We shall therefore only for the present observe, that the Assyrians [c] and Syrians [d] paid particular devotion to fishes, in memory, as we are told, of the goddess Decerto of Ascalon, who was wholly, or partly, metamorphosed into a creature of that sort [e]; and

and that they honoured Semiramis in the form of a dove, or pigeon, either becauſe ſhe was nurſed by them when expoſed after her birth [f], or becauſe they attended her at her death, when, it is fabled, ſhe was changed into a bird of that ſort [g], which is all we have to ſay of the Aſſyrian religion in this place, except we repeat, that Semiramis was ſometimes repreſented, as ſuppoſed [h], with a pigeon on her head, and called the Sign; as alſo, that ſhe was repreſented without that diſtinction, and in a particular poſture of pointing to the great goddeſs [i], for a reaſon already given [k]; as alſo, that Sardanapalus was deified, and repreſented in a particular habit [l]; ſo that it may hence appear, they deified all their kings in general, whence muſt have ſprung a very multifarious idolatry, which is at preſent very much in the dark to us.

THEIR cuſtoms, their arts, their learning, and their trade, muſt certainly have differed but little, if at all, from what will be found of the ſame concerning the Babylonians, ſo that we ſhall ſuſpend what might be gathered in relation thereto, till we come to the Babylonian affairs, only referring the reader back to the language of Syria and the alphabet of the Syrian character, for the language and character of this people, which we have declared to have been the ſame [m]. SECT. III.

Of the ASSYRIAN Chronology, to the Fall of the Empire.

WE ſhall doubtleſs be excuſed, if we are very ample, and even diffuſe, in our reſearches after the Aſſyrian chronology, it being not only of the greateſt importance towards fixing the chronology of ancient kingdoms, but alſo for vindicating the authority of ſcripture, which is quite averſe from the common prophane account.

BUT firſt we would premiſe, that the cauſes, which may have induced or miſled hiſtorians ſo to err, when they treat of the antiquities of nations, were apparently two, ignorance and vanity. Their ignorance muſt have principally The cauſes, why the antient prophane hiſtory is ſo monſtrouſly corrupt and falſe, in what regards Aſſyria, &c.

pally proceeded from the loſs of records, and the neglect, of the earlieſt people of the more ancient nations, to keep any ſort of regiſter of what concerned them. The world was peopled by ſucceſſion, and the progreſs of wealth, power, and learning was gradual; taking riſe in the more early parts, ſo that nothing is more natural to aſſert, than that ſome nations began to keep records before others were in being.

SOME nations there were who never kept any records at all, as may have been the caſe of the Scythians, and as appears by their conteſt with the Egyptians for antiquity[o]; and thoſe who did, could not poſſibly do it at once, or from the beginning, for want of letters and other material conveniencies; and beſides, ſuppoſing them to have been ever ſo early in a condition to regiſter their affairs, they could for a long time have had nothing worth the preſerveing, and much leſs the reading. The firſt ages muſt have been employed in huſbandry, and providing for the neceſſities of life; mankind increaſing into multitudes, and nations growing populous, conteſts, it is likely, aroſe between them about property and dominion, and theſe broils may for ages have diverted their thoughts from any thing elſe. In ſhort, we muſt ſuppoſe the world to have been in a calm of peace, and ſome nations to have made great progreſs in learning, before we can, with any reaſon, ſuppoſe any hiſtorical monuments, truly ſuch, to have been taken in hand; and ere this, the traditions concerning the origin of the world, and the riſe of themſelves, may have been quite perverted, or totally loſt.

BUT ſuppoſing there may have been other nations beſides the Jews, who had preſerved their primitive traditions entire, they may have periſhed by various means. Theſe nations may have, as it were, become extinct, or their records may have been deſtroyed by the malice, or, what is the ſame, the zeal, of parties, whether religious or civil. Kings have been known to deface the memory of their predeceſſors, that they might, without a rival, be admired by poſterity, of a humour with that Chineſe emperor who reigned about 209 years before Chriſt *, or, perhaps, to eſtabliſh an æra as Nabonaſſar [p], who may alſo have had an ambition to appear the headmoſt of the Babyloniſh kings; but, by the way, this ſeems not to have been the caſe case with him, as we must have occasion to observe, more than once, hereafter.

SUCH may have been the interruptions of the regular descent of history to us; though wars, whether foreign or domestic, must have been more particularly fatal to the archives of all nations in general. It has been, almost ever, the policy of conquerors to destroy them, to obliterate the remembrance of what the vanquished may formerly have been, as also to remove all monuments, which, by the sight of them, might excite to rebellion and revolt. Conquerors also there have been, who have been moved merely by ignorance or superstition to do the same; as may be observed of the Mohammedans, where-ever their arms have prevailed. And though it may be said, that the Romans were, in this respect, favourable to the Greeks, we do not understand, that these last were over and above indulgent to those they conquered, the Egyptians excepted, whom they may have spared for the same reasons the Romans spared them; because they beheld them as their masters in literature and knowledge.

IF then we call to mind the many revolutions which every nation has in its turn undergone, we need not wonder, why the antiquities of the several parts of the world are so utterly unknown, or, what is next of kin to it, so deeply involved in the mist of fable.

THE Babylonians, or Chaldees, are allowed once to have had a regular body of genuine history from the origin of things, and, by the fragments of it, we understand it to have been agreeable to what we read in the mosaical writings, which perhaps may have been taken from the Chaldeans, from whom the Jews were descended. But this Babylonian account has been long since destroyed, and absurd traditions and ridiculous tales have taken its place; which is the more to be regretted, as we are assured by Josephus [q], it was a most valuable remain.

FOR us to have received any tolerable account of the origin and remote history of nations, they should, from the beginning, have communicated their records with each other; and the historians of every country should have been as sedulous in collecting and digesting the affairs of the neighbouring kingdoms, and states, and actions they knew, as of their own: and in this case, nothing but an universal ruin could have made the desolation, their ſucceeding generations have beheld as well as we. But the nature of things would never allow of this, as may be obſerved by thoſe who are converſant in very ancient tranſactions; and particularly that ridiculous vanity, which may be ſaid to have begun with the world, and will, it is likely, end with it, has at all times rendered it impracticable.

A COUNTRY no ſooner began to flouriſh and refine, than vanity, that darling folly of men and nations, took birth, and increaſed with its ſplendor and proſperity; and preſently it could admit of no competitor, but muſt look on all its neighbours round with contempt; and this doctrine infuſed into the natives, a national pride is contracted, than which nothing is ſo unpardonable, nothing more repugnant to reaſon and good ſenſe, and nothing, in the main, ſo deſtructive to the peace and happineſs of mankind. And this vanity, added to the complete ignorance of what has paſt aforetime in the hiſtorians, for the moſt part, of antiquity, has been productive of the monſtrous births which are a reproach to the ſcience.

WE might point at many glaring inſtances of the ill effects of what we are here complaining; but ſhall on this head juſt touch upon the Greeks, to whom we are chiefly indebted for the ancient prophane hiſtory, confining ourſelves to what at preſent is before us, till we ſhall have occaſion to reſume them hereafter. They, we may aver of them, were more infected with this folly of vanity, or, at leaſt, as much as any nation, that has ever ſubſiſted under the ſun. It is plain, they deſpiſed the hiſtory of all other nations beſides their own, never concerning themſelves therewith, any farther than it interfered with themſelves, and even then they introduced it rather to adorn their own character, than to preſerve any thing to us by way of information.

AND this in nothing appears more plainly, than in their ſlighting, and even deſtroying, the Perſian records, when they became maſters of that empire. No one of their hiſtorians, that we are aware of, ever conſulting them to complete a ſeries of the Perſian affairs: Nor was there a nation they were ſolicitous about but the Egyptians, who affected a deep ſilence, and cared not to tell them any thing very much to the purpoſe. Some of the Greeks indeed, whoſe good ſenſe got the better of their national pride and prejudices, as Eratoſthenes, Hecatæus the Abderite, and Menander the Epheſian, may be quoted, as exceptions ceptions to what we have been ſaying, as well as ſome foreigners, ſuch as Beroſus, Manetho, and ſome others, who were encouraged to write the hiſtories of their reſpective countries for the uſe of the Greeks. But all this but adds weight to the guilt of that aſſuming people. It is plain, they did not in the leaſt regard them; for not one of them has reached our days, nor ſo much as one Greek that had made any large extracts from them, if we except Joſephus and the Chriſtian chronologers, Africanus, Euſebius, and Syncellus, if they may be allowed to have been of the number.

No polite nation has ever been more egregiouſly faulty, in mixing truth with fiction; and yet they ſeem to have thought no nation fit to meddle with hiſtory, though their own, but themſelves; as may be ſeen by Diodorus Siculus, who, in writing of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, never mentions a word of Beroſus and Manetho, preferring his own crude indigeſtions to any thing in them. And ſo with regard to Aſſyria, inſtead of reſorting to ſuch as might truly inform him, ſuch as Polyhiſtor may have ſometimes been, for ought we know, he runs riot after Cteſias, a moſt fabulous writer, as will be amply demonſtrated in the courſe of this ſection: But, being a Greek, he was preferred by the vain partiality of his countrymen, and his hiſtory has had the good fortune of reaching down to us, while others have ſuffered the fate which Cteſias and Diodorus had deſerved; the fate which Trogus has undergone, who, by his epitomiſer, is not much to be lamented.

THESE writers were like moſt of our moderns, who, for what concerns the Mohammedan hiſtory, conſult the Byzantine hiſtorians; or, by liſtening to the lame relations of ignorant travellers, give into endleſs errors they might have avoided, by looking into the tranſlations and extracts the learned would furniſh them, if they would be at the pains of inquiring after them.

AND now, to return more immediately to our point, there have been great and powerful nations, who have for many ages paſt been no more; of this number are the Aſſyrians, Babylonians, and Lydians. Their records and their hiſtorians have long ſince been annihilated. The Greeks, by a vain negligence and inſolent contempt of them, knew little or nothing concerning them; and no other nation, the Jews excepted, can tell us any thing about them. Hence, and for reaſons to be hereafter ſubjoined, we make no account of the common histories of these nations, and particularly of the Assyrians. We are now to enter upon an obscure task, which has confounded some of the best chronologers, who have unwarily been driven to endless shifts, to make out what they adhere to. But as our design is to shew they have been all misled, some few excepted, as Marsham, Newton, Cellarius, Montfaucon, Du Pin, and some others, we shall take little or no notice of them.

This Belochus, who finishes this dynasty, is called by the same authors (62) Belleus the Dercetad, and in him, say they, the race of Semiramis became extinct; when Beletaras, Beletores, or Bellepares, the king's gardener, in a most extraordinary manner, seized on the empire for himself, and delivered down the same to his successors, till it fell under Sardanapalus. The first dynasty of these kings then, ending with Belochus, must be called Dercetadæ, from Derceto, the mother of Semiramis (63).

(S) According to Eusebius (64), under this king Troy was taken.

The first Table.

IT is surprising, how many sagacious and inquisitive men, historians and chronologers, both in antient and modern

Assyria when Troy was taken, he brings that event down to this reign. He observes (66), that this king was by the Greeks called Tithon, the father of that Memnon, who was by his father sent an auxiliary against the Greeks, and fell by the hand of Achilles. He tells us the copy of a letter from Priam to him was handed about in his time; and also that he was called Tautanes the second. This story is borrowed from Ctesias (67), who calls this king Teutamus, with Syncellus, but makes him a distinct person from Tithon, the father of Memnon. This romantic author [Ctesias] tells us, he sent 10,000 Ethiopians, with as many Susians, people widely different from each other, together with 200 chariots, to the succour and assistance of king Priam, who was his tributary. Tithon, according to this same author, was at that time governor of Persia, in highest favour with the king; and his son Memnon, who commanded these auxiliary forces, was then in the flower of his days, and had built a palace in the castle of Susa, which retained the name of Memnonia to the times of the Persians, and had paved a public way, which retained his name many ages afterwards. But it seems (68), the Ethiopians next to Egypt denied all this story, and pretended Memnon was their countryman, and made show of his palace, which in our author's days they continued to call Memnonia. More is said in contradiction to Ctesias's story, but we may perhaps have anticipated too much upon this head, and therefore drop the subject for the present.

dern times, have blindly given into the errors and general forgery of the first table. To reconcile it with scripture, to which it is quite repugnant, they have raised such hypotheses, as are contradictory to all history sacred and prophane, though at the same time nothing is easier, than to detect the whole imposture, so gross and palpable it seems to be. The two lists which form the first table are derived, notwithstanding the variations in them, from one formed by Ctesias, who concluded his history of the Assyrians with a list of kings from Ninus to Artaxerxes [r]. Castor copied him, who was again copied by Eusebius [s]; who, as Ctesias had taught his author, begins with Ninus, which Syncellus, on the other hand, begins with Belus, and assigns him a reign of 55 years, though Castor [t], whom in this he follows, declares the length of Belus's reign to be uncertain. But this is not the only difference between them; Syncellus has in his list four kings which are wanting in that of Eusebius, and which are no where else to be met with; which whence it should come to pass, we shall forbear to enquire (W), and the rather, as we shall endeavour, with the concurrence of several great men before-mentioned, to destroy the whole on both sides; but first we would observe, that Syncellus exceeds every body in the number of years he allows for the duration of the Assyrian monarchy, for while St. Augustin [u] allows it but 1305, Castor 1280, Eusebius 1240, Velleius 1070, Syncellus gives it 1460, therein greatly exceeding his original author Ctesias, and his two copyists, Diodorus and Trogus, who mention but about 1300.

SINCE therefore these computations are primarily borrowed from Ctesias, and lengthened and shortened apparently

(W) Though it may be in vain to inquire after this seeming interpolation of no less than four kings in Syncellus, we may offer it as an argument to prove the unsettledness of the whole series. It was certainly a vague period of history; and, from the variations of it, may be shrewdly suspected of being raised upon no sure foundation, upon no such solid basis as truth. As the whole must have been a fable, those who treated of it used it as such, by altering it as they saw good; or else, we cannot see why the several authors and transcribers should not agree together in essentials, which we find they do not.

rently to the fancy of the several writers his successors, it will be absolutely necessary for us to enquire into what foundation he builds upon, whether his superstructure be raised upon truth or falshood. Aristotle, who was almost his contemporary, declares him a writer unworthy of credit, and whoever peruses his Indica must immediately conclude him to have been a man of no sort of sincerity; nor is Aristotle the only one of the antients that has declared against him, nor his Indica the only proof we have, that he was a fabulous writer, as may be gathered from what is to follow.

WERE his character better established by much than it is, his list of the Assyrian kings would be no proof of the duration of that empire, nothing being easier than to invent names, and to add what lengths of reign we please to them [w], and especially for a man who pretends actually to have seen such things in India, as never were, and never can be. Upon this the question might naturally enough be asked, Might not Ctesias as well forge his Assyrian history, as create the world of monsters he talks of in India? And might we not as justly suspect him of falshood, when he pretends to have compiled his history from original records, as when he gravely avers to have been an eye-witness of what no mortal alive can believe?

AND this question may be the more pertinently asked, as both his relation of the Indies and his history of the Assyrians are equally marvellous, and equally impossible. Who can see Ninus at the head of millions of men, at a time when the earth must have been but thinly inhabited, when mankind must have been a good deal in a state of simplicity and nature; who can read this and add faith to the historian? or who can read the story of Semiramis; her mighty valour and heroic deeds at the age of twenty, or thereabouts; her two millions of men employed in the building of Babylon, her 300,000 skins of black oxen, made up in the form of elephants, and other things of this nature, and not conclude, that what contained it was no genuine history, but a most bare-faced romance? In a word, his Assyrian history, as it stands in the next section, is most evidently calculated to astonish and amaze, and to strain credulity beyond all possible bounds.

WHAT particularly argues his list of the Assyrian kings of the grossest forgery is, that it is a medly of Greek, Persian,

[w] Du Pin's Histor. Biblioth. des Histor. p. 284.

Perſian, Egyptian, and other names. Sphærus, Lamprides, Laoſthenes, Dercylus, are Greek names, and very common ones. Amyntas is the name of a king of Macedon; Arius is the name of a king of Sparta. Pyritiades is regularly, as ſhould ſeem, formed from Pyritis, a medicinal herb, with which Cteſias, as a phyſician, muſt have been well acquainted. Xerxes, Armamithres, Mithræus, are Perſian names. Soſarmus, according to himſelf, is the name of a king of the Medes, which how it ſhould come to paſs, may not be ſo very unaccountable, conſidering the tranſition of the empire from the Aſſyrians to the Medes; but how Sethos, the name of an Egyptian king, ſhould alſo have been the name of an Aſſyrian, is what we are wholly at a loſs for. Nothing is more obvious to thoſe who have dipt into genuine hiſtory, and eſpecially the ſcripture, than the wide difference between the Aſſyrian names and the Perſian, and the ſtill wider between the ſame and the Greek; ſo that nothing can be ſaid in his behalf, except that he tranſlated ſome of the original names, which is abſolutely falſe; nay, he is confeſſedly ſo ignorant in this particular, that he had even no notion at all of the Aſſyrian names, how they were pronounced or uttered; ſo far was he from knowing how they were compounded, and whence they were formed; a moſt glaring inſtance of which will be ſeen anon.

AGAIN, in all long liſts of kings the ſame names, or ſome ſuch, are obſerved often to return; and this is no where more remarkable than in the five names of the Aſſyrian kings, which are all that are recorded in the canon of ſcripture. Pul, or Phul, Tiglath-pileſer, or Tiglath-pul-aſſur, Shalmaneſer, or Shalman-aſſur, Eſaraddon or Aſſur-haddon. For the Aſſyrians, to all appearance, borrowed their names from their own gods [x], or from the gods of other nations in repute among them. Theſe gods ſeem to have been Bel, or Pul, Chaddon, Haddon, Adon, or Adonis, Melech, or Moloc, Atſur, or Aſſur, Nebo, Nergal, Merodach; as for inſtance in the following, beſides the names above, Adra-melech, Shar-aſſur, Nabonaſſar, or Nebo-adon-aſſur, Bel-adon, Chyniladon, or Chen-el-adon, Nebo-pul aſſur, Nebuchadnezzar, Nabuchadonoſor, or Nebo-chaddon-aſſur, Nebuzaradan or Nebo-aſſur-adon, Evil-merodach, or Ilvoradamus, and many more more that might be brought to illuſtrate this point. After this, who muſt not reject the wild and arbitrary names in Cteſias? who is ſo ignorantly extravagant, as to ſuppoſe Sardanapalus to have been the Greek name for the laſt Aſſyrian king, though ſo naturally derivable from Aſſur-adon-pul, while he pretends his Aſſyrian name to have been Tonos Concoleros, a name which bears no manner of relation to the Aſſyrian language, or any other that we at preſent are aware of; a name moſt evidently coined to amuſe and catch the ear.

IF in ſeven Aſſyrian names, all that are mentioned in the canon of ſcripture, five of them belonging to ſo many kings, and two to the two ſons of Sennacherib, there appears ſuch ſimilitude and near relation, would not the ſame, in all likelihood, have been often repeated, and continually but varied, in a long liſt of 36 of them according to Euſebius, or 41 according to Syncellus? but nothing of this kind is in either of them to be obſerved; the names of all of them are different and independent, except in a caſe or two; and to crown all, in neither of them is there one name at all belonging to any of the Aſſyrian kings in ſcripture. To ſuppoſe theſe names to have been unknown to the Greeks, would be next to ſuppoſing they were perfect ſtrangers to the Aſſyrian affairs; and ſo all that Cteſias has written, and others after him, would fall ſelf-condemned to the ground. But this is what we can very ſafely contradict; they were actually known to the Greeks, or the moſt curious of them, and particularly to Herodotus, who, though he mentions but one king of Aſſyria, calls him exactly by his true name, the termination excepted, Sennacherib; and we may thence very fairly conclude, that had he completed the hiſtory of Aſſyria he promiſed, we ſhould have read the names of the reſt of the Aſſyrian kings in him with as much accuracy; and the rather, as we have the experience of his conforming with ſcripture, in the names of ſeveral of the Egyptian kings: In conſideration of which, and the contradictory writings of Cteſias, it may be juſtly wondered, why Herodotus ſhould labour under ſo much obloquy and contempt with many of great learning and judgment, while all the abominable untruths of Cteſias, though obvious to every ſenſe, are ſwallowed and received for granted, even though he in every particular claſhes with ſcripture, while the former confirms it, where-ever he happens to ſpeak of things there handed down to us. A monstrous inequality some of the best and most religious of us have been absurdly guilty of; an inequality never to be excused, but in those who have nothing to plead in their behalf but ignorance and want of discernment. But this will be more properly discussed in the preface, and therefore we return to what more immediately concerns us.

THE names in Ctesias, and the number of them, are not alone what may prompt us to pronounce him guilty of forgery; the length of the reigns may be urged as another argument against him; except it be answered, that in those very early days, so nearly bordering on the times of the deluge, such length is not to be wondered at. But this would be no answer at all, especially for at least three fourths of them, who must have lived when the life of man was reduced to its present standard. And this remote antiquity is what must also be urged against Ctesias, and particularly, as he writes in direct opposition to the scripture. Ninus, according to him, must have reigned before the days of Abraham, and conquered Persia, Media, Egypt, Assyria, and all Asia; and his wife Semiramis, his immediate successor, adds Libya and Ethiopia thereto. But what trace do we find of all this in the book of Genesis? even none. The Canaanites were under their own kings or patriarchs, ages after Abraham; the Moabites, the Ammonites, the Midianites, the Edomites, the Amalekites, the Philistines, were subject to no foreign yoke, and free from strange lords, till they began to be persecuted by the sword of Israel. Egypt seemingly enjoyed herself in peace, apprehensive of no danger from without, till Sennacherib, bent upon establishing and enlarging his empire, moved towards Egypt with design to invade it. In proof of all which, we need only refer to the histories of all these nations in the former part of this work. It appears then, that no Assyrian enemy was in these parts for many ages after the pretended dates of Ninus and Semiramis, and that all Syria and Mesopotamia were free also from any subjection to Assyria, may be proved as plain.

THE Syrian monarchy was confessedly older than the Assyrian, and extended on both sides of the Euphrates, under Hadadezer king of Zobah, and rose afterwards to its meridian under the race of the Damascene kings, and particularly in the days of Ben-hadad and Hazael [y]: These ruled ruled a mighty empire. Where then were the Assyrian monarchs, so extensive in their command, and so jealous of their power? David, before these, was master of a considerable extent of all on this side of the Euphrates [z], and had no Assyrian to dispute the honour with him. The Phœnicians continued in independence and freedom, till the days of Shalmaneser, who was set at defiance by the Tyrians [a], though he was the third of that fortunate and conquering race. Consult the history of Judæa, Syria, and Phœnice, and you will perceive no glimpse of an Assyrian monarchy till the days of Pul, who lived about 2200 years after the deluge, according to the Samaritan computation, which we profess to follow.

WE have formerly [b] almost ventured to assert, that the Assyrians imposed their religion on the Phœnicians and Syrians; which, if it can any way be made to appear, must argue the Assyrian monarchy to have been posterior to the ancient Syrian empire. We have seen, that the ancient gods of Syria were Rimmon, Adad, and other deities of mortal origin, their most renowned kings [c]. These were the gods of the Syrians; but they ceasing, as it were, to be a people by their captivation [d], others were introduced into the country, as the custom was [e]; and accordingly, in the temple of the great Syrian goddess at Hierapolis, we find the statues of Semiramis and Sardanapalus [f]. These, as Assyrians, must have been unknown to the old inhabitants of the country; and to confirm us in a certain and well-grounded belief, that they were both of them later than the kings of Damascus; we would urge, that Semiramis herself is said to have been a Philistine, to have been born in the neighbourhood of Ascalon, at a time when the whole land was in subjection to the Assyrian kings, and, as should seem, in the reign of Ninus [g]. When this can possibly have been, but after the subjugation of the Proper Palestine, together with the neighbouring countries, by the successors of Pul, we leave any one to judge; the scripture affords no materials towards even any conjecture of the kind, as may be easily discerned by the history of the Philistines, in the former part of this work.

THE father of Thammuz, or Adonis, is said to have been an Assyrian [h]; and it is thought, the whole system almost of the Syrian and Phœnician superstition migrated from the bank of the Tigris; and as this seems very natural, and may be supported by many powerful arguments, we are apparently wrong in not rejecting Ctesias, who, in opposition to scripture, Herodotus, and other more undoubted authorities, is guilty of a forgery of the most solemn and delusive kind.

HAVING endeavoured to destroy the credit of Ctesias, and therewith the first table of the Assyrian kings from Eusebius and Syncellus, we will proceed to settle the chronology of the Assyrian empire in the best manner we are able, by taking into consideration the second table. By the history of Syria and the neighbouring countries it appears, the Assyrians had no power in the western parts of Asia till the reign of Pul, who made his first appearance on this side of the Euphrates, in the decline of the kingdom of Damascus: What they had before that time done in the east, does no where appear; but that the foundations of the monarchy were laid by Pul, or some near predecessor of his, by conquests nearer home, is a matter never to be doubted. We have elsewhere said [k], that the Assyrian monarchy cannot be dated much backwarder than the days of Menahem; and this is not only to be demonstrated by scripture and Ptolemy's astronomical canon, but by several of the most approved and sincerest profane writers.

HERODOTUS [l], that venerable and much injured historian, observes, that the Assyrians had been masters of the Upper Asia 520 years, when the Medes threw off their yoke; and that the empire of the latter subsisted no longer than 150 years, inclusive of the 28 years, during which the Scythians ruled Asia. These two sums added together amount to 670 years, for the whole duration of the two monarchies of the Assyrians and Medes, which being added to the epoch of Cyrus before Christ, which is universally stated at 559 years before Christ, will make 1229, the whole interval between the first rise of the Assyrian monarchy and the birth of Christ, which cuts off about 1000 years from the common profane accounts; though it will exceed exceed the æra of Nabonaſſar by 458 years; and therefore Herodotus's numbers, as they ſtand with us, are doubtleſs too long, though ſo much ſhort of Cteſias and his followers. But, by the way, we would add, that Herodotus's computation is not above 200 years later than the days of Cuſhan-riſhathaim, king of Meſopotamia, or Aram-Naharaim, who kept the children of Iſrael under the ſpace of eight years, till they were delivered from him by Othniel [m]. In what ſenſe this Cuſhan-riſhathaim may have been conſidered as an Aſſyrian, we take not upon us to ſay, or whether he was ſo or not, farther than we are obliged to declare him not to have been of that nation *, ſeeing he is in ſcripture [n] called a Meſopotamian, and ſeeing we might with as much juſtice call Chedorlaomer an Aſſyrian, though he is expreſly ſaid to have been an Elamite, or Perſian: And this care in the ſacred pen-men, thus to diſtinguiſh the men who from the beginning made inroads upon the Ciſeuphratenſian regions, expreſly ſaying the firſt was an Elamite, the ſecond a Meſopotamian, and expreſsly calling Pul an Aſſyrian, leaves us no room to imagine, that the two former were kings of Aſſyria; but that Herodotus ſhould be a little elder in his date than may have been quite exact, will not perhaps be wondered at by thoſe who rightly conſider what we have urged in the former part of this ſection.

AGAIN, Herodotus tells us [o], that Semiramis, who, according to Diodorus Siculus [p], or Cteſias rather, was the wife of Ninus, was but five generations before Nitocris, the mother of Labynetus [Nabonadius] the laſt king of Babylon, which as, by the largeſt computation, cannot exceed 200 years [q], ſhe may have been the wife of ſome one of the kings in Ptolemy's canon, and perhaps of Nabonaſſar himſelf.

FOR theſe reaſons is Herodotus much to be relied on, and for the ſame are we much to regret the hiſtory of Aſſyria he promiſes; and for which he doubtleſs was furniſhed with very valuable materials. He actually travelled the country, and converſed with the natives; which a late author [r] makes ſlight of, preſuming the inhabitants might be miſtaken themſelves, and conſequently lead him into errors; yet muſt must it be acknowledged to make greatly in favour of Herodotus, since he could possibly have had no better means of information, except he had had an opportunity of consulting the national records themselves.

NOR is he not supported and followed by some of the very weightiest of the ancients. Dionysius of Halicarnassus [s] takes notice, that the Assyrian antiquities are run up into fable; that though the monarchy was ancient, it did not extend over a very great part of Asia, and that it was not so potent as the empire of the Medes, which arose upon its ruins. Appian [t] affirms the duration of the three empires, the Assyrian, the Median, and the Persian, to have made up no more in sum than 900 years, which being added to 336, the epoch of Alexander before Christ, will remove the rise of the Assyrian monarchy to the distance of 1236 years before Christ, which will exceed the chronology of Herodotus above, by no more than seven years; which we cannot but wonder, St. Jerom [u], who follows Ctesias, should roundly assert, that Ninus was the first that ruled over all Asia, and that all the Greeks, as well as the Barbarians, were of the same mind.

SUCH are the sentiments of the most judicious of the prophane historians, concerning the duration of the Assyrian monarchy; and they seem to have the concurrence of Homer on their side, who, in recounting the most potent princes of the earth, at the time when Troy was besieged, is quite silent as to any Assyrian monarch, though after the rate Ctesias reckons, that ten years war was waged within the Assyrian dominions.

BY what we have said against the first table of the Assyrian kings, according to Eusebius and Syncellus, and the preparatory arguments we have been using in behalf of the second, according to scripture and this history, it must appear to an attentive reader, that the Assyrian monarchy is of late date, in comparison of what has been too much imagined, even by some of the most learned; as also, that it is in scripture, that we have the nearest view of the rise of the monarchy before us; and more particularly, since it is evident, by Ptolemy's canon, that there were really no kings of very extraordinary eminence before the reign of Nabonassar, who may have been a descendant of Pul's, the first first Assyrian monarch mentioned in scripture, a point, which may be more properly discussed in the chronology of Babylon; though, by the way, Ptolemy calls all the kings in his canon Assyrians, which was a common practice [w].

THE authority of this famous canon is not to be disputed, and it most remarkably reduces the Assyrian æra to the bounds of scripture history, or nearly so; for though Pul himself will not fall within the compass, he will so little exceed it, that it may be offered as a very powerful argument, to evince, he was the first considerable monarch in these parts: but this being what we may have occasion to resume hereafter, we proceed to what we have more immediately under consideration.

TO fix the exact æra of the Assyrian monarchy is what we cannot pretend to, except we do it relatively to ourselves in the western parts; and in that case we must compute from the year of Pul's first appearance on this side of the Euphrates, which was about the second year of Menahem, 23 years before the æra of Nabonassar, 2228 years after the flood, and 771 years before Christ.

THUS far it is no difficult matter to ascertain the beginning of this empire. Its end may perhaps be more nearly fixed, though that is what we cannot settle beyond all possibility of dispute. The text of scripture, which gives us so near a prospect of its beginning, and relates to us some of the remarkable transactions of five of its most potent princes, drops us on a sudden; so that we are obliged to resort to the Apocrypha and Ptolemy's canon, for the successors of the great Esarhaddon. The book of Judith so very nicely corresponds with Herodotus, in what he says of the war between the declining Assyrians and the rising Medes, that we have not been able to avoid adding faith thereto; and seeing the reign of Nabuchadonosor most naturally coincides with that of Chyniladon in the canon, we have ventured to pronounce them to have been one and the same king, the second in descent from Esarhaddon, or Assaraddin: as for Sarac, whom we borrow from Polyhistor [x], and whom we also call Sardanapalus, from a similitude of his story and exit in the same historian, with what is related thereof by Ctesias, we must confess ourselves considerably in the dark, as we may note hereafter hereafter in the body of our Assyrian history. In the mean time, it may be objected to us, that Polyhistor is a follower of Ctesias, and as such we have considered him; but we would answer, with the assistance of Sir Isaac Newton [y], That there may be something of truth in the bottom of the Ctesian History, as there uses to be in romances; as that Niniveh was destroyed by the Medes and Babylonians, that Sardanapalus was the last king of the Assyrian empire, and that Astibares and Astyages were kings of the Medes. But whence it is, that we have no such name as Sarac in the Nabonassarian canon, we shall here forbear to enquire; seeing we may have a more convenient opportunity of offering our conjectures concerning him, when we come to the history of his reign; and therefore, since nothing positive can be ascertained, as to this last stage of the Assyrian monarchy, we here conclude this section.

SECT. IV.

The History of ASSYRIA, according to Ctesias of Cnidos, and his Followers.

ALTHOUGH we have condemned whatever is here to follow as forgery all and falsehood, yet, as it has been so long received for truth, by most of the wisest and most sagacious historians and chronologers, and, as we may say, from all antiquity admitted into the body of history, we are under an indispensible obligation of producing it here in all its particulars, as it is, with great solemnity and all possible confidence, handed down to us. Ninus (X), a [y] Chronolog. of anc. kingd. amended, p. 267.

(X) We will not take upon us to say, there never was such a king as Ninus, or such a king as his pretended predecessor Belus; but it is very likely, these names were forged by the Greeks, or others, to account for the building of the two great cities, Niniveh and Babel, or Babylon. However, thus far we know; he cannot have been Nimrod, or Ashur rather, their ages not at all agreeing (69); and therefore it is impossible, Ninus should have been prince of martial genius and immenſe ambition, reſolved to make a conqueſt of the nations round about, and erect an empire over them: to this purpoſe, he aſſembled together the robuſteſt of the youth in his dominions, and diligently trained them up to the exerciſe of arms, and enured them to hardſhip and labour, and fitted them for war [z] (Y).

BEING now in a ſtate to execute his purpoſe, but apprehending, he might be ſtopped in his career by the Arabians, been the firſt king. We would do all we ſafely could to reconcile the ſacred hiſtory with the prcfane, and will allow, with ſeveral, that Nimrod may be Belus, and Aſhur Ninus; or let Nimrod, as others (70) think, be the ſon of Belus, (whom they will have to be Cuſh), and let Ninus be the ſon of Nimrod; but then let their works and exploits be ſuitable with the early times they lived in, not ſuch as we read of in Diodorus Siculus (71); let the cities they build be plain, and without art and coſt. Let them reign agreeably to the ſtate of things in the firſt ages, without pomp, without luxury. Let them wage war, but let it be in their neighbourhood, not in far diſtant countries; with a few thouſands at their heels, not with millions; with rude and undiſciplined men, not with regular bodies of trained ſoldiers.

(Y) We connot forbear thinking, that the whole ſtory of Ninus is, with ſome variation, a copy of that of the great Egyptian Seſoſtris (72), and the rather, as we actually find them confounded together as one and the ſame perſon; for Tzetzes (73) expreſly calls Seſoſtris king of Aſſyria, and obſerves, he is the ſame Diodorus Siculus calls Seſooſis (74), that he was monarch of the Aſſyrians, that he ruled over all lands, and that he yoked kings to his chariot. In ſhort, he at length relates the ſtory we have upon the ſame occaſion told of the Egyptian Seſoſtris (75), without the leaſt variation, except that he calls him an Aſſyrian.

The parallel is plain; Amenophis trains up a number of youth to the fatigues and exerciſes of war, to ſerve under his ſon in the conqueſts foretold of him (76), the world being then unconſcious of the havock of the ſword; Ninus does here the ſame, and with the ſame intent, except that thoſe he trained were deſigned to ſerve under him.

bians, whom alone he dreaded, as a bold and resolute people, jealous and tenacious of their liberty, he entered into a league with Ariæus their king; whereby, if he did not obtain his immediate assistance, he might, at least, secure his neutrality and connivance (Z). But Ariæus joined forces with him, and marched with him into Babylo-

(Z) It is made an objection to the Ctesian history of Assyria, that it introduces a king of the Arabians, before the Arabians were a people; our author (77) supposing them originally descended of Ishmael the son of Abraham; but this cannot hold good, for the country was before planted by Joktan (78). But what is more material and unanswerable is, the question that might be asked concerning these ancient Arabians, How it was they were in Ninus's days so famed for war and love of liberty? How came Ninus to know this? We understand by this our history, that Ninus was the first that invaded the right of his neighbours; and tyranny and slavery seem by this history to have been at these times unknown. If then these Arabians had never been invaded, they never could have distinguished themselves in these respects from the rest of the nations; and if they had been invaded, it is plain, Ninus was not the first warrior or conqueror. We read, that Sesostris king of Egypt subdued the Arabians (79); and in this particular, indeed, our parallel between him and Ninus is interrupted. But is Sesostris older in these parts than Ninus? our author (80) insinuates no. By prophane authors, they must have been nearly of an age. Now if Sesostris conquered the Arabians, it is no great sign they were invincible. What other conqueror there should have been in these parts, before these two, we perceive not; Justin (81) reckons them two of the first that disturbed the peace of the world in Asia. If Asia had been free from war till the days of Ninus, and if he was the first that affected to rule over his neighbours, the Arabians must, to all appearance, have been as ignorant in martial affairs as other nations. On the other hand, if Ninus was later than Sesostris, and if this last actually subdued the Arabians, what had Ninus to fear from them, that he must court them after this rate, and lay himself under the obligations he afterwards does to their king? The inconnection and forgery is palpable. It is wonderful, that such stuff as this should ever have passed with men for history, when it is even too silly to be called good romance, which ought to be the shadow of truth and probability at least.

nia (A). The city of Babylon, so famous since, was not at that time in being; though the province itself was stored with cities, whose inhabitants, unknowing in the arts of defence (B), fell an easy prey to the turbulent and aspiring

(A) If Ninus resided in the country we now call Assyria, and if this mighty Arabian Ariæus ruled over the country we now call Arabia, he could not with more convenience at all have joined his Assyrian friend, than by marching through the kingdom of Babylon. Now if these Babylonians had been so feeble as here represented, our warlike Arab might have subdued them in his march, and made a present of them and their country to Ninus, upon their first greeting; and the rather because it would not only have redounded to his honour, but have saved time and expence also.

(B) Why the Babylonians should have been so particularly ignorant in martial affairs beyond their neighbours, is what we can no more conceive, than why the Arabians should have been so particularly versed therein. If the Arabian had been what he is represented, it is very strange, the Babylonian should not have dreaded so turbulent a neighbour, and provided for his own safety against him. And here we would observe, that, according to our author (82), and by what is observed in the note next above, the Arabians must have been famous warriors, before the Assyrians themselves knew any thing of the matter; and if so, it would be but natural to suppose, that the Babylonians, who lay between them should have cultivated the use of the sword before the Assyrians, and that for several reasons, and particularly, as it so stood them upon, to be on their guard against such an enemy as the Arabian. But, as natural as this may seem, we are here told quite the reverse; the Babylonians knew nothing of the matter, and they were swept away at once. They, it seems, knew not the Arabians were such a people as we are told, and contracted no jealousy from the extraordinary preparations and proceedings of their neighbour, the king of Assyria; and so neither took the field, nor walled their cities. How likely this is to have been, we leave the reader to judge, and shall only add, that this account clashes very remarkably with two very express and important passages of sacred history relating to the Babylonian kingdom, which represents this country to have been the first after the flood where any great buildings, as cities, and the like, were erected, and particularly the tower of Babel (83); and the people to have been a warlike enterprising nation, so early as the days of Abraham, when we read of a king of Shinar, or Babylon (84), making excursions

ing Ninus, who impoſed on them an annual tribute; and carried away their king and all his children, whom he afterwards put to death (C). He then fell upon Armenia with a mighty hand, bore down cities and all before him, and injected ſuch a terror into the hearts of all the people there, that their king Barzanes himſelf waited on him with rich gifts, and made ſubmiſſion to him; which had this effect, that Ninus courteouſly left him in poſſeſſion of his kingdom of Armenia; but upon this condition, that he ſhould be to him as a vaſſal, and ſerve him in his wars, whenever he ſhould require it (D). Encouraged thus to excurſions upon the Canaanites and others, in company with the king of Elam (85). This Babylonian king was plainly a warrior; and, according to common computation, could not have been much, if at all, later than Ninus. The city of Bactra was, we find by our author, ſo ſtrongly walled, as to be in a manner impregnable. But Babylon, it ſeems, was as yet not in being, and the whole province and its more antient cities were ſwept away at once. How this agrees with the ſcripture, we leave the reader to judge; it is toto cælo diſtant from it; as may be more amply obſerved hereafter.

In the preceding note we have endeavoured to expoſe the abſurdity of this poſition; but though the Babylonians ſhould have been more ignorant in war than the nations round about; it muſt have been, becauſe they had never known what war was. In this caſe, it muſt be ſuppoſed, their neighbours, not excepting any, muſt have been as ignorant therein as themſelves. One warlike nation always makes another, and ſo on.

(C) What this prince ſhould have done to provoke Ninus to uſe him in this cruel manner, may be very hard to come at; but it is plain, he could give him no great offence; his weakneſs and inactivity ſeem to have been the only crimes to make him obnoxious to the Aſſyrian; and that theſe were the crimes he ſuffered for, may be unnatural to ſuppoſe. In a word, it ſeems to have been the firſt thing that came uppermoſt, and to have been ſaid at a venture; perhaps for variety ſake.

(D) This king of Armenia, it is plain, at firſt made ſome reſiſtance; but, finding himſelf unequal to his adverſary, ſubmits to be his vaſſal, and, in conſideration of this, his life is ſpared. This looks as if he not only reſiſted at firſt, but made terms for himſelf afterwards; or we cannot poſſibly perceive, why he ſhould be ſuffered to live any more than the apparently innocent and inoffenſive king of Babylon; whoſe caſe, if true, muſt have redounded much to the diſhonour of this new conqueror; and if not, proceed, he makes an attempt upon Media, and overthrew its king Pharnus, though at the head of a mighty army. Moſt of the army of the Medes he ſlew, the king himſelf was taken priſoner, together with his wife and ſeven children, and crucified [a] (E).

AND now nothing would ſerve him, but he muſt make himſelf maſter of all Aſia, between the Tanais and the Nile; and that he might, with the more ſafety, enter upon this enterpriſe, he fixes an intimate friend of his in the government of his new conqueſt Media, while he marched away againſt the other provinces of Aſia, which, in ſeventeen years time, he reduced all, but Bactria and India. The number of the nations he ſubjugated, it ſeems, are no where enumerated, or the battles he fought by any one deſcribed and reckoned; but thus far, we are told, is known; he made himſelf maſter of the ſea-coaſts, as well as of the inland parts, conquering Egypt, Phœnice, Cœle-Syria, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, Phrygia, Myſia, Lydia, Troas, and Phrygia upon the Helleſpont, the Propontis, Bithynia, Cappadocia, together with the barbarous nations from Pontus to the Tanais; the Caduſians, Tapyrians, Hyrcanians, Dacians, Derbicians, Carmanians, Choramneans, Borchanians, and Parthians, not excepting Perſia, not, muſt reflect highly on the judgment of the relater, who could make his hero ſo cruel and undiſtinguiſhing a man; ſo that here Ninus does not make the figure of even a common hero in a romance, who is commonly propoſed for a pattern of true juſtice and magnanimous proweſs,

(E) If there be any coherence in the narration thus far, it is in the gradation of reſiſtence in theſe three nations that were firſt attacked, upon the ſuppoſition, that the world in thoſe days knew not what war was. The Babylonians, who were firſt attacked, make no reſiſtance at all; the Armenians, whoſe turn was next, make ſome faint ſhew of reſiſtance; and now the Medes, who came third in turn, reſiſt indeed. For here we find, they had regular armies in the field to cope with Ninus; and a moſt bloody battle is fought. Pharnus, according to this, muſt have made a very extraordinary progreſs in the art of war, and muſt have been a furious enemy; and might have been a rebellious vaſſal, and a turbulent neighbour, if he had been permitted to live; and ſo he is put to death, with all his family. But this Mede ſeems to have been as much too ſtrong, as the Armenian and Babylonian are too weak; the whole has all the air of untruth and inconſiſtency one could wiſh.

Persia, Susiana, and what was called Caspiana, which he penetrated by the passes called the Caspian Straits (F). Other nations of less account he now subdued, but found it impracticable to make any notable impression on the Bactrians, who were secured by the difficulty of their passes, and the numbers of their hardy warriors (G), and therefore,

(F) Such was the extent of this youthful monarchy according to our author. All these conquests were made, with uninterrupted success, by Ninus; and these numerous nations, and others, were ever after considered as parts of the Assyrian monarchy, till its dissolution; a falshood, which may be proved by what we know of the history of every of these nations; who if they were in very early days conquered by any ancient Assyrian king, Ninus or any other, their subjection can have been but for the time. We know, by the history of the several nations that precede in this work, that they were free from any Assyrian yoke, from the first times we know of, down to the days of Pul; an interval of many ages, during which no Assyrian monarchy, existed on this side of the Euphrates. So that if any such there had been, and if its duration was such as Ctesias and his followers report, it must, according to the Hebrew computation, or the Samaritan, have taken rise many ages before the deluge, and have ended about the time these nations, and particularly all on this side of the Euphrates, began to have any being that we know of; for, from the days of Abraham down to Pul, there is no vestige of an Assyrian power extended over the western parts of Asia. This is plain, and is enough to prove this monarchy took birth in the person of Pul, the first Assyrian king, according to scripture; after him, these nations, or many of them, and particularly those on this side of the Euphrates, did confessedly pay obedience to the Assyrian throne; which before that time they certainly never did, at least for any continuance; so that there could have been nothing of this pretended Assyrian monarchy from Abraham to Pul, which is an interval of about 1150 years, which, being added to the years of the interval between Abraham and the flood, will remove the rise of this monarchy so near to us, in comparison of what profane authors tell us, that we may reckon it to have been of late origin.

(G) How these Bactrians came to be such very hardy warriors is perfectly in the dark to us; they must never have had the experience of a single campaign before they had to do with the ambitious Ninus. The same arguments may be brought to prove, that Ninus could not possibly know what they were for soldiers, as we have, a few notes above, offered to demonstrate; he could know nothing particular of the martial capacity of the Arabians; for fore he defers his war with them, till he ſhould be better aſſured of making his attempt with ſucceſs [b].

Returns into his own country.

LEADING his army back again into his own country [Syria, as it is called] (H) he determined to raiſe himſelf as great a name for his magnificence at home, as he hoped he ſhould enjoy for his warlike exploits abroad; and, with this deſign, marked out a ſpot of ground whereon to erect a city, which, for extent and ſtatelineſs, ſhould not only far ſurpaſs all that had ever before been in the world, but alſo be ſuch as ſhould, with the greateſt difficulty, be equalled by any other prince in ages to come (I). [b] Apud eund. ibid.

for if we ſuppoſe, with our author and Trogus (86), that Ninus was the firſt real warrior, we cannot allow, there can have been any nation famous for arms till after his conqueſts; and though ſome nations, during his progreſs, may have put themſelves in a poſture of defence, and gathered together in the nature of an army, Ninus could know nothing particular of them till he had tried them; and could have nothing to apprehend from them, except he judged by their ſtature and ſtrength of body; which may, it is moſt likely, have been the ſame in all theſe neighbouring nations. In ſhort, conſidering the advantage he had of numbers and experience, as alſo the torrent of his victories, it were ridiculous to ſuppoſe, he could dread any one of theſe nations more than another.

(H) We have already (87) obſerved, that Syria and Aſſyria are promiſcuouſly uſed for each other, and that this is the cauſe of much confuſion in geography (88).

(I) This is Seſoſtris exactly: Thus he, returning from the conqueſt of Aſia, applied his mind to ſuch ſtupendous works, as might immortalize his name, and everlaſtingly contribute to the publick good (89).

walls and towers; the former being 100 feet in height, the latter 200, and 1500 in number; for this city was an oblong square, no less than 480 stades in circumference, or 74 miles; the walls were so very broad, that three chariots might drive thereon a-breast. This city, which he honoured with his name, Ninus [Niniveh], he gave for a possession to the most eminent of the Assyrians (M), with liberty, at the same time, for those of any other nation to settle there, adding thereto a large territory to be dependent thereon [c].

THIS work dispatched, but in what space of time they are not so good as to tell us, Ninus takes the field again to subdue the Bactrians, whom he had left unconquered; and though in this expedition success and triumph crowned his endeavours, it is for nothing more remarkable, than for his marriage with Semiramis; which leads us to say something of the obscurity of her birth, and the sublimity of her elevation. Her birth and extraction were to be sure, more than merely mortal, for she sprang from a goddess, Derceto by name, who had a temple erected to her near a fishy lake, not far from Ascalon in Syria (N), who came to be represented by a woman upwards and a fish downwards (O), upon the following remarkable occasion; This goddess

This inaccuracy, which is more than once repeated by our author (92), has been noted by several geographers and others; but whether he borrowed the mistake from his admired Ctesias, or whether he struck it out of himself, is quite uncertain.

(M) This again is almost the very story of Sesostris, who settled certain portions, by lot, of the most fertile land in Egypt, on his whole army (93).

(N) As much as this city was in Syria, it was a city of the Proper Palestine, and belonging to the Philistines (94); so that by this account, as we have observed elsewhere (95), Semiramis was a Philistine by birth, and consequently could have no manner of relation to the king of Assyria, either as his subject or his vassal, till after the conquest of that country by the successors of Pul, many ages after this pretended time.

(O) Hence she is supposed to have been the same with the Philistine Dagon, who is commonly supposed to have been pictured in some desses, some how or other, laboured under the displeasure of Venus, who, to punish her, caused her to fall impatiently in love of a youth, who, among others, happened to be paying sacrifice to her, and unfortunately conceiving by him, she was delivered of a daughter; but ashamed of her guilt, and desirous to conceal it, she murdered the youth, and exposed the infant among the rocks of a desart, and overwhelmed with grief and dishonour, threw herself headlong into the lake, and became a fish (O*). Mean while, the unhappy infant was miraculously sustained and nourished by a flock of doves or pigeons (P), which frequented near, and some such manner; but this we have endeavoured to confute (96). Besides, Dagon was not the peculiar god of Ascalon, but of Ashdod, or Azotus (97); and therefore very unlikely to have been the Derceto of Ascalon.

(O*) Hence perhaps the worship of fishes at Hierapolis in Syria (98), where, near the temple of the great Syrian goddess, was a lake for the preservation and adoration of that watery creature, which we have at length described (99). But whether Ascalon, or Hierapolis, was the original seat of this fable, or any other place, is a most uncertain matter.

(P) Hence it should be, that Ascalon was so remarkable for flocks of pigeons (100), not only in the roads and fields, but about every house; which the people here religiously abstained from, on account of an old tradition concerning the unlawfulness of the contrary (1).

There are those who are ready to believe, Semiramis may have borrowed her name, as Diodorus insinuates (2), from a word in the Syrian tongue, signifying a dove (3); but others (4), finding no such word in that language, reject the notion as groundless. And these are most likely to be right, whatever may be offered to the contrary, upon a supposition, that the word may, in length of time, have been obliterated (5). From all this, and more, it is asserted, that the ensign armorial of Assyria was a dove (6); and it has been ventured to blazon the Syrian shield in these terms; The field Sol a dove volant proper (7). So that Semiramis is reckoned † to have been the origin of coats and crests. Hence it is supposed (8), that in the Vulgate we read (9), quia facta est terra and kept her warm with their wings, and fed her with milk from the neighbouring cottages; and when, at a year old, the child required a more ſubſtantial food, they picked cheeſe for her, and conveyed it to her; which being remarked by the neighbouring ſhepherds, who had their cheeſes thus ſerved, they made ſearch after the cauſe, and in the end found a beautiful child, which they took home with them, and ſent to the chief of the king's ſhepherds, Simma by name (Q), who being childleſs adopted her his own, and called her Semiramis, borrowed from a word in the Syriac tongue, which ſignifies doves or pigeons (R), which the Syrians ever afterwards adored as divinities [d].

terra eorum in deſolationem a facie iræ columbæ; where in our tranſlation, inſtead of the anger of the dove, we read the fierceneſs of the oppreſſor; and, in the Septuagint, ἀπὸ προσάπου τῆς μαχαίρας, the face of the ſword; which in a very ancient Saxon tranſlation in the library of Chriſt-church in Oxford (10), was thus taken, the face of the ſword of the kulver. That the dove was a peculiar diſtinction of Aſſyria, may be collected from Hoſea's (11) dove out of the land of Aſſyria. In fine, it is by Cornelius à Lapide, and others who follow the interpretation of St. Jerome, related, that God calls Nebuchadnezzar a dove (12). Whatever there may have been in all this, others have thought the Syrian dove was hieroglyphical only (13), and expreſſive of the laſcivious nature of this queen; and this may appear by the nameleſs figure of her, in the temple of the great Syrian goddeſs at Hierapolis, with a dove on its head (14): All this is extremely dark.

(Q) The name of this man Simma, has made ſome miſtake him for no leſs than Sem, or Shem; and ſo, according to them, Semiramis muſt be the daughter of that ſon of Noah (15). This is giving her antiquity enough, and allowing her to have been born before any body who is, by the various authors, ſuppoſed to have laid the foundations, either of the kingdom of Aſſyria, or of that of Babylon.

(R) This was particularly the practice at Aſcalon, as may be gathered from what we have cited, a note or two above; though it is certain to have been a cuſtom, more or leſs, with all the people within the limits of the Aſſyrian empire.

Is married, and caried to Niniveh.

SHE grew up, and by far exceeded all of her sex for wit and beauty, and, no wonder, captivated the heart of one Menon, who was sent to survey the king's cattle, though, at the same time, no less than chief of his master's council, and governor of all Syria. Menon had sight of the divine Semiramis at Simma's house, and, not without great difficulty, obtaining her to himself, conducted her to Niniveh, where he married her, and had two sons by her, Hypates and Hydaspes (S). In short, she governed her husband, who did nothing but by her advice, and with her participation, and grew into great fame for wisdom [e].

HAVING said thus much, preparatorily to what is to follow, we must leave her for a while, to follow Ninus in his Bactrian war. Sensible he had a task of the greatest difficulty to surmount, he made choice of the ablest and stoutest men in all his dominions, and resolving not to miscarry this time, as he either did, or thought he should, before, he mustered together 1,700,000 foot, above 210,000 horse, and no less than 10,600 scythed chariots. Our author tells us, these numbers may seem incredible, but that we shall think them nothing, if we do but consider a little the vast extent of Asia; and especially if we, at the same time, call to mind the 800,000 men Darius led against the Scythians, and the numberless army that followed Xerxes in Greece; things of late transaction, and what every body in his time, in a manner, knew [f].

Ninus's extraordinary preparations for the conquest of the Bactrians. Why not incredible.

HAVING by this, and other arguments and examples of the same kind, endeavoured to get the better of the incredibility that might start up to the disadvantage of this part of his history, he proceeds to tell us, that Ninus, as he advanced towards the straits and passes into Bactria, was obliged to divide his army into two or three columns; and that so he made his way into the enemy's country [g].

Bactria a populous and well fortified country.

BUT before we proceed, we must, by the way, take notice, that Bactria was, in those days, adorned with many large and noble cities, that the capital was called by the name of Bactria, that one Oxyartes was at this time king there, that he called in all his subjects that were able to bear

[e] Ibid. [f] Ibid. [g] Ibid.

(S) These are Greek names, void of all affinity with any names, either Assyrian, or Babylonian. Hydaspes was, according to the LXX, the name of a river, not far from the Tigris and Euphrates (16).

bear arms, and that, in consequence of this, he gathered together an army of 400,000 men. With these he marched towards the passes which gave admission into his country, and quietly suffered Ninus to enter with a part of his army; but, perceiving their numbers to swell considerably, he fell on them in the plain, routed them, forced the Assyrians into the mountains, and killed 100,000 of them. Thus was Ninus repulsed by the Bactrians; but he had his turn of conquest, overpowered the Bactrian with numbers, and broke and dispersed his army, which ran to the cities to defend them against the invader. Ninus with ease enough reduced all the cities and strong holds, but the [h] city and fortress of Bactria itself, which had like to have been too many for him, and held him out a long and tedious siege (T.)

Semiramis goes to the camp before Bactra.

DURING this siege, Semiramis's fond husband, then attending the king, was taken with an impatient desire to see his wife, and sending for her, she, as desirous to display the superiority of her understanding and other excellencies, as her husband was of her company, set out for the camp, in a habit so prudently contrived, as at once to preserve her beauty and conceal her sex, and at the the same time to be fit for agility and action; a mode of dress which so took with the fancy, that the Medes are said to have assumed it when they came to empire, and the Persians also [i].

She is the cause that the city is taken.

SHE no sooner arrived before Bactria, than she made remarks on their manner of conducting the siege, and particularly took notice, that they amused themselves with assaulting the weakest places, and never so much as thought of making an effort upon the citadel, and other parts of more strength; and that for this reason the besieged neglected them, to defend the places more defenceless. Observing this, she took with her some who had a particular faculty of climbing up rocks, and with these she, with

(T) This, according to our author, must have been the first warfare these Bactrians were engaged in; and yet, by this story, one would think, they had been old and experienced in all the branches of that destructive trade. Here you have a vast army of well-disciplined troops, a wise and prudent king at the head of them, a country well defended by nature, and a city impregnable by art. All this is purely said to exalt the valour and might of Ninus; though if it had been asked, how in nature it could be possible for the Bactrians to be so extremely well prepared to withstand the enemy, it had been a question Ctesias could never have answered, with any propriety or consistency.

with unſpeakable toil and dexterity, got poſſeſſion of part of the citadel, and immediately made ſignal to the Aſſyrians to aſſault in that quarter, which being done, and the city thrown into the wildeſt conſternation, the whole place was immediately reduced [k] (U).

Ninus firſt ſmitten with her;

NINUS, aſtoniſhed at this action, at firſt rewarded her as ſhe deſerved, and preſently fell a ſlave to her irreſiſtible beauty, endeavouring by all means to perſuade her huſband to ſurrender her up to him, and particularly tempting him with the promiſe of giving him his daughter Soſana in marriage; but this making no impreſſion on him, Ninus changed his note, and threatened to pull out his eyes; which threw poor Menon into ſuch a fit of rage and deſpair, that he immediately went and hung himſelf. was it, that Ninus became poſſeſſed of the incomparable Semiramis (V), who was now advanced to the imperial dignity [l].

(U) Whoever reflects on the hiſtory of this woman hitherto, muſt at once conclude the writer of it to have been no better than a fabuliſt, and an awkard one too. Her extraordinary birth, her miraculous preſervation by doves, and now her behaviour at this ſiege, are all circumſtances completely and ſelf-evidently romantic. But the ſtory had been imperfect without a woman. Thus, in the tale of Seſoſtris, his daughter Athyrte is the adviſer of his conqueſts, and aſſures him ſucceſs would attend him in his wars (17), and has, as it were, the honour of all his conqueſts. So is it now with Semiramis; ſhe here, by her ſagacity and intrepidity, performs what without her perhaps had never been brought to paſs. Where is the difference between Athyrte and Semiramis? The one adviſes, the other executes. They look very much like the ſame perſon in different employments; nor muſt we wonder, that Tzetzes talks, after this, of an Aſſyrian Seſoſtris (18), or if any other ſhould write of an Egyptian Ninus. We would now add, that the Bactrian king, who is here called Oxyartes, is by others (19) called Zoroaſtres; concerning whom, or the name at leaſt, we ſhall have ſo much to ſay in a more proper place, that we ſhall not here anticipate any thing concerning him.

(V) Scaliger (20) will have it, that Semiramis was married to Aſhur the ſon of Shem, which is much the ſame as making her the daughter of Shem, as we have obſerved, ſome would have her

NINUS, now lord of Bactra, returned with immense spoil, particularly of gold and silver; and some time afterwards had a son by Semiramis, called Ninyas, whom (dying) he left to the care of his wife, whom he constituted regent of the empire (W). She deposited her husband in the

her to have been, a note or two above. His reason for it is (21), because the name of her son Ninyas better agrees with the Hebrew way of writing the name of the city of Niniveh, than that of her pretended husband Ninus; a name he will have to have been imposed by the Greeks upon the patriarch Ashur, the grandson of Noah (22). According to this notion Shem himself must have been the vulgar Belus, the supposed father of Ninus, and not Nimrod, who was three generations later, and descended from Ham. The absurdity of all this, though our author exults much upon it (23), we hope we have demonstrated by a great variety of arguments, and it would be repetition to animadvert thereon in this place.

(W) Thus was it then, that she became queen of Assyria; but by another author (24) we understand, that as great as we are taught she must have been in the eyes of the people, she was afraid they should know who ruled them; though in right of the minor her son. That to conceal this, she cloathed herself so as not to be known from her son, with a long robe on her body, and a tiara on her head; that, to cover the deceit, she commanded the people to dress after the same fashion; and that thenceforward they retained the habit. This account of the dress, which she is said by Diodorus (25) to have brought into fashion, is much more likely to be true, than what the same author (26) relates concerning the same, that she assumed it to preserve her beauty, and to qualify her for action, which requires a succinct dress, rather than that which may be seen to have been the mode of these parts afterwards in Babylon and Persepolis; for the former of which, we, for the present, refer the reader to Herodotus (27); for the latter, to the sculptures of the ruins of Persepolis (28).

The story of her pretending to pass with the people for her son Ninyas, is exploded by Sir Walter Raleigh *; since, according to the historian, Ninyas must have been but a child when his father Ninus died, and nothing near to the stature of his mother; who, being supposed to have been a comely personage, could never by any arts of concealment have passed for a child.

Semiramis's character;

SEMIRAMIS, as may be gathered from what has been ſaid before, was a woman of an aſpiring mind and immenſe ambition, and now thought of nothing leſs than eclipſing her huſband's glory (Y), to which end ſhe determined to erect [m] Apud eund. ibid.

(X) Or a mile and a quarter, allowing eight ſtades or furlongs to the mile; and by this ſame rule it muſt have been a mile and half quarter in height. This ſeems ſo incredible to Monſ. Rollin in particular, who has unaccountably adopted the abſurdities of the ſeveral profane authors in his hiſtory, and rejected moſt of, if not all, the improvements that have been made in hiſtory and geography, by the aſſiduous reſearches of later days, that he is willing to think the ſtade made but little more than the ſixteenth of our mile, and that fifteen of them might be reckoned to the mile, as ſome have imagined (29). This allowed, this funeral monument would very far exceed any thing that perhaps ever was in the world.

(Y) Rollin ſuppoſes, ſhe wanted to cover the meanneſs of her extraction, by the greatneſs of her deeds and enterpriſes (30). Thus is it his tranſlator expreſſes himſelf in Engliſh, which we are, for this once, obliged to uſe for want of the original French. But this thought ſeems to be a little too refined for the early times he ſuppoſes her to have lived in; beſides, his hiſtorian (31) warrants him in nothing of the ſort that we can perceive. This her ambition puts us in mind of a ſtory told of her, That ſhe was a Syrian by birth, a ſervant-maid to one of the king's ſervants, and the king's concubine; and that at length ſhe got ſuch an aſcendant over the great Ninus, that ſhe obtained of him to let her ſit on the throne and command for one day; and that, perceiving all her orders to be moſt exactly executed, ſhe at laſt ordered her guards to ſeize on Ninus himſelf, bind him, and put him to death; and that thus it was ſhe became queen of Aſia (32). This ſame ſtory, with ſome variation, is alſo told by others. If the former part of this be true, ſhe had ſome reaſon to be aſhamed of her extraction; and if the latter, it was but policy in her to erect a city in the province of Babylon; making incredible preparation for the work, and assembling together two millions of men to assist therein. This city, as she contrived it, was divided by the Euphrates, and she surrounded it with a wall of 360 stades in circuit (Z), of such thickness, that six chariots might drive a-breast thereon, and of height beyond imagination, no less than fifty orgyas, or fathoms, and adorned with 250 turrets, in due and proper proportion thereto, the whole a solid body of brick cemented together with bitumen, and between this wall and the houses therein was left a space of two plethra, or 200 feet [n]. resolves to build Babylon.

THAT this enormous city might be erected with the dispatch her impatience required, she allotted a spot of a furlong, to as many of her trustiest friends as the greatness of the surface required, allotting to each every thing that was necessary for the undertaking; by which means, though she allowed no more than the short space of a year for the completion of the whole, her commands were punctually obeyed. She highly approved of the work, and to join the divided parts of the city, she ordered a bridge, which was as substantially built, as artfully contrived, and as beautifully adorned, as any that since then has ever appeared in the world. The stones of it were firmly clamped together with iron, and the passage over was on a floor of cedar, and cypress, and palm-trees; but the breadth The manner she contrived to have the city built in a short time.

to endeavour to outdo her fond predecessor; who, according to this, must have been such a Ninus as described by Phœnix Colophonius (33), who is represented exactly as another Sardanapalus, and may, it is likely, have been meant for the same; for we cannot conceive, how so very effeminate a character can suit with the great Ninus the conqueror. A mean and scandalous prince she might have outdone, and kept her ground after she had destroyed him; but for such a prince, as Ninus is on all sides allowed to have been, we cannot apprehend, it could have been in her power, either to have pacified her new subjects, or to have eclipsed him.

(Z) We shall have occasion hereafter to describe this city in form, so that we here confine ourselves to what Ctesias relates of it, regardless, whether true or false, which we reserve for a particular inquiry in the history of the Babylonian kingdom.

of it, which was ſeemingly too ſmall for the length, which was five ſtades, amounted to no more than thirty feet. On each ſide of the river ſhe raiſed a wharf, or key, of the breadth of the walls, and an hundred ſtades in length; and at each end of the bridge ſhe erected two palaces, whence ſhe might reciprocally ſurvey and awe both parts of the city. The Euphrates paſſing through the midſt of Babylon, from north to ſouth, theſe two palaces ſtood, the one to the eaſt, the other to the weſt; both of them ſumptuous and magnificent to the utmoſt. The weſtern was ſurrounded by a lofty wall of brick, full ſixty ſtades in circuit, within which was a ſecond, wrought and adorned with figures, as it were from the very life, ſo curiouſly were they formed, and ſo naturally coloured. This magnificent wall was 40 ſtades in circumference, 300 bricks thick, 50 fathoms high, and thereon were raiſed towers of 70 of the ſame meaſure in height. Within this there was a third wall, or incloſure, far ſurpaſſing the ſecond in height and breadth, on which, and its towers, were repreſented all manner of living creatures as before; and more eſpecially a great hunting of all kinds of wild beaſts, each four cubits in height and upwards; in the midſt of which appeared Semiramis herſelf, mounted on a ſteed, darting through a leopard, and her huſband Ninus near in cloſe combat with a lyon, whom he pierced with his lance; this wall was 30 ſtades about. To this palace ſhe had three gates, under which were rooms of braſs, for the celebration of feſtivals, which were opened by a mechanical contrivance [o].

THIS palace far exceeded that on the other ſide of the river, both for dimenſion and magnificence; for the outermoſt wall of this was no more in circumference than the innermoſt wall of the former, and for decoration, the whole was much inferior to what we have deſcribed. So our author tells us, though with ſome ſeeming inconſiſtency, when in the ſame breath he informs us, that, beſides brazen ſtatues of Ninus, Semiramis, their great officers, and Jupiter, whom the Babylonians called Belus, there were not only whole armies drawn up in battalia, but likewiſe the repreſentation of various kinds of hunting, to the great delight and recreation of the beholder [p].

The lake ſhe dug.

ALL this being completed, Semiramis ſunk a vaſt lake, vaſt, conſidering it was ſunk by the labour of man. This lake, lake, for so we may well call it, was four square; each side of it was 300 stades in length, the whole lined with brick strongly cemented with bitumen, and no less than 35 foot in depth. This lake was sunk on purpose to receive the waters of the Euphrates, which she diverted, while she erected a covered passage, or vault, across the bottom of the river, whereby to have communication between her two opposite palaces. This vault was 20 bricks thick, 12 foot high, and 15 broad; a work finished within the space of 260 days, when the river was again restored to its antient course and liberty. At the ends of this vault she had brazen gates, which continued, say they, to the time of the Persian conquest [q].

Temple of Belus.

IN the midst of the city, though on which side is not said, she built a temple to Jupiter Belus, concerning which our author has nothing particular to relate, except that it must have been of exceeding height (A); that, like the rest of the city, it was built of brick and bitumen; and that on the top of it Semiramis placed three statues of beaten gold, viz. of Jupiter, Juno, and Rhea. The statue of Jupiter was upright, and, as it were, walking, forty foot high, and weighing 1000 talents of Babylon: The statue of Rhea was of the same weight, and sat in a golden throne, with a lyon standing at each knee, and near them two very great serpents of silver, weighing 30 talents apiece: The statue of Juno was erect, and weighed 800 talents; she with her right hand grasped a serpent by the head, and with her left she held a scepter enriched with gems. These deities had a table, or altar, common to the three, made of beaten gold, 40 foot in length, 15 foot in breadth, and weighing 500 talents. On this table stood two flaggons, or goblets, of 30 talents weight, and near them two censers, but these weighed 300 talents each; as also three drinking bowls, or vases, of which particularly that dedicated to Jupiter weighed 1200 talents of Babylon, the other two 600 [r] (B).

Builds several cities.

ALL this is attributed to Semiramis, and much more there is to come. Babylon was not the only city she raised, she built several others on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates, for the sake of commerce and communication with the remote parts of her empire, and to exalt the majesty of the great capital; which she farther distinguished by a most extraordinary obelisk, hewn out of the mountains of Armenia, 125 foot high, five foot broad, and five deep. This she removed from its native place, by mulitudes of oxen and asses, and thence shipping it on the river, conveyed it to Babylon, and erected it in a remarkable part of the neighbourhood of this city; and it is by our author reckoned as one of the seven wonders of the world [s].

Wars upon the Medes.

WHEN Semiramis had done all this, she puts herself at the head of a vast army, and marches away into Media, and there incamps near a mountain called Bagistan, where she made a pleasant garden, of 12 stades in circumference: It was in an open champain country, and plentifully supplied with water from a neighbouring spring. This mountain was dedicated to Jupiter, or Belus, and towards this same garden; its craggy precipice was 17 stades from top to bottom, which she is said to have ascended from the plain to the top of it, on the packs and loads carried by the beasts of burthen that followed her. At the bottom of this rock she caused a statue of herself to be hewn out, and attended by 100 of her choicest guards [t].

FROM hence she marched till she came to Chaon, a city of the Medes, and there encamping on an eminence, she took notice of a very lofty rock, on the top of which also she formed a very fine garden, and erected stately edifices, whence she might command a view of the beauties of the spot, the wide extension of the place, and the whole camp of her army. Here she is said to have wasted much of her time, and to have given herself up to wanton dalliances and prostitution (C); for, jealous of her power and and high command, she would take no partner to bed; but chose rather to admit the comliest men of army to her embraces, which were fatal to all that joyed them, for all such she immediately doomed to dea (D).

MOVING from this place, she advanced towards E tan, and in her way levelled the mountain Zarcœ which was many stades in extent, and for its frequent p cipices impassable, but by much labour and loss of w This she did to add to the glory of her name, and to cilitate the passage to all that should have occasion to tr vel that way (E). This she did with infinite labour an expence, and hence the work came to be called SEMIRA-MIS's ROAD, or WAY. When she came to Ecbatan she there built a most magnificent palace, and did mor than she had any where else done. The city, till ther had laboured under a want of water, a defect which sh amply supplied with her usual toil and expence [w].

FROM Media she continued her progress through Persi and the rest of her Asiatic provinces, levelling both roc and mountains before her as she went, in parts incon moded by eminences of the sort; and on the contrary, plain and champain tracks, raising hills to vary and ad them, and at the same time serve for monuments to captains and chief commanders. Sometimes she would bu towns and cities, and was constantly used to raise an emi nence, whereon to erect her own pavilion, that so she might have a prospect of her whole army. Many of these things are said to have remained a long time after her in Asia, and have been commonly called SEMIRAMIS'S WORKS [x].

HAVING thus visited her dominions in Asia, she next went to Egypt, surveyed that kingdom, and added the greatest part of Lybia to what belonged to her before; and paying a visit to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and enquiring how long she had to live, the oracle made answer, She should vanish from the sight of men, and obtain im-ſelf at Bactra [y].

HERE ſhe for ſome years enjoyed herſelf in peace; but length, impatient of ſo quiet and calm a way of life, ſhe editated a war againſt the king of India. She had been nformed of the tranſcendant amœnity of the country, its double fertility, its immenſe riches, and matchleſs ele-of that moſt extenſive part of the old world. But, know-her governors in general to ſelect a proportion of the youth in their provinces, and to furniſh them with complete habiliments for war, and to take care they rendez-

HER vessels and her elephants ready, and all in two years, she, in the third, rendezvoused her army in the kingdom of Bactria, to the amount of three millions of foot, 200,000 horse, 100,000 chariots, and 100,000 men on camels, who wielded swords four cubits long. Her transports were 2000 in number, and carried by camels (F), as were also the mock-elephants, which the horsemen endeavoured to familiarise to their steeds, that they might not take fright at them when they came to battle [b].

Stabrobates, king of India, prepares to receive her.

STABROBATES heard of this, and prepared for the storm; and first he built him 4000 boats of the great canes [Bamboos], which grew in the rivers and fens of India; and with great diligence got together a far greater army than that of Semiramis. He added to the number of elephants he had before, causing numbers to be taken for that purpose, and to be apparelled with every thing that might be invincible by any human force. Thus prepared, he sends ambassadors to Semiramis, then on her march towards him, with complaints and reproaches for offering to make war upon him, without any offence at all given on his part; by a private letter, at the same time, upbraiding her with Semiramis on the banks of the Indus.

[b] Ibid.

(F) These numbers, says Suidas (35), she levied by her lieutenant Dercetæus, who, by his name, should have been her kinsman. The same author (36) exaggerates these numbers most monstrously, writing, that she thus gave orders to the said Dercetæus, 'Go to, and prepare for an expedition in three years, beginning from the Hellespont and Libya to Bactra, and levy three millions of foot, one million of horse, 100,000 scythed chariots, and the like number of men to fight upon camels; 200,000 camels for other uses; and let there be 300,000 ox-hides prepared, and 3000 ships built in Bactria, with brazen prows, and manned by Syrians, Phœnicians, Cypriots, Cilicians, and others on the sea-coasts quite to the Hellespont.' This is a notable addition to the Ctesian story, and a great instance of credulity, or presumption, in the writer, and tempts us to say, that the Greek historians seem to have been particularly fond of the marvellous, and to have made a greater merit of magnifying things, even beyond all bounds, than of representing them as they really were. For here it is observed (37), that no spot on the face of the earth could have sustained these multitudes, though every man and beast had fed upon nothing but grass.

with her infamous life, and vowing by heaven, that, if he conquered her, he would crucify her. She perused this letter, smiled at the contents, and answered, The Indian should ere long be better acquainted with her by her carriage and actions [c].

WHEN she came to the banks of the Indus, she discovered the enemy's fleet drawn up against her; whereupon she prepared and launched her own, which she manned with the bravest of her people and gave battle, ordering it so, that those ashore might be aiding and assisting upon occasion. The fight was obstinate, but Semiramis, in the end, came off victorious, sunk 1000 of the Indian barks, and took a multitude of prisoners. Elated with this, she fell on the cities of the river, and made 100,000 captives [d].

Stabrobates feigns a retreat.

UPON this Stabrobates draws off his army, as if afraid, but in truth to decoy Semiramis over the river; and she, ignorant of his meaning, no sooner perceived his retreat, than she ordered a broad bridge of boats to be stretched across the river, and marched over her army, leaving only 60,000 men to guard the bridge, while she went in pursuit of the flying Indian. She marched with her mock-elephants in the front, thereby to deceive and intimidate the enemy, and it seems, that herein she did not contrive amiss; for the Indian scouts, mistaking them for real, gave a dreadful account of their multitudes, and injected a terror into their countrymen, who, all astonished, could not conceive, whence the Assyrians should have furnished themselves with these tremendous creatures: But the deceit did not trouble them long, for some of Semiramis's people, deserting over to the Indians, for fear of punishment they expected for neglect of duty, revealed to them the whole fallacy, and Stabrobates immediately ordered proclamation thereof to be made throughout all his army [e].

Semiramis on the other side of the Indus.

SEMIRAMIS, in the mean time, advanced towards the Indian army, continuing with her false elephants in her front, which came up with the Indian horse and chariots, which had been disposed at some distance, before the gross of the foot and the elephants. They charge, and an unexpected fright seizes the Indian horse, who at a distance, accustomed to the sight of elephants, advanced with great fury; but within scent of these ox hides, it was new and offensive offenſive to them, and they broke into the wildeſt diſorder, throwing their riders, or running away with them into the midſt of the Aſſyrians. Semiramis, perceiving the advantage, with a choice body of men attacked the diſordered Indians, and completely routed them and drove them back again to the groſs of their army. Stabrobates, in ſome degree of conſternation at this partial defeat, charges with his foot, ſuſtained by his elephants, himſelf mounted on a ſtately one in his right wing, and oppoſite to Semiramis then in her left. The ſhock was violent and had a ſudden effect, and great was the ſlaughter cauſed particularly by the elephants. Semiramis's mock-elephants now proved uſeleſs and cumberſom, and the whole Aſſyrian army betook them to a precipitate flight. In the midſt of this battle, the Aſſyrian queen and Indian king fought hand to hand, and he wounded her firſt in the arm with an arrow, and then with a dart in her ſhoulder, as ſhe was turning about to get from him, and truſting to the fleetneſs of her horſe, ſhe fled with the reſt of her army [f].

Her fight with the king of India.

WHEN they came to the bridge, the throng was ſuch, that many who had eſcaped the hand of the enemy were miſerably preſſed to death, or periſhed under foot, being thrown down and trampled upon, or ſhoved into the river from the ſides of the bridge. Semiramis, when the body of her army had croſſed the river, ordered the bridge to be cut away and deſtroyed, while chiefly laden with Indians, many of whom periſhed by this means. And now ſhe was ſafe from farther danger; the river was between her and the enemy; and not only ſo, but the Indian was alſo admoniſhed not to be eager for the purſuit, by the intervention of prodigies, and the like: In a word, having on each ſide made an exchange of priſoners, Semiramis returned to Bactra with ſcarce a third gart of the army ſhe had carried out (G) [g].

Her end. AND now under this eclipse of her glory, she approaches towards her end; the predicted time is come, she is attempted to be assassinated by an eunuch, subdolously and unnaturally employed by her son (H), and thereupon, calling to mind the answer she had received from Jupiter Ammon, she suppressed all thoughts of revenge for what had been caused, as it were by a divine fatality; she forgave her son, surrendered up every thing to him, commanded all her subjects to pay him duty and homage as their king, and was translated from the sight of men, as the oracle

(H) Having thus conducted this famous woman through a long course of incredible undertakings and exploits, which we have forborn to animadvert on, apprehending, we have said abundantly enough in the former part of this section to prepare the reader for a disbelief of what was to follow, which indeed were a needless task, had not this piece of history received the sanction of some of the greatest men in all ages; we must now enquire into her end, and particularly, how it should come to pass, that her son Ninyas sought her life. We are told (40), that she would unnaturally have tempted him to commit incest with her, and that thereupon he conceived such a hatred of her, that he could not bear that she should live any longer, and therefore murdered her. Diodorus, or his author Ctesias rather, here tells us, her son employed an eunuch to dispatch her, but that she escaped and vanished from sight. We have seen, by the same author, that she gave herself up to wanton dalliances in the plains of Media, and cruelly sacrificed her gallants to her furious lust; but no mention at all is by him made of any attempts of hers to seduce her son. Now, according to the course of this history, there seem to have been two provocations, that may have stirred up Ninyas to get rid of her: the one, her scandalous way of life; and the other, her usurpation of his right as king and sovereign; which, how he should so long have submitted to, is past our solution; though we may just touch on it anon, dismissing it for the present. It is here somewhat to our purpose, that Conon (41) calls her not the wife, but the mother of Ninus, and that lying with him by accident, she afterwards acknowledged him publicly for her husband. According to this reading (42) Ninyas should be the person meant; but Sir Walter Raleigh acquits her of all faults of this kind, and ascribes them, as his words run, to the envious and lying Grecians (43.) Gregory (44) would offer it as an argument of her chastity, that she, as Ammianus relates, first instituted eunuchs to attend her in her bed-chamber.

oracle had foretold. It was fabled, she made her exit in the form of a dove or pigeon, together with a flock of that kind, which settled upon her palace just at the time, and say they, it was hence the Assyrians were addicted to the worship of a dove (I). In fine, she was queen of all Asia, India excepted, and continued in the sight of men 62 years, 42 of which she reigned [h].

NINYAS

[h] Apud eund. ibid.

(I) Concerning the Semiramidan dove, we have treated largely already (45), and may have occasion to resume the subject hereafter, when we are to speak of the Babylonian religion; and the rather, as Semiramis is more likely to have been a Babylonian than an Assyrian, appellations confessedly synonymous. And now, that there was such a woman as Semiramis, we doubt not in the least, but that there ever was a woman of any name that performed any thing like what was here reported, is impossible to believe. Her birth, her elevation, her reign, and her death are all extraordinary, and unnatural, and impossible, as related by the bulk of historians; but above all her antiquity, which is exaggerated so monstrously by Josephus Scaliger (46) and Reneciús (47), is a matter so easily disproved, by the circumstances of her birth and country, that it were sufficient to destroy whatever other extravagance is advanced of her. Conon (48) makes her to have been the same with the Atossa, or Semiramis, who reigned 12 years with her father Belochus, the 18th king of Assyria, according to Eusebius (49), and in the same place calls her the daughter, and not the wife, of Ninus, though copies, it must be confessed, differ in the reading, and have sometimes (50) mother instead of daughter. But this latter is to be preferred, because of its congruity with the author's meaning, who makes her the Atossa of Belochus, who were confessedly daughter and father (51). Belochus then must have been the Ninus of Ctesias, and he, instead of being the first, or second, king of Assyria, is, according to Eusebius (52), the eighteenth king; this takes much from the antiquity of both, and we are ready to subscribe the same, and the rather, as it may be observed hereafter, to quadrate with Herodotus, and is much more conformable to our notices of the true and more certain history of this monarchy. To conclude, had this queen done but Ninyas. NINYAS (K) succeeded his mother Semiramis, and taking neither after father nor mother, he chose to enjoy himself in peace; and, indeed, there must have been a necessity for it, if his parents had done all that report says of but half what is reported of her (53), or even a tenth part, she would have been worthy of the greatest fame, and even, according to the genius of those times, of deification itself. A most extraordinary personage she must have been, nor do we wonder, considering the romantic humour of the times, that she should be reckoned to have discovered and invented the use of metals, and to have been the first queen and tyranness, and, in short, to have been called the goddess Rhea (54). She may be compared with the Egyptian Isis and the Phœnician Astarte, as her husband Ninus may with the Egyptian Osiris, Sesostris, and the like.

(K) He is also called Zames (55), the German writers will have him to have been called Trebata, and to have built the city of Treves (56); he is also called Thourias (57), or Thouras (58), or Ares [Mars]; and is said to have had the first statue erected to him, which they called Βαὰλ Θεὸν, Lord God. In short, he is said to have waged war and to have slain the tyrant Caucasus of the tribe of Japhet, or Japetus, and to have been consecrated into the planet Mars (59). How different is this character from that of the slothful Ninyas in most other authors? No extremes can be at a greater distance from each other. The authors we have cited make him the successor of Ninus, without any mention of Semiramis, which seems to have some sort of agreement with what we have from Eusebius observed in the note above, that she was the very Atossa, the daughter of Belochus, and that she reigned with her father, as his collegue and assistant, for the space of 12 years only (60). And this seems the rather to have been the truth of the case, as we cannot help wondering with Sir Walter Raleigh (61), how she should have been able to keep the reins in her own hands, in prejudice of her son who was her lawful sovreign. He has no way to account for this, but by supposing he had regard to his pleasures only, and cared not of how much trouble his mother eased his shoulders (62). But that he was not so poor a wretch as this amounts to, will among other things, be observed in the next note.

of them; he could make no war upon any that were not either his subjects or vassals [i]. As for India, which alone was free from his yoke, a war there had been sufficiently experienced to be very impracticable and absolutely dangerous. Having therefore nothing to do abroad, he locked himself up in his palace, unseen by any but his eunuchs and concubines, and contracted such a habit of sloth and vice, as has tainted his memory to all succeeding generations. Ninyas's sloth. However, he was not so supinely negligent, as totally to neglect his interest and security. It was a custom with him, every year, to levy an army by a certain proportion of men out of each province, under their respective generals, while he appointed such governors over the several parts of his dominions, as he could most safely confide in. This army served a year in the city, and about it we may suppose, and was then relieved by another, raised in the same manner; and the former, having taken an oath of fidelity to him, were permitted to depart each to the place of his abode. His policy. By this step of policy it was, he thought he might best keep his subjects in awe and order; and, at the same time, prevent any disturbance from his officers, who having scarce time to be at all known to their soldiers, could have it the less in their power to aspire at any thing to his prejudice (L). All this he concerted to secure himself from insults

(L) Diodorus, Athenæus, Justin, and others, represent him, as we have seen, a slothful, inactive, and lascivious king; to have locked himself up in his palace; to have sequestred himself from the eyes of his subjects, and to have had communication with them but by messages; to have even turned woman, and to have conversed with none but that sex; and yet we see him consulting and contriving to preserve the empire his parents had left him, and which, in the nature of things, he could not possibly enlarge. We see him here acting the part of a resolute tyrant and consummate politician, and may thence conclude, that if there had been any possible work of the sort left for him to do, he would have turned out a conqueror. Upon the whole we would remark, that, according to this, he must have been a haughty and a politic prince by nature, and one that, to all appearance, would not have suffered his mother to rule for him, or rather over him, for the space of 42 years. His retirement may be offered as an argument of his pride and policy; and this his regulation for the duty and relief of his armies, may be thought to savour strongly of absolute sway

sults and rebellions, while he wallowed in lasciviousness within the walls of his palace: in which he was an unworthy example to his successors after him; reserving himself from the eyes of men, as something more than mortal[k].

AFTER this rate was it, that all his successors reigned in the great empire of Assyria; so that they, it seems, have left little or nothing to be recorded of them, except that they lived and died in their palace at Niniveh (L*); and hence it is, we must abruptly proceed to the very last of them[l].

sway and love of power, in the person that instituted it. All this we have insisted on to prove, that he did not succeed Semiramis in the manner our historian writes; which must appear even by the inconsistent character our author here gives of him. To which we would add, that if the same method of restraining the empire were the practice of Ninyas and his successors, as by our author it appears, what is the meaning, we perceive no footsteps of it any where within our knowledge, in the very long interval of 1200 years at least between Ninyas and Sardanapalus? we apprehend, that no body can give us a satisfactory answer to this. And here we cannot but wonder, how Sir Walter Raleigh should ever take it into his head, that this Ninyas, this mighty Assyrian monarch, might be the petty king of Shinaar, Amraphel, in Genesis (63), or that he should, if he reposed any confidence at all in profane writers, imagine, the monarchy had, even in Abraham's time, even in its infancy, received a downright fall as he calls it (64).

(L*) This vast chasm of inaction in the Assyrian monarchs, from Ninyas to Sardanapalus, a vacancy, as we may call it, of at least 1200 years, is as strong a proof, that the profane accounts are fabulous, as any of the many we have offered to prove them so. Is it probable, that in so long a succession of princes there should have been one only that did any thing worth the recording? Or is it possible, that in so very long a succession of years there should have arisen no man at all, who had ambition and courage enough to take advantage of the sloth and supineness of these kings at Niniveh? Where were the other kings of the world all this time, and especially such as were vassals to this throne? Did they glory in their chains and the burthen of their tribute? Or did they all sink into a lethargy with their master? Was there no king of Bactria, no king of India, to rouse them from their silken slumbers? Had Ninus destroyed the race of mankind, so numerous

More, many more, queries of this kind may be made, but we deſiſt. So many pacific ages, ſuch a ſeries of the calmeſt peace, both from within and from without, may ſhock the eaſieſt credulity. The monarchies which ſucceeded this were of very ſhort duration in compariſon of this, and why the Aſſyrian ſhould have the ſole privilege of ſtanding ſo long erect, we are at a loſs for. Great monarchies have been always objects of common hatred among men, and ſubject to ſuch ſudden and violent ſubverſions, as this monarchy certainly underwent.

Nicholas of Damaſcus (67) is more moderate, and accuſes him chiefly of paſſing his time with his women, and contending with them about dreſs and ornament, in the very words uſed to the ſame purpoſe in Suidas (68). (O) A man of pleasure and lewdness he may have been, and doubtless was, it being impossible to think otherwise of monarchs of this sort, as experience teaches us, and for the proof of which we need go no farther than Constantinople, to take a view of the great Turk; but nevertheless he may have been a man, who, at some intervals, minded business; such a man we are told he was, for he is said to have built Tarsus and Anchiale in one day (71); in testimony of which he had this inscription on his tomb, ΣΑΡΔΑΝΑΠΑΛΟΣ ΑΝΑΚΥΝΔΑΡΑΞΕΩ ΑΓΧΙΑΛΗΝ ΕΔΕΙΜΕ ΚΑΙ ΤΑΡΣΟΝ ΜΙΗ ΗΜΕΡΗ, ΑΛΛΑ ΝΥΝ ΤΕΘΝΗΚΕΝ, Sardanapalus, the son of Anacyndaraxis, built Tarsus and Anchiale in one day, but now is dead. This is a grave epitaph, and might befit any prince, but we find it varied a little to disadvantage; for, instead of the three last words, we have this addition to his magnificent exploit of having built these two cities in a day, ΕΣΘΙΕ, ΠΙΝΕ, ΠΑΙΣΕ, ΩΣ Τ'ΑΛΛΑ ΤΟΥΤΟΥ ΟΥΚ ΑΞΙΑ, Eat, drink, and be merry, for the rest is not worth the snap of a finger; which was signified by his statue here, in act of snapping its fingers (72): This monument and statue is said to have been not far from Anchiale. A modern author (73) supposes the same inscription and statue to have been at the other city Tarsus, where St. Paul was born, and thinks the apostle alludes thereto, when he writes, Let us eat and drink; for to morrow we die. However, there seems to be such incoherence between the former part of this last inscription and the latter, that we know not what to think of it; there is no manner of relation between the action recorded and the reflection that insues. In the first, indeed, there is a becoming gravity throughout, and a persuasive to virtue and humility, by representing, that even the mighty king, who could build two cities in a day, was equally mortal with the rest of his kind; but the latter is merely calculated to encourage idleness and vice, eat, drink, and be merry, the rest is not worth caring for. If this was any where the genuine inscription, it must have been in derision of him after his death, and upon a presumption, that he was the idle effeminate creature he is painted. Callisthenes (74) writes, there were two Sardanapaluses, the one a bold, the other an effeminate, man. Others do the same, as we shall his subjects about him, and, as should seem, particularly to Arbaces the Mede and Belesis the Babylonian. Belesis was not only a captain, but a famous priest and a great astrologer, and by the rules of his art he took on him, as is said, to assure Arbaces, a man of valour and prudence, That he should dethrone Sardanapalus, and become lord of all his dominions. Arbaces hearkened to his friend, and promised him the chief place over Babylon, if things should happen to answer his prediction; and fully possessed, that he was to be as Belesis had foretold of him, he cultivates particular intimacies with the other governors of the provinces then at Niniveh, and begins to affect popularity; and therein succeeds to his wish. But above all, he endeavours to get sight of the emperor, that he might behold his course and manner of life, and describe him accordingly. This he brings to pass, by the prevalence of a golden cup he presented to an eunuch, who introduced him into the presence. Arbaces saw him, and, conceiving the highest contempt of him, was more and more encouraged to rely on his Chaldean friend, and, impatient to effect their purpose, Arbaces disposes the Medes and Persians to an open revolt, and Belesis does the same with the Babylonians; and, in short, the matter was disclosed to the king of Arabia [n].

The Medes, Babylonians, and Persians revolt.

THE year of duty was now expired, and fresh troops arrived to relieve those who had served it; but the Persians, Medes, and Babylonians, assisted by the Arabians, came not with design to guard Sardanapalus; their intent was to subvert the empire. Their number all together amounted to 400,000 men, and being all combined together, in one camp, a council of war was called, to deliberate upon what was best to be done. Sardanapalus, apprized of this revolt, resolved to stifle it in its infancy, and leads out the troops of the other provinces against the confederated rebels, and coming to a battle with them, he entirely routed them, and with great slaughter pursued them to certain mountains about 70 stades from the city of Niniveh.

niveh. The rebels, however, drew out again to fight the emperor, who, just before the action began, caused proclamation to be made of a reward of 200 talents of gold for the man who should kill Arbaces the Mede, and twice that sum, together with the government of Media, to the man who should produce him alive; and the same was proclaimed concerning Belesis the Babylonian. This proclamation being made without any effect, a second battle was fought, and the rebels were again slaughtered, and put to flight towards the hills. This victory had assured Sardanapalus in his throne, had it not been for the obstinacy of Belesis, who persisted in it, that the gods would certainly smile on them, and crown their labours and perseverance with success in the end; thereby reviving their drooping spirits, who in despair had called a council, the result of which was, that they should disperse, and every man re-

(P) It must be confessed a little strange, that so degenerated a creature should have the courage and ability thus to defend himself against these revolters, who should have been of much greater experience and capacity than himself. Indeed, according to what this author and most others say of him, he could have understood nothing in the world relating to war, or almost any thing else peculiar to men; and yet being forced into the field, we find him behaving and defending himself, as well as if he had been Ninus, or even Semiramis herself. From this dissimilitude of Sardanapalus from himself, it is likely, we have the two mentioned by Callisthenes in the note above, Sardanapalus the warrior, and Sardanapalus the woman. This, as every thing of our own, we offer as conjecture only.

den advice was brought of a mighty power at hand, sent to the king from Bactria. Arbaces, upon this, dispatched the most resolute and expeditious men in his army, with orders to prevail on the Bactrians to revolt, either by fair means or foul. Liberty was the bait to allure them, and by degrees, from officer to soldier, it prevailed, and the Bactrians joined Arbaces; a transaction unknown to Sardanapalus, who, presuming he had now nothing to fear, was returned to his usual way of life (Q), and preparing for an extraordinary sacrifice, and a high festival for the entertainment of his victorious army [p].

The Bactrians revolt to them.

IN the mean time, the negligence and riot in the imperial camp was conveyed to the ears of Arbaces, who, in consequence thereof, fell suddenly on them in the night, made his way into the camp, and drove out Sardanapalus and all his army, with a great slaughter, which continued almost to the gates of the city. Whereupon the king commits the care and conduct of his army to Salemenus his brother-in-law, undertaking to defend the city in person. His forces were twice defeated, once at some distance, and once under the walls of the city, when Salemenus fell, and almost all his army was cut off, and forced into the river, which was tinctured with the gore of the slain for a long while [q].

They attack the imperial camp by surprise.

SARDANAPALUS was now closely besieged: Many other nations, now eager for liberty, revolted to the confederates; and perceiving things at so desperate a pass, he sent away his three sons and two daughters, with a very great treasure, into Paphlagonia, where one Cotta, a particular friend of his, was governor (R), and issued out orders

They besiege Sardanapalus in Nineveh.

[p] Ibid. [q] Ibid.

(Q) There is seemingly some inconsistency in this, if we consider what follows; for by that it appears, that he took on him the part of a grateful and beneficent prince, who would reward and feast with his army after their successful toils.—It seems a little uncharitable to think otherwise of him in this case.

(R) Where this Paphlagonia should have been situated, and who this Cotta, a modern name, should have been, we forbear to enquire, as favouring too grosly of fable; but, by the way, we cannot help asking, how this Cotta should have been so particularly his friend and faithful servant, when no one governor had ever seen his face, before Arbaces the Mede bribed his way to a sight of him; this does not hang at all with the other parts all incon-orders to all parts of his empire (S) to come in to his assistance, and prepare for a siege (T). But though his situation may seem to have been quite deplorable, he, it seems, did not succumb, fully possessed with notions of a prophecy, That Niniveh could never be taken, till the river became her enemy, which, according to his conclusion, amounting to an impossibility, he looked upon himself as secure, how great and imminent soever the dangers might be that threatened him [r].

They take the city.

WHILE Sardanapalus pleased himself with this imagination, the confederates, elated by what they had done, considered their work as completed, though they, in those early days, could make no impression on such walls, ignorant as they were of the engines afterwards invented to expedite undertakings of this sort. Sardanapalus having taken care to be well stored with what was necessary to enable him inconsistent within themselves, of this story of this last king of Niniveh; nor is it even easy to conceive, how he should have sent away any of his family and treasure: the enemy had certainly secured the passes; the poliorcetic art, in those simple days, consisted of little else. To mend the matter, another tells us (76), who mentions our author Ctesias as if he quoted him, that Sardanapalus, perceiving himself sore pressed, and ruin coming with hasty strides upon him, sent three sons and two daughters, together with 3000 talents of gold, to the king of Niniveh. What city of Niniveh this can have been, besides the city he himself was besieged in, we are quite at a loss for, and so we leave this palpable obscurity as we find it, except we infer, that through this seeming mistake the error sprang of making two Sardanapaluses, as well as two Ninivehs, which we meet with no where else.

(S) How he could do this, closely besieged as he was, is hard to conceive; and what need he had of doing it, will be as difficult, if we consider what follows.

(T) Why should he have been so solicitous about his family, himself, or the city, if what follows be true, that he was persuaded the place could never be taken? Why in this case should he have exposed his children and treasure by sending them away, when, according to his belief, they could no where have been in more safety? and why should he be so busy with his orders, and calling in his people to his assistance in the siege? they could have been of no use to such an impregnable place as was proof against every thing, even famine itself, but the waters of the river.

him to hold out a long time, the confederates ſat two years before the city without any viſible effect: but in the third year the river, ſwelled by unuſual rains, came up to the city, and overflowed a great length, no leſs than 20 ſtades, of the wall. The unfortunate Sardanapalus, now ſenſible of the completion of what had been foretold of the river's enmity to the city, had no farther room for hope, and, dreading to fall into the hands of the enemy, retired into his palace, in a court of which he cauſed a vaſt pile of wood to be raiſed, and heaping upon it all his gold, and ſilver, and royal apparel, and at the ſame time incloſing his eunuchs and concubines in an apartment within the pile, he ſet fire thereto, and ſo deſtroyed himſelf and the reſt (V); which

(V) This was the end of the unfortunate Sardanapalus; but the circumſtances are moſt prodigiouſly exaggerated by Athenæus, who ſeems (77) to borrow what he ſays from Cteſias, whom Diodorus, perhaps, abridged, and Athenæus tranſcribed at length. He ſays, he within his palace erected a pile of four Jugera, or acres, in dimenſion, that thereon he laid 150 golden beds, and as many golden tables; that in the midſt of it he built a hall or room of 100 foot, in which he had beds for his wife and himſelf, and others for his concubines; that it was all a ſolid piece of timber-work, and that it was ſo fenced about with huge timbers that no-body could get out; that within this were no leſs than a thouſand myriads of talents of gold and ten thouſand myriads of ſilver, together with riches of apparel, and furniture unſpeakable: that he ordered this pile to be ſet on fire, and that it burned no leſs than fifteen days together; that by the ſmoak thoſe without thought he had been ſacrificing, and that, during the time, the whole was a ſecret to every body but his eunuchs. Suidas (78) ſeems to intimate, that he was accidentally burnt in his palace. Amyntas (79) relates, there was a great mount in Niniveh raiſed, as tradition went, as a ſepulchral monument to Sardanapalus; the ſame we may ſafely ſuppoſe that is ſaid to have been erected by Semiramis in honour of Ninus (80), and that on ſtone pillars the following epitaph was engraved in Chaldee characters; (why not Aſſyrian?) which were thus rendered into Greek by Chœrilus the poet (81), ΕΓΩ ΔΕ ΕΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣΑ, ΚΑΙ ΑΧΡΙ ΕΩΡΩΝ ΤΟΥ ΗΛΙΩΥ ΦΩΣ, ΕΠΙΟΝ, ΕΦΑΓΟΝ, ΗΦΡΟΔΙΣΙΑΣΑ, ΕΙΔΩΣ ΤΟΝ ΤΕ ΧΡΟΝΟΝ ΟΝΤΑ ΒΡΑΧΥΝ, ΟΝ ΖΩΣΙΝ ΟΙ ΑΝΘΡΩΠΟΙ, ΚΑΙ ΠΟΛΛΑΣ ΕΧΟΝΤΑ ΜΕΤΑΒΟΛΑΣ, ΚΑΙ ΚΑΚΟΠΑΘΙΑΣ, ΚΑΙ ΩΝ ΑΝ ΚΑΤΑΛΙΠΩ ΑΓΑΘΩΝ, ΑΛΛΟΙ ΕΞΟΥΣΙ ΤΑΣ

the rebels hearing, entered the city by the breach, and became lords of the place. The inhabitants were treated with great humanity, though the great and mighty city of Niniveh itself was laid level with the ground. And thus ended

ΑΠΟΛΑΥΣΕΙΣ, ΔΙΟ ΚΑΤΩ ΗΜΕΡΑΝ ΟΥΔΕΜΙΑΝ ΠΑΡΕΛΙΠΟΝ ΤΟΥΤΟ ΠΟΙΩΝ. I reigned, and while I enjoyed the light of the sun, I drank, I ate, and gave myself up to women, knowing how short a time man has to live, how full of cares and trouble; and that the joys I leave behind pass on to others; knowing of this I never missed a day from pleasure. This inscription or epitaph, if any such there ever was, is very likely to have been the parent of the second, we have given some notes above, and may be confounded with the same, which is also said to have been erected at Niniveh (82); but we may fairly suppose, there never was any such as either of them erected at that city: For this ancient city was confessedly destroyed, whatever place else may have risen, and been known under the same name afterwards; and secondly, Sardanapalus having been reduced to ashes, we can suppose no monument to have been raised professedly over him; nor would any remembrance of this sort have been, it is likely, propagated of him at an immense expence on the spot where Niniveh was to stand no more; and besides, this mount, or whatever else it may be called, is not only said to have been erected in honour of a former king, at least some generations before him (83), but also to have been destroyed by Cyrus (84), who, so far as we apprehend, had never any thing to do in the demolition of Niniveh. This may be enough to create a disbelief in us of so extraordinary and unusual a method to spread the shame of this dubious prince; dubious we say, the rather because we find him deified in the temple of Hierapolis in Syria (85), which it is not likely he should have been, if he had been so much the object of contempt, as he is represented to have been. Perhaps his whole crime was, that the Assyrian empire was dissolved in his time; and this we say not without ground; for we are given to understand, that though he was despoiled of the empire of Syria, or Assyria, he died of a good old age (86). From these very different accounts of the death of this famous, or, as the vulgar opinion has it, infamous, prince it may be, that we have another reason why it should be mistakenly imagined, there were two kings of Assyria of this same name (87). Suidas (88) talks of a Sar-

SECT. V.

The History of ASSYRIA, according to Scripture, and the more approved Authorities.

WE now come to the true and only history of Assyria that may be depended upon. Pul (W), the seeming founder of this monarchy, makes his first appearance Year of the Flood, 2228. Year before Christ, 771.

Sardanapalus slain by one Perseus; he has two of the name; and though he endeavours to make them different men, he plainly means the same. To conclude, whatever the bulk of prophane authors tell us, concerning the reign of Sardanapalus, and the rest of the Assyrian history, is too gross to be called romance, nor deserving to be called even tradition, though certainly built upon very true history, as we shall endeavour to prove in what is to follow.

(W) He is also called Phul, and mistakenly by the LXX Phua, an inaccuracy in the transcription, and owing to the very near resemblance of the Greek Λ lambda, and A alpha, so that it is no great wonder, this name should, in the Greek character, have been written ΦΟΥΑ Phua, instead of ΦΟΥΛ Phul (89). He is the first king of Assyria mentioned in scripture, from the time that land was planted by Ashur, and not to be confounded with the kings of the Medes and the Babylonians, as the custom usually is (90). This Phul was by his name a pure Assyrian, and not a Chaldean or Babylonian (91), as he is mistaken to have been by some (92), who would have him to have been the Belesis of Ctesias, who, in conjunction with Arbaces, overthrew the Assyrian power, than which no position can be more gross. That he was the first king of Assyria appears by his name, which is simple and not compounded, as the rest we read of are. The Assyrian names are for the most part compounded of the simple names of their gods (93); and the name of this king we find a primitive, as we may call it, compounded in the names of other princes in these parts, as in Tiglath-Pul-Assur, Nebo-Pul-Assur, and the like.

like. From this circumſtance and the affinity of the name itſelf, he is, with ſeeming certainty, ſaid to have been the Aſſyrian, Syrian, or Tyrian Belus (94). Pul is pronounced Pol and Pal (95), whence, without any ſtraining of the point, we may derive the Bal, Bel, or Belus of the Greeks and Latins. That he ſhould have been the Belus of Syria, Phœnicia, and other places, will not be wondered at by thoſe who conſider, as will be ſeen in the courſe of this ſection, that the Aſſyrians impoſed their own idolatry and religion on all the nations they conquered, as alſo that they conſecrated all their kings (96) into deities. It was the cuſtom of the ancient Syrians, long before them, to deify their kings (97); we have ſeen their Adad, king of Gods, was no more than their dead king Ben-hadad II. (98), or perhaps his fortunate ſucceſſor Hazael, who, as a king of Syria, was alſo called Adad, or Hadad (99). We have already aſſerted (100), that Adad, and Cronus, and Aſtarte, are of late date in compariſon of what the learned have generally thought, and we now ſay the ſame of Belus, who was no other than the Pul before us, and conſequently later than the antient gods of the proper Syria. Thus it is natural to conclude from all circumſtances, nor can we but ſubſcribe to it, without rejecting the plain evidence of ſcripture, for the idle tales of profane authors, who confound, rather than inform, us. It were odd, that we ſhould rely on what are confeſſedly fables, in contempt of what can be ſo ſelf-evidently gathered from the text of ſcripture hiſtory (1). To dwell on the various opinions of chronologers and hiſtorians concerning this man, would draw us into a tedious length; we ſhall therefore paſs them over with this bare obſervation, that by embracing the Cteſian fable, and endeavouring to connect it with the hiſtory of ſcripture, and by their ſcrupulous adoption of each others hypotheſes, they have almoſt almoſt all run into moſt intricate mazes, and endleſs errors. Our buſineſs then is, to prove this man to have been the firſt founder of the Aſſyrian monarchy, which having been done to our hands by a late chronologer (2), we ſhall have nothing to do but to borrow borrow his arguments. To the numerous arguments we have already exhibited to evince, that there never was what might be called an Assyrian monarchy before the days of Pul, it may be added, 1. Jonah prophesied when Israel was in affliction under the king of Syria · · · about 60 years before the reign of Pul (3). 2. Niniveh, though then a city of large extent, was full of pastures for cattle, so that it contained but about 120000 persons (4). [These are taken to have been children, because it is said, they could not discern between their right hand and their left (5); but why this should not be as well understood of their blindness and ignorance in a religious sense, we know not; so that it is as likely as not, that the grown persons were also included in the number]. 3. Niniveh was not yet grown so potent as not to be terrified at the preaching of Jonah, and to fear being invaded by its neighbours, and ruined within 40 days (6). Its king was not yet called king of Assyria, but king of Niniveh, [Jonah iii. 6, 7.] and his proclamation for a fast was not published in several nations, nor in all Assyria, but only in Niniveh, and perhaps in the villages thereof (7). But when Niniveh · · · · was exalted over all Assyria, properly so called, and this kingdom began to make war upon the neighbouring nations, its kings were no longer called kings of Niniveh, but began to be called kings of Assyria (8). Our author then observes, that Amos, who prophesied soon after Jeroboam had subdued the kingdoms of Damascus and Hamath, about 10 or 20 years before the reign of Pul, never once names the Assyrians, though he foretold, [vi. 13, 14.] that Israel should be afflicted from the entering in of Hamath to the river of the wilderness; meaning of the Assyrians, whose monarchy, growing up afterwards, is upon all occasions named in the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, and Zechariah, which were penned after his (9). These and other arguments of the kind, equally demonstrative, he uses to prove what is here asserted; but these shall serve our purpose; and in all this he is supported by the concurrence of several eminent chronologers and historians, we have had occasion to mention elsewhere (10).

Our

Hereupon he seems to have taken the kingdom of Israel into his protection (X), and returns from out of the land [w]. What else this king did in particular is no where, that we know of, expressly recorded (Y). But from hence we may venture to infer, as we have already [x], that he either conquered or received voluntary homage from, Syria, and the other nations in his march, as he did now from Israel, and that he became supreme over a very great empire.

Tiglath-pilesar.

Tiglath-pilesar succeeded him (Z); and is supposed to have

[w] 2 Kings xv. [x] See Vol. ii. in the notes, p. 323.

Our author (11) concludes Pul to have been the first Assyrian that was a conqueror, that he was the first that advanced that kingdom on this side of the Tigris, that he was a great warrior, that he may have founded or inlarged the city of Babylon and built the old palace, that he may have left that city and the province of Chaldæa to a younger son, who may have been Nabonassar, and that the famed Semiramis may have been his daughter-in-law, and the wife of the same Nabonassar (12); but these points being such as will more naturally fall under consideration in the history of Babylon, we desist from further notice of them for the present.

(X) Here we may perceive the first progress of this monarchy. It was now in its infancy, and was rather to inject a fear of its self into the nations, by barely shewing itself, than by a violent irruption at once upon every body, or at first pretending to overrun the world by dint of force. How much more natural is this, than what we read of the sort concerning the pretended Ninus? Pul seems rather to have laid the foundations of the Assyrian monarchy, than to have erected it; that he seems to have left to his successors.

(Y) Some Jews think, he began to transport the children of Israel; but this they believe upon a very slight foundation (13).

(Z) He is also called Tiglath-pilnesar, Theglath-phalasar, Theglath-phellasor, Thilgamas (14), as supposed, and also Ninus junior, according to Castor (15). Prideaux (16), by an unaccountable inadvertency, takes him for Arbaces the Mede. Some (17) are willing to derive the first part of his name from Diglito, have been his ſon, but upon no certain authority (A). Upon what particular motive, we know not, he fell upon the kingdom of Iſrael, and took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maachah, Diglito, one way of pronouncing a name belonging to the river Tigris (18); others (19) declare, that nothing but conjecture can be offered about it, and that it is quite uncertain.

(A) Some are ſo far from thinking him to have been the ſon of Pul, that they make him a ſtranger to his line, a Mede, as we have ſeen in the note above. Rollin, miſled by that great and otherwiſe learned guide archbiſhop Uſher (20), makes Pul to have been the father of Sardanapalus (21), by an extraordinary inattention in the archbiſhop, who thought it muſt have been ſo, becauſe in the name Sardanapalus, or Sardan-Pul, he could perceive a relation between this laſt and this firſt Aſſyrian king, forgetting, that for the ſame reaſon Tiglath-pul-aſſur might have more naturally appeared his ſon, eſpecially as he is the king of Aſſyria, who is expreſly ſaid to have ſucceeded him in ſcripture. By what biaſſed him above to make this miſtake, he might alſo, and very naturally, have concluded, that Tiglath-pul-aſſur and Sardan-pul were one and the ſame perſon, and ſo have put an end to the monarchy, ere it had well a beginning. The firſt and ſecond monarchy, according to the ſcheme of archbiſhop Uſher (22), adopted by Prideaux and Rollin, ſo entirely repugnant to all hiſtory, ſacred or prophane, may ſerve to ſhew how irreconcileable the latter is with the former in what concerns this empire. A late commentator (23) is ſo ſenſible of this, that he declares, when he comes to the text of ſcripture (24) which firſt makes mention of Tiglath-pileſar, that if the common accounts of the Babylonians and Medes are true, of their having held the eaſt under ſubjection one after another, there can be no knowing the meaning of the words, adding, that the learned are now ſenſible, there were ſeveral ſorts of independent kingdoms in thoſe days to the eaſtward of the Euphrates, [ſee vol. ii. p. 308.] and that ſometimes one of them was uppermoſt, and ſometimes another; that at this time it happened, that the Aſſyrians were moſt powerful; who, now croſſing the Tigris, had carried their arms through Meſopotamia, and from thence over the Euphrates into Syria and Paleſtine (25). In a word, we cannot but reckon this king to have been the ſon of Pul. From the time of Pul's appearance to the firſt of this king's appearance, is a ſpace, according maachah, and Jonah, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, and all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria [y], thereby, as we may suppose, the better to secure these distant parts of the empire in their allegiance (B). For such a captivation must naturally have weakened them, and was rightly calculated to deter the remainder from incurring so hard a fate; and, on the other hand, may have contributed to the increase of his power, by peopling some tract more immediately under his eye. But whatever may have been his views at this time, he thought himself obliged to do much more of the kind soon after. For receiving an embassy from Ahaz, king of Judah [z], with a tender from him of homage, and a present of all he had, to deliver him from the hands of Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Israel, who were joined in confederacy against him; upon this prayer, and present, and acknowledgment from the king of Judah, Tiglath-pileser marched against Damascus, took that city, transplanted the people of it to Kir (C), slew Rezin, and

ing to Usher himself (26,) of but about 24 years; so that they very naturally succeeded one another. It is therefore an eye-sore to see them so disjoined as they are in Rollin (27), from whose judgment and conversance with the labours and improvements of the later writers, we might have hoped for better things; but as we have been hitherto cautious of passing any censure upon him, we shall for the future avoid the same, as he is a gentleman who does not so professedly write to instruct the mind, as to the reality and consistence of facts, as to form it to virtue and a good life.

(B) Tiglath-pileser here executes what his father had projected, and only sketched out. This was the most extraordinary method that could be possibly taken to secure the empire under due subjection, and was the constant practice of his successors we may suppose for the same reasons. This their constant practice is in all its circumstances so affecting, and must have caused such utter oblivion of the original nations in those parts, that if Ctesias had known any thing perfectly of the Assyrian affairs, he could never have omitted it, or forborn to have improved it after his manner, which we no where find that he did.

(C) There are printed copies of the Septuagint, which say not whither the people of Damascus were transplanted to; others have it, that the place was Κυρήνη, or Cyrene, in Africa, deceived

HE was ſucceeded by Shalmaneſer (E), who ſeems to have made war upon Hoſhea, king of Iſrael, in conſequence of his predeceſſor's engagements to Ahaz, king of Judah (F). Shalmaneſer.

Tiglath-pileſar had but half fulfilled his promiſe to Ahaz, who had beſought him to avenge him of the king of Damaſcus and the king of Iſrael equally, whereas he ſeemingly concerned himſelf with the king of Damaſcus only. It is likely then, that Shalmaneſer made this a pretence to attack the kingdom of Iſrael under Hoſhea. But whatever his pretence may have been, or on whatſoever it may have been founded, he reduced Samaria, and made Hoſhea his tributary [b], as it is apparent his predeceſſors, from Menahem, had Year of the Flood, 2271. ceived by ſome ſimilitude of the names; but it is impoſſible to ſuppoſe, the king of Aſſyria could ſend them into thoſe parts when he was not yet maſter even of Egypt (28). Joſephus (29) makes it a place in the Upper Media. Bochart (30) labours the point a little, but to no fixed purpoſe. It will be in vain for us to think of ſettling the ſite of this, and many other places hereafter to be mentioned, equally and more obſcure than this; ſo that we ſhall touch on them only by the way.

(D) So that the race of the antient Syrians became, as it were, extinct in this country, which gives room to aſſert what we have only ſurmiſed formerly concerning the alteration the old religion of this country muſt have undergone when conquered by the Aſſyrians (31). How is it to be imagined, that the ſtrangers, who were brought to take poſſeſſion of this country, ſhould continue the antient rites and ſuperſtitions of its firſt inhabitants? Well may we ſay then, that Adad now gave way to Belus and other Aſſyrian gods (32), unknown on this ſide of the Euphrates till now.

(E) His name alſo is variouſly written, as Salmaneſar, Salmanaſſar; he is called Enemaſſar, by Tobit (33), and is ſuppoſed (34) to be Salman, or Shalman, of Hoſea (35). It has been the common practice of chronologers to make him to have been the ſame with Nabonaſſar (36); which we ſhall not here diſcuſs.

(F) We here ſpeak only as the thing may ſeem; for between Tiglath-pileſar's laſt expedition in theſe parts and this of Shalmaneſer, there is a diſtance of twelve years; ſo that the engagements to Ahaz may by this time have been as good as forgot.

had been to the Aſſyrian power before him. Some years afterwards Shalmaneſer came to underſtand, that Hoſhea, having a mind to ſhake off his yoke, had entered into a league with So, king of Egypt; and this was confirmed to him by Hoſhea's neglect to ſend him his annual tribute. At this he marches up throughout all the land, and at length lays ſiege to Samaria, with ſuch obſtinacy, that he continued it for the ſpace of three years, reſolved, once for all, to make an end of the kingdom of that metropolis. At the end of three years he became maſter of the place, took the king Hoſhea alive (G), kept him a priſoner †, made captives of all the inhabitants, and tranſplanted them into Aſſyria (H), placing them in Halah and in Habor, by the river of Gozan (I), and in the cities of the Medes; replacing them by ſtrangers from Babylon (K), Cuthah, Ava,

(G) In the firſt of theſe expeditions he carried off with him the Golden Calf, which Jeroboam had ſet up in Bethel (37); and, previouſly to the ſiege of Samaria, he ſubdued Moab (38).

(H) He did not quite tranſplant them, he left ſome behind him for Eſar-haddon to remove, as will be ſeen in due place.

(I) There is a town called Chabor, or Habor, in Ptolemy (39), in Meſopotamia; and a river Chaboras, or Haboras; and a region, in the ſame country, called Gauzonitis, or Gozan, between two rivers, the former and another called Saocoras, one of which may have been alſo called the river of Gozan (40); ſo that in Meſopotamia it muſt be, that we muſt look for theſe two places; as for Halah, we have declared what we know of that long ago (41).

(K) Thoſe who follow the common current are at a loſs to conceive, how Shalmaneſer ſhould be ſo free with the Babylonians; ſuppoſing them to have been not only a collateral, but alſo an independent kingdom, when nothing is more unlikely. Can it with reaſon be imagined, the kings of Aſſyria, as Shalmaneſer and his two predeceſſors would have roamed ſo far from home after conqueſts, when ſuch prey as Babylon was ſo near at hand? Is it not natural to think, the Aſſyrians began with thoſe who were next to them? Or is it poſſible to imagine, the kings of Aſſyria would ſtraggle ſo far from home, if they had ſo dangerous a rival as a conſiderable kingdom of Babylon on their ſkirts, who, never, it is certain, could have been quiet or eaſy in their abſence

Ava, Hamath, and Sephervaim; and thus did he put an end to the kingdom of Israel [c]. But he was obliged to send back one of the priests of the country to instruct the people in the worship of the God of the land, who, for their ignorance in that particular, plagued them so sorely with lyons, that they were necessitated to apply to the king of Assyria for this redress [d] (L).

BUT how effectually soever he triumphed over Samaria and others in the neighbourhood, he had the mortification to be set at defiance by Hezekiah, king of Jerusalem, who, sence? It must be impossible to think after this rate; a greater inconsistency can never be. The monarchy of Assyria was now in the vigor of its youth, and the passage before us plainly informs us, that Babylon was now under Assyria, and so were the Medes, as may not only appear by the western nations, said to have been transplanted to the cities of that country by these three first kings; but the same will most evidently appear in the next reign, when the Medes, taking advantage of this king's successor, actually revolted from him, and from thence-forward began to make the figure they afterwards did. Nothing of equal antiquity and importance is clearer, than what concerns these three monarchies or empires, if we do not saddle divine writ with prophane romance; which has been so unaccountably preferred by the learned Christians, that in favour of that they have obscured what would otherwise appear as bright as day in the sacred historians.

(L) This transplantation, this complaint of the lyons, and this mission of the priest, is put off to the days of Esar-haddon (42); because in Ptolemy's canon they find, that he sat in the throne of Babylon as well as of Niniveh, and consequently was the only Assyrian king of the second race, as they fondly dream, who could send people to Babylon to inhabit the land of Israel; but this is sufficiently answered in the note above. Nothing is more plainly a part of Shalmaneser's history, than all that is here said, and no greater violence can be offered to the text, than to remove it hence, into the midst of a reign which was third after this. All these needless shifts, these turnings, and windings, we owe to the tenacious cruelty of some great, though mistaken, men, who have turned their thoughts towards the illustration of these very evident matters.

as it is said, rebelled against him, and would send him no tribute (M). But Samaria and its territory did not alone feel the effects of his power, he also lorded it over all Syria and Phœnice; and made war upon Tyre, where Elulæus then reigned [e]. He at first made war upon the whole country of Phœnice, but upon the conclusion of a peace marched out of the country. Shortly after the cities of Sidon, Arce, Palæ-Tyrus, and others, revolting from the Tyrians, went over to Shalmaneser, who, disdaining the Tyrians (N) should dare to dispute his supremity, dispatched a fleet of 60 sail, and 800 rowers, under the conduct of Phœnicians, to attack the Tyrians, but they were shamefully routed by a small number of Tyrian ships [f], and the project most completely miscarried. Shalmaneser therefore, convinced it was to no purpose to contend with the Tyrians at sea, blocks them up by land; and, by diverting their waters which supplied the city, doubted not but to reduce this haughty people; who supplying themselves by wells they dug within the city, the Assyrians wasted five years in this fruitless attempt [g] (O).

(M) This monarchy, or the strength of it at least, was not yet sufficiently known, it should seem; it was not yet arrived at its summit; it had still difficulties to struggle with; it was not seemingly so strong as not to be set at defiance, and contemned; so it should seem by this. Prideaux (43) thinks, he was diverted from resenting this by his war with the Tyrians.

(N) The Tyrians had as yet never known any thing of an Assyrian yoke, and now defied this new monarchy, trusting in their own strength and riches; though it is somewhat difficult to conceive, that they were not in some shape or other tributary to the Assyrian, who must have had it very much in his power to hurt their trade at land, if he could not affect them by sea. Their situation (44) may have protected their persons from immediate slavery; but it is not to be thought, their purses were as free from expilation and loss: in a word, they could not have traded almost any where in the inland places of this part of the continent without the king of Assyria's leave, and must have been quite cut off from any of the benefits and conveniences of the rivers, if they had not been upon some sort of terms with him: so that this seems to be a very obscure piece of history.

SENNACHERIB (P) succeeded Shalmaneser, and resolved to reduce the kingdom of Judah to the homage and tribute it had professed to the Assyrian throne, in the person of king Ahaz [h]. He appears then at the head of an army, and bore down all before him [i]. At length he laid siege to Lachish, intending in the next place to invest Jerusalem itself. As he was laying siege to this place, he received a most submissive message from Hezekiah, asking his pardon, begging, he would not pursue him to destruction, and offering to pay him what tribute he should think fit to impose on him. Sennacherib seemed satisfied with this, and ordered Hezekiah immediately to send him 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold, as if that would pacify him for the present, and stop his further intentions. This sum, it seems, was with great difficulty sent to him [k]; but, instead of granting the king of Judah the truce and the rest he expected, he behaved towards him as if nothing of the kind had been transacted, and apparently broke his word with Hezekiah, seemingly with no manner of cause [l]; and, instead of withdrawing with his forces, sent three of his officers, Tartan, Rabsaris (Q), and Rabshakeh (R), at the head of a great army, to invest Jerusalem, insult Hezekiah, intimidate his people, and, in a word, to blaspheme against God. Rabshakeh was the spokesman, as we say, and vented himself to the officers Hezekiah had sent out to treat with them [m], and to know what further was expected from him, he vaunted his master's mighty power, stiling him the great king of Assyria, set at nought Hezekiah, and spoke contemptuously of the king of Egypt (S), in whom he supposes Hezekiah to have placed a confidence, as if he could save him from the Assyrian arm; and to crown all, pretended, speaking in his master's name, as he all along does, that God had sent him on purpose to destroy the city and the land. This he uttered with great violence in the Hebrew tongue, that all might hear and understand him; and being by the Jewish commissioners entreated to be more moderate, and to deliver himself in the Syriac tongue, which they well understood [n], that he might not dishearten their people on the walls of the city; he, far from complying, raised his voice higher than before, and, in the Jewish tongue, particularly addressed himself to the inhabitants of the city, who were beholding the interview; told them, their king Hezekiah would obstinately deceive them to their destruction, and that it was in vain he trusted in the Lord: He then exhorted them to submit, promising them the free and full enjoyment of their present possessions, until there should be a convenient opportunity to transplant them to a country every way equal, if not superior, to their own. He then again admonished them, not to let their king deceive them with false hopes of deliverance from the hand of the Lord; observing, that that as the gods of the nations they had already conquered, the gods of Hamath and of Arphad, the gods of Sepharvaim,

(S) It is thought, this was done more out of mere rage than any thing else, Sennacherib disdaining to have been disappointed and baffled in his attempts upon Egypt, according to the story we have of it in Herodotus (48); but however plausible this may seem (49) at first sight, it is seemingly contradictory to the text, which supposes him, if we are right, to be busied, in the siege of Lachish. He had not made his attempt upon Egypt yet. We think, we have a more natural account to give of the contempt here expressed against the Egyptian, for Sethon was then king of Egypt, who being recorded to have been a priest, and to have minded nothing but the functions of that office, and to have hated all military men (50), it can be no wonder, Sennacherib, or his servant for him, should ridicule and despise the then king of Egypt.

vaim, Henah, and Ivah, (T), had not been able to withstand the Assyrian power, or to save Samaria from captivity, so neither should theirs. This he aggravated still farther; but all his oratory procured him no answer, and so he returned to his master, who had left Lachish and was now at Libnah, which he was besieging. Here as he lay he had advice, that Tirhakah (V), king of Ethiopia, intended to give him battle, at which, taking the alarm, he seems to have marched towards Egypt (W) to meet him, and

(T) Sir Isaac Newton (51) uses this boast concerning the nations and their gods, as an argument for the novelty of the Assyrian monarchy in these days, observing, that this desolation is recited as fresh in memory, and to terrify the Jews (42). "All "the above cited nations had, till now, their several gods, and "each accounted his god the god of his own land, and the de-"fender thereof, against the gods of the neighbouring countries, "and particularly the gods of Assyria; and therefore they were "never till now united under the Assyrian monarchy, especially "since the king of Assyria doth not boast of their being conquer-"ed by the Assyrians oftener than once: but these being small "kingdoms, the king of Assyria easily overflowed them:" Know ye not, saith Sennacherib to the Jews, [2 Chr. xxxii. 13, 15.] what I and my fathers have done unto all the people of other lands? . . . . for no god of any nation or kingdom was able to deliver his people out of mine hand and out of the hand of my fathers: howmuch less shall your god deliver you out of mine hand? "He and his fathers, therefore, "Pul, Tiglath-pileser, and Shalmaneser, were great conquerors, "and with a current of victories had newly overflowed all nations "round about Assyria, and thereby set up this monarchy (53)." This is a just remark, tending to prove what we have hitherto contended for, concerning the lateness of the Assyrian monarchy, in comparison of the common computation, and may account for what we have as good as asserted (54), That the religion of the Phœnicians and Syrians, as known to the Greeks, or even to themselves, to all appearance, was of Assyrian origin; which may not only be amply proved by the strange nations who were transplanted thither (55), but from this way of proving the god of the prevailing nation to be stronger than the gods of the vanquished, which, as fallacious an argument as it may seem to us (56), was in those days of idolatry and superstition sound and indisputable doctrine: So Belus or Pul, the Assyrian god, having proved himself too strong for Adad, the Syrian god, the former gives place to the latter of course; and Belus thenceforward became the god of the Syrians, instead of the unfortunate Adad (57).

(V) According to the course of the Egyptian history, this Tirhakah can have been no other than the Sabbaco (58) of Herodotus, who was an Ethiopian, a great warrior, and had some time before conquered Egypt, and held it 50 years (59): He retired from Egypt at the expiration of that term (60), and returned into Ethiopia, and by that means Sethon the priest of Vulcan, as he is called (61), came to be king of Egypt. Sethon being more strictly a priest than a king of Egypt, Tirhakah, or Sabbaco, the great Ethiopian, conscious, Sethon could not pretend to make head against so formidable a conqueror as Sennacherib, and perceiving Egypt to be in imminent danger of subjection, puts himself at the head of his army to protect Egypt, and at the same time secure his own country Ethiopia. Sabbacco, though an Ethiopian, must have had a great concern on him for the liberties of Egypt, not only as it was his barrier and next neighbour, but also as he had resided so long in it as lord or king. He may have been still alive, though he must have been a man in years, for he did not die in the throne of Egypt, but left it of his own accord (62). We do not pretend to give this for certainty, but it has such an air of probability, or at least corresponds so nicely with what we read of the history of Egypt in scripture, that we fancy, the reader may be tempted to think this transaction may have been as we have here suggested, if he would give himself the trouble of comparing what we here say therewith.

(W) The history of this his war in these parts is very cloudy; we only know in general, that he took several cities belonging to the king of Judah, and perhaps some others; that he besieged Lachish; sent to insult Jerusalem and its king, after he had accepted his tribute and homage in seeming good part; that he was under some apprehensions about Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia; and finally, that the gross of his army was miraculously destroyed. But Prideaux (63), supported by nothing besides a supposition that he was the Sargon of Isaiah (64), writes, that he conquered Egypt, miserably wasted it for three years together, and carried away multitudes into captivity; as also that he took Ashdod, or Azotus, (65) by his general Tartan. Sargon was

and to have ſent Rabſhakeh back again to Jeruſalem, to block up that city, and to prevent Hezekiah from joining his friends againſt him. Rabſhakeh returned to his poſt before Jeruſalem, and would have inſulted Hezekiah in perſon, as ſhould ſeem, but not being able to do that, he ſent him a letter as from Sennacherib, fraught with the ſame words almoſt he had uſed before in his boaſting and vain ſpeech to the Jewiſh commiſſioners, adding to the nations he formerly mentioned to have been conquered by Aſſyria, Rezeph, and the children of Eden which were in Thelaſar [o] (X). was not Sennacherib, but his ſon Eſar-haddon; and if it be anſwered he muſt have been the former, becauſe his general's name was Tartan, we ſay Tartan was general to both of them. Nor was, as he ſays, Sevechus, the ſon of Sabbaco the Ethiopian, at that time king of Egypt; nor were, it is likely, Sevechus and Sabbaco two perſons, the father and ſon; they are one and the ſame name, with a very trifle of variation. Herodotus has no ſuch king as this Sevechus, nor Diodorus: This is ſufficient to juſtify us in what we ſay; nor was Sevechus, or Sethon, whom Prideaux (67) ſuppoſes to have been the ſame, the ſon of the Ethiopian Sabbaco, as may appear by Herodotus, who calls him prieſt of Vulcan, and plainly inſinuates, that he was an Egyptian, and a ſtranger to Sabbaco's line, and one who was choſen to ſucceed after ſome ſeemingly great diſturbance in the ſtate (68). Beſides, it might be aſked, where the dreadful Tirhakah can have been, during the three long years Sennacherib muſt have ravaged and lorded it over Egypt; or what he was about all that time, that he ſhould not come to the relief of the country till it had been, as it were, undone? In ſhort, nothing is plainer, than that Sennacherib not only did not conquer Egypt, but even ſuffered ſome notable loſs or repulſe in ſo much as offering to invade that land; in which attempt he muſt have erred againſt the rules of common prudence and policy, conſidering that Syria and Paleſtine, which ſhould have been his firſt work, were not as yet fully ſubdued.

(X) The moſt probable opinion is, that theſe places were ſomewhere in Syria. There is a city called Reſiph in Meſopotamia, near the mouth of the river Saacoras (69); and a city called Reſaph in the Palmyrene of Syria: which of theſe may have been Rezeph we decide not; the other cities are not ſo eaſy to be found.

ſage had drawn on him the fearful prophecy of Iſaiah, That he ſhould fall by the ſword in his own land *; and for this ſecond it was denounced againſt him by the ſame prophet, That he ſhould not come into the city, nor ſhoot an arrow there, nor come before it with a ſhield, nor caſt a bank about it †: The meaning of which ſeems to be, that he was gone, whence he ſhould return ſo diſabled, that he ſhould neither be able to beſiege the city in form, or barely aſſault it. This is ſeemingly the import of the text, and if Herodotus may be introduced upon this occaſion, who makes expreſs mention of his name, though he miſtakenly calls him king of Arabia (Y) inſtead of Aſſyria, he will tell us, that, as Sennacherib lay before Peluſium, there one night come ſuch ſwarms of field-rats and mice into the Aſſyrian camp, as deſtroyed all their ſhield-ſtraps and bow-ſtrings [P]. What truth ſoever there may be (Y*) in this, it muſt be ſaid very nicely to correſpond with the prophecy above. But to wave this, it appears, that he was very unfortunate (Y†) in this expedition, and his ſun from henceforwards ſets apace. His army is ſaid to have been ſmitten by the angel of the Lord (Z), who ſmote 185,000 Aſſyrians,

(Y) This may not originally have been the fault of Herodotus himſelf; it may have been owing to tranſcribers.

(Y)* True it certainly is not; biſhop Patrick (70), with ſome ſeeming paſſion, calls it a horrible lye; but as much a lye as it may be, it may be ſaid to confirm what is written in ſcripture concerning the ſudden deſtruction of the Aſſyrian army, and therefore may be borne with. The Egyptians aſcribe the honour of it to their God (71), than which there is nothing more natural.

(Y†) Herodotus declares as much (72), and ſo does Joſephus (73).

(Z) This a figurative expreſſion common with the Jews. Some ſuppoſe this havock to have been made "by a plague, or perhaps by lightning, or a fiery wind, which blows ſometimes in the neighbouring deſarts, or rather by being ſurprized by Sethon and Tirhakah; for the Egyptians, in memory of this action, erected a ſtatue to Sethon, holding in his hand a mouſe, the Egyptian ſymbol of deſtruction" (74).

In ſhort he behaved in ſuch a manner, that he was grown odious in the eyes of his own ſons, two of whom, Adrammelech and Sharazer (C), ſlew him, as he was at his devotions in the temple of his god Niſroch, in a ſhort time after his precipitate return from Judæa. (A) Where his camp was at this time is no very clear matter; whether at Libnah, or Peluſium, or Jeruſalem. It is alſo uncertain, whether his army was all together at this time, or divided, part under himſelf elſewhere, and part under Rabſhakeh before Jeruſalem (75), as we have ſuppoſed; and conſequently, whether it was the army under himſelf, or that under Rabſhakeh, that was thus ſwept away, or whether they both ſuffered. After what we have already ſaid, we leave the reader to ſatisfy himſelf about this obſcurity.

(B) Returning ſo baffled, with ſuch ſhame and diſhonour, his people could not but think meanly of him, in compariſon of his predeceſſors; though Shalmaneſer, his father, does not ſeem to have been very fortunate in the latter part of his life. We have ſeen him ſhamefully beaten by the Tyrians in a ſea fight, and his army five years before their city without any effect.

(C) It is ſuppoſed, he had, in the midſt of his danger, threatened to ſacrifice them to his god, and that they took this opportunity of ſacrificing him, that they might not be ſacrificed themſelves (76): what grounds there is for this we have not to ſay. We no where read, the Aſſyrians had any ſuch unnatural ſuperſtition in vogue with them; we may enquire into this when we come to treat of the Babylonian religion, which muſt at leaſt have included that of Aſſyria.

(D) If the ſuppoſition in the note above be true, they had reaſon to fly for their diſobedience and murder; but if not, we cannot perceive, but they might have juſtified themſelves with the people, who may not have been very ſorry for Sennacherib's death, Eſar-haddon. Year of the Flood, 2289. Year before Chriſt, 716.

Eſar-haddon (F) may be ſaid to have ſucceeded to the ruins, as it were, of the Aſſyrian monarchy founded by Pul, and enlarged and eſtabliſhed by Tiglath-pileſar. Under Sennacherib it fell to decay, either by his imprudence, or ill fortune, or a mixture of both. The Medes, taking advantage, it is likely, of his long and diſtant abſence, or, perhaps, upon the news of the ſudden and general deſtruction of his army, revolted [q], and were never, after, as ſhould ſeem, reduced to the Aſſyrian yoke, though Eſar-haddon, in the courſe of his reign, ſeems to have been both a valorous and fortunate prince, as well as ambitious of ſupporting and enlarging the empire. He was, to all appearance, a mild and a gracious perſonage, and particularly kind to the Jews, who had been ſo cruelly abuſed by his father after his haſty return to Niniveh. He, in the beginning of his reign, ſeems to have continued quiet in his capital, and perhaps had enough to do to ſupport his dignity at home; till, after ſome years, his kindred race of the Babyloniſh kings becoming extinct, or ſome other cauſe producing an inter-reign in that kingdom, he, either by art or violence, ſeated himſelf in the throne [r] of Babylon (G), thereby retrieving the luſtre of the Aſſyrian name, which had been ſo ſullied by the defection of the Medes.

(E) We have it from Joſephus (77), that Niſroch, or Araſcus, as he calls him (78), was his moſt eſteemed god. Concerning this deity, we have ſaid all we thought neceſſary in the former part of this hiſtory (79).

(F) He is alſo called Aſar-haddon, Aſordan by the Septuagint, Aſſaradin in Ptolemy's canon, Sarchedon by Tobit (80), Sargon by Iſaiah (81), and Aſnappar by Ezra *.

(G) It is very unlikely, that he obtained the immediate poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Babylon by violence; but this is what we may enquire into when we come to conſider him as king there.

GROWN potent by this union, he proceeds to establish his tottering power over the more distant parts of his empire, and marches into Syria, and against the remnant of Israel, and the kingdom of Judah. The remnant of Israel he transplanted, as he may have done by the remnant that may have been left of Syria, so that they now utterly ceased to be nations, and in their stead he introduced a supply of foreigners (H), according to the policy of his predecessors. Having thus quite expunged Israel and Syria from the list of nations, he proceeded to the reduction of the kingdom of Judah, to the state of dependance it had professed in the person of king Ahaz, and took Manasseh their king, and bound him in chains, and sent him captive to Babylon [s]. Year of the Flood, 2322. Year before Christ, 677.

ELATED by this flow of success, and nothing discouraged by the unfortunate attempt of his father, he continues his march, resolving to invade Egypt and Ethiopia (I). He did so, and subdued them, and transplanted them (K), and Year of the Flood, 2326. Year before Christ, 673.

(H) His being now called king of Babylon has been the cause, that commentators have postponed the transplantation of Israel, recorded in the reign of Shalmaneser, to his time; concerning which we have declared our mind already (82).

(I) Having, as we have seen, subdued all Syria and Palestine, in a more effectual manner than any of his predecessors ever had; he was the better qualified to invade Egypt and Ethiopia. Besides, Tirhakah, or Sabbaco, may have been now dead; for, according to the history of Egypt (83), he must, by this time, have been a very old man. He had nothing then to fear from that warlike prince, and very little from Sethon (84), who was now unsupported, and whose kingdom, as it is represented to us, seems to have been, at this time, in the most proper condition to be conquered.

(K) This subduction and captivation was foretold by Isaiah (85). In that day there shall be a high-way out of Egypt into Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve the Assyrians. In this war the city of Diospolis, No-ammon, or Thebes, which had till then flourished in great glory, is thought (86) to have been miserably and held them in subjection to him for three years [t], which may be as long as he afterwards lived. In the course of this war, he particularly took, by his general Tartan, the city miserably wasted, and led into captivity, according to the same prophet and another, the former adding (87) to what is above; So shall the king of Assyria lead away the Egyptians prisoners, and the Ethiopians captives, young and old, naked and barefoot . . . . to the shame of Egypt. And they [the Jews] shall be afraid and ashamed of Ethiopia their expectation, and of Egypt their glory: And the latter (88), prophesying the destruction of Niniveh, and speaking of the calamity of Egypt as a transaction of late date, saith, Art thou better than the populous No [Noammon], that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters rounnd about it, whose rampart was the sea, and her wall was from the sea (89)? All this can have been effected by no king of Assyria, Esar-haddon excepted, and we shall not need to prove this to the reader, who shall think it worth his while to turn back to the history of Egypt at this time. For though the Egyptians were too proud to acknowledge this conquest of them, yet their history, though silent about it, seems to confirm what is here said. For after Sethon, in the latter part of whose reign, or immediately upon whose death, this invasion must have happened, we find the kingdom to have been in some very violent disorder, and to have emerged under 12 men, who divided the whole kingdom between them, in a kind of aristocracy (90). How this alteration could have been wrought in the constitution of so regular and precise a kingdom as Egypt, but by some such means, and by this most likely, we leave to the reader.

(L) The extent of his dominions at this time, which must, one would think, have been more than that of any of his predecessors, is not a little uncertain; though Sir Isaac Newton, in a manner, ventures to describe it in these words, "In the reigns "of Sennacherib and Asserhaddon, the Assyrian empire seems "arrived at its greatness, being united under one monarch, and "containing Assyria, Media, Apolloniatis, Susiana, Chaldæa, "Mesopotamia, Cilicia, Syria, Phœnicia, Egypt, Ethiopia, and "part of Arabia, and reaching eastward into Elymais and Para-"tœcene, a province of the Medes; and if Chalach and Cha-of the Assyrian name far and near. After a reign of many years, glorious especially in the latter part of it, he died, and seemingly left a character behind him equal to the rank he had held while living; whence, and for other reasons (M), we cannot be induced to think he can be, in any respect, the Sardanapalus of Ctesias, there being no likeness or analogy at all between the representations of the two men.

" bor be Colchis and Iberia, as some think, and as may seem " probable from the circumcision used by those nations till the " days of Herodotus, we are also to add these two provinces, " with the two Armenias, Pontus, and Cappadocia, as far as the " river Halys; for Herodotus tells us, that the people of Cap- " padocia, as far as to that river, were called Syrians by the " Greeks, both before and after the days of Cyrus, and that the " Assyrians were also called Syrians by the Greeks " (91). Of all this extent there may be some doubt, whether or no the Medes were in subjection to him; they had thrown off the yoke in his father's time, who left the empire, as great as it may have been under him, in a crazy condition; though it is somewhat difficult to suppose, that Esar-haddon did not reduce them to their former obedience before he crossed the Euphrates, to confirm himself in Syria and Palestine: After all he may have reserved them for his last work, not fearing any damage from them in his absence, being perhaps possessed of some of the most important parts of their country, which he did not live long enough to regain throughout. This may be resumed in the reign of his grandson.

(M) He is styled the great and noble Asnappar (92). It is impossible, he should have been represented as a slothful and effeminate prince, whose life seems to have been a life of the most unwearied action. He may, it is possible, have been known to the ancient Greeks by the name of Sardanapalus, or Assar-haddon-Pul (93), but then he must have been the great one who is called a warrior (94), and is said to have built Tarsus and Anchiale in one day, and to have died peaceably in his bed (95). He may have been one of the princes called Sardanapalus; for we have seen they had two very different from one another, as we have noted in the story of the Sardanapalus of profane authors, in the section before this. The other we may discover hereafter.

Saosduchinus. Year of the Flood, 2331. Year before Christ 668.

HE was succeeded by his son Saosduchinus [x], or Saosducheus (N), concerning whom we have nothing particular, except that he reigned 20 years, that it was probably under him that Manasseh was restored to his kingdom (O), and that Egypt recovered her liberty (P); that he seems otherwise to have kept full possession of the empire his father left him, and that, dying, he was succeeded by his son Chyniladan.

Chyniladan. Year of the Flood, 2351. Year before Christ, 648.

CHYNILADAN is supposed, and upon good grounds, to be the Nabuchadonosor of scripture (Q), an active and a war-

[x] Ptolom. Can. Astron.

(N) Prideaux (96) reckons him to have been the Nebuchadonosor of the book of Judith; but that he is therein most egregiously mistaken, will be proved anon.

(O) Prideaux (97) supposes him not only to have been set at liberty by Esar-haddon himself, but also to have been invested, by the same monarch, with an addition to his own kingdom, to enable him to support himself against Psammetichus, who had now got the dominion of all Egypt into his hands, and began to war upon the Assyrians in Palestine (98); but he has most strangely disturbed the history of Assyria by that unaccountable mistake of writing Sargon the same with Sennacherib.

(P) It is not in nature to suppose it did, before the death of Esar-haddon, who, it is most certain, died by the time he had well subdued this kingdom.

(Q) That Chyniladan, and no other king in Ptolemy's canon, can have been the Nabuchadonosor of the book of Judith, is what we are now to endeavour to prove; in the doing of which we shall also settle some other points, and especially the three which are the subject of the three notes above, and which Prideaux has involved in great darkness. From the death of Assar-addin to the first year of the reign of Chyniladan is 20 years, and from the first year of the reign of Saosduchinus to the twelfth of Chyniladan, that he undertook to reduce the Medes, is 32 years. Manasseh, king of Judah, was taken into captivity by Assaraddin in the 21st year of his reign, after which he reigned 34 years. His son Amon reigned after him over Judah two years, which being added to the former number, make 36 years, when Josiah began to reign, who was but eight years old when he first came to the throne. Hence, by the canon, it may appear, that Chyniladan began his reign about the 41st year of Manasseh, and that warring against the Medes in his 12th year, according to the number a warlike prince, and particularly remarkable for his invaſion of the rebellious and now independent Medes, who had

ber in the vulgate, or St. Jerom's tranſlation, it happened in the 53d year of the ſaid Manaſſeh; Chyniladan reigned after this 10 years, or to the ſixth year of king Joſiah; for Manaſſeh reigned full 55 years, and his ſon Amon reigned barely two; ſo that Chyniladan may have died about the beginning of the reign of Joſiah. This king, as we have obſerved above, was but eight years old when he came to the throne, and in his reign it muſt have been, if ever, that Bethulia was beſieged by Holofernes for the king of Aſſyria; and here it ſeems to be moſt naturally placed by Sir Iſaac Newton (99). To ſuppoſe with Prideaux (100) that Holofernes invaded the Jews in the days of Manaſſeh, is contradicting, in good meaſure, himſelf; for it is expreſly ſaid, that the Jews were then lately returned from captivity (1), which can be meant of no other than the Aſſyrian captivity, when Manaſſeh was carried away to Babylon; and to ſuppoſe this war under Holofernes, to have been undertaken after the return of Manaſſeh to Jeruſalem, is undoing what the ſame hiſtorian mentions of the kindneſs of the kings of Aſſyria to the kings of Jeruſalem, and the perfect good underſtanding between them, till Joſiah was killed in the ſervice of his Aſſyrian ſovereign, as he miſtakenly writes (2). If he ſuppoſes the people returned from captivity without their king, and if they were attacked while he was in priſon; then muſt he alſo ſay, that Aſſar-haddon himſelf was the Nabuchadonoſor of the book of Judith, ſince he declares Manaſſeh to have been ſet at liberty by the ſaid Aſſar-haddon; but this he ſays not. If this tranſaction happened in the reign of Saoſduchinus, it muſt follow, either that Manaſſeh was not delivered out of priſon by Aſſar-haddon, but detained many years a priſoner at Babylon by Saoſduchinus, which he denies (3), or that there was not that great and conſtant harmony between the kings at Niniveh and their homagers at Jeruſalem, as he aſſerts (4), down to the day Joſiah was ſlain in battle by the Egyptian king Necho (5). Joſiah reigned 31 years, which being added to the interval between the firſt year of his reign and the year of his grandfather's captivity, which is 36, it will make 67 years. Now by Ptolemy's canon it appears, that Joſiah was ſlain in the fourth year of Nabocolaſſarus, or the great Nebuchadnazzar, the ſecond king of Babylon, and this was after Niniveh had been deſtroyed, and the old race of the proper kings of Aſſyria were no more. In ſum, it appears from all this, that Aſſar-haddon muſt have died much had formed themſelves into a ſeparate ſtate, as may be ſeen in the hiſtory of that nation. In order to ſubdue this warlike people, he ſummons, as it were, the whole force of his wide-ſpreading dominions, calling in "all that dwelt "in the hill country, and all that dwelt by Euphrates, and "Tigris, and Hydaſpes, and the plain of Arioch, the "king of the Elymæans, and very many nations of the "ſons of Chelod;" all theſe eaſterns rendezvouzed under his banner. much about the time Manaſſeh was carried to Babylon, or, at moſt, two or three years afterwards; for we cannot pretend to be quite exact, and that it is likely he had his liberty from Saoſduchinus rather than Aſſar-haddon, who could not have had the time either to think much of him or to ſettle with him; for it muſt have been ſomething extraordinary that procured him his freedom and kingdom again, when the kings of Iſrael and Syria ſhared ſo different a fate. Again, it muſt appear, that Aſſar-haddon died immediately after he left Egypt, and that his death inſpired the chiefs of that nation with courage to lift up their heads, and appoint the 12 kings (6); and finally, that Chyniladan, and no other, was the Nabuchadonoſor of the book of Judith.

(R) Herodotus confirms this very plainly, telling us, that the Aſſyrians, Thoſe I mean, ſays he (7), who lived at Niniveh, who had formerly been the chief of all, but were now deſerted by their friends or vaſſals, though nevertheleſs in a good ſtate to defend themſelves; againſt theſe, ſays he, did Phraortes the Mede make war. This Phraortes is the Arphaxad above, as we ſhall have occaſion to obſerve in the hiſtory of the Medes. Saoſduchinus, it appears, then had led a quiet and peaceable life for the ſpace of 20 years, the whole duration of his reign; and Chy-be wondered he should have persisted in his resolution to invade the Medes, who had defied some of the most potent of his predecessors; but having numbers sufficient, and relying on his own strength, he seems to have made as slight of their disobedience as they had of his orders; vowing in the most solemn manner to take ample vengeance on them, as soon as he had chastised the insolent and rebellious Medes *.

Wars with the Medes. Year of the Flood, 2363. Year before Christ, 636.

IN the twelfth year of his reign, then, he moved with his army against Arphaxad, king of the Medes, and joining battle with him in the great plain of Ragau, he overthrew him horse and chariot, put Arphaxad to flight, who made the best of his way to the mountains; got possession of all his cities, and Ecbatan, in particular, the capital of Media, a sumptuous city, newly erected, and decorated to be the seat of this new kingdom, and demolished it without mercy; and to crown all, he caught Arphaxad in the mountains of Ragau, where he thought to have sheltered himself, and coming there to skirmish with him and his followers, he shot Arphaxad so often with darts that he killed him, and put an end to his life, and, as it were, to his kingdom. Flushed beyond measure with this more than,

Chyniladan had done the same for the first 12 years of his, till finding the Medes had conquered the Persians, as Herodotus writes, and as appears in the text of Judith, which says, that the Persians of all the orientals refused to obey his summons; and that, not contented with that, they were going to attack Assyria also; hearing of this it roused him; perceiving himself and kingdom in such danger, he takes the alarm, and in haste sends to all the nations who had bowed to the Assyrian throne, to come in immediately to his aid. No two historical pieces can, so far as they are concerned together, more illustrate each other than Herodotus and this book of Judith. And here, by the way we may, in this distress of Nabuchadonosor, perceive some likeness of the case of Sardanapalus, who, when he was besieged in Niniveh, is said to have sent out to all the nations to come to his succour (8); though thereupon we have noted, that in his case it must have been quite impracticable, if not impossible, for him to do it (9). He should have done it before he was blocked up in his city; upon the whole, this must be the story which is there told by the heedless and romantic historian Ctesias.

than, perhaps, expected ſucceſs, he returns in triumph to Niniveh, he and all his company of nations, a multitude of warriors, and repoſing with them after the fatigues of their victorious expedition (S), they feaſt and revel with him for the ſpace of 120 days †.

AND now being ſated with exceſs and riot, and confident of being invincible (T), he and his ſervants reſume their martial fury, and talk of no leſs than being avenged on the whole earth; meaning the nations who had ſo contemptuouſly refuſed to attend him in his war intended with Media. He therefore calls together his nobles and officers, with whom he conferred, concerning this matter, in private council, and the reſult was, to afflict the whole earth out of his own mouth, and that all fleſh ſhould be deſtroyed that did not obey the commandment of his mouth. In conſequence of this vain reſolution, Nabuchadonoſor calls for his chief captain Holofernes, and gives him in charge, as the lord of the whole earth, to take with him 120,000 of his choiceſt foot, and 12,000 choſen archers on horſeback, and with them to invade all the weſt, for that they had dared to withſtand his will and pleaſure, and to command them to prepare water and earth for him, againſt he ſhould, in his wrath, come againſt them, and cover the whole earth with the feet of his army, and give them up a prey thereto; threatening, that their ſlain ſhould fill their vallies and their brooks, and make the river ſwell over its banks, and that he would lead them away captives to the uttermoſt parts of the earth: He commanded him to go forth before him and poſſeſs himſelf of all their coaſts for him; that if they ſubmitted to him, he ſhould let them alone for him to puniſh them in perſon; but that if they preſumed to make head againſt him, he ſhould utterly deſtroy them without favour or diſtinction;

(S) This ſucceſsful war of Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonoſor, againſt the Medes, is exactly almoſt what Cteſias writes of Sardanapalus (10), it is the ſame ſtory moſt careleſly told; and this feaſt is certainly the ſame Sardanapalus is ſaid to have given his victorious army (11).

(T) This is Sardanapalus again, or rather Sardanapalus is the ſhadow of this king; he, as we have ſeen, imagined his city of Niniveh could never be taken (12).

HOLOFERNES, having received his orders to this effect, departed from Nabuchadonoſor, and calling together all the governors, captains, and officers of the army of Aſſur [Aſſyria], he ſelected the numbers, both of horſe and foot, the king had commanded; and, attended with aſſes and camels in great numbers, for the conveyance of neceſſaries, and goats, ſheep, and oxen more than can be ſaid, with plenty of every thing to ſuſtain the army, and gold and ſilver in great abundance from the king's treaſury, he marched off from Niniveh; followed, beſides his army, by innumerable multitudes from ſeveral nations, who like locuſts joined him, or like the ſand of the ſea; ſo that by the

(V) It would have been very difficult to account for this great degree of inſolent wrath in this prince, were it not for the good aſſiſtance of Herodotus, who tells (13) us, as we have obſerved before, that the Medes were grown to that pitch as to pretend to ſubdue Aſſyria; which, conſidering this king as he was, muſt have been a moſt violent provocation, and muſt have highly inflamed him, when he found himſelf ſo deſerted by his tributaries and homagers, who could unconcernedly look on, while he perhaps was ſubdued by a rebellious nation, who muſt for many years, ever ſince the days of Sennacherib, have been at greateſt enmity with Aſſyria, though at the hazard of their own welfare, ſeeing they might feel the blow that ſtaggered his kingdom. Upon the conſideration therefore that they would not aſſiſt him, though to preſerve even themſelves, he reſolves to execute ſuch vengeance, as ſuch ingratitude, as he might call it, and ſtupidity would well deſerve. The vulgat, according to St. Jerom, takes off from this, by repreſenting Nabuchadonoſor victorious over the Medes, before he called in the nations mentioned, but why he ſhould call them in when his work was done, or how they ſhould have diſobey'd him, when he had ſo lately given ſo extraordinary an inſtance of his might and power, is more than we can conceive. The Greek verſion and our own is doubtleſs here to be preferred, though both, in other reſpects, very faulty.

the help of hyperbole, they may be properly enough ſaid to cover all the face of the earth weſtward with their chariots, and horſemen, and their choſen footmen [a].

HOLOFERNES, in this his march weſtward, deſtroyed Phud and Lud, ſpoiled all the children of Raſſes, and the children of Iſmael toward the wilderneſs, ſouthward of the land of the Chellians. He then croſſed the Euphrates, and paſſed through Meſopotamia, and deſtroyed all the high cities upon the river Arbonai quite to the ſea: He took the borders of Cilicia, killed all that reſiſted him, and came to the borders of Japhet, ſouthward, oppoſite to Arabia; and falling upon the children of Madian (W), he burnt their tents, and threw down their ſheep-cotes. From hence he went to the plain of Damaſcus, where he arrived at the time of wheat-harveſt, burnt up all their fields, deſtroyed their flocks and herds, ranſacked and demoliſhed their cities, quite laid the whole country waſte, and ſlew all the young men with the edge of the ſword; which ſtruck ſuch a terror into all the ſea-coaſts, that Tyre, Sidon, Azotus, Aſcalon and others, trembled, and ſued for mercy; ſending, in all haſte, ambaſſadors to him to treat of peace, who, proſtrating themſelves before him, acknowledged themſelves the ſervants of the mighty Nabuchadonoſor, his maſter, and made a moſt humble tender of all that in the world belonged to them, to be diſpoſed of by him, as to him ſhould ſeem beſt [b].

UPON this, Holofernes drew down towards the ſea coaſt, where he filled the chief cities with gariſons of his own, whence he, at the ſame time, picked out the choiceſt men to ſupply the place of ſuch as he thus detached from his army; and all this tyranny he exerciſed amidſt the joyful acclamations of all the people he thus enthralled, who every where received the Aſſyrian general and his army with garlands, and dances, and the ſound of timbrels; but this welcome could no where ſave their frontiers, their groves, or their gods; Holofernes having determined to demoliſh the former, and to deſtroy all the gods of the land whereſoever he ſhould come, that all nations might worſhip Nabuchadonoſor only, and all tongues and tribes call call upon him, and upon him only, as god (X). And having, without oppoſition, wrought his pleaſure in theſe parts, he moved off towards the plain of Eſdraelon; and advancing towards Judea, he encamped between Geba and Scythopolis, where he halted a whole month for the rendezvous of his baggage and ſcattered parts of his army [c].

IN this ſituation he redoubled the alarm he had before given to the inhabitants of Judea, who thereupon took what meaſures they could to obſtruct his paſſage and defend themſelves. Holofernes indeed intended to deal by them as he had dealt by others, and, we may be ſure, was highly exaſperated, when he heard the Jews were reſolved upon an obſtinate reſiſtance. The news and confirmation of this ſtirred him up to anger; and convening the chiefs of Ammon, Moab, and the ſea coaſt, he required them to inform him concerning the people who thus pretended to withſtand his progreſs; and how it was, that they alone, of all the people of the weſt, ſhould preſume to ſtand out againſt the Aſſyrian power? to which he was anſwered, by the chief of the ſons of Ammon, Achior by name, who, reciting to him the hiſtory of the Jews from Abraham, upon the whole aſſured him, that if they were in favour with God, it would be in vain for him to think of ſubduing them; and that it would, in that caſe, be dangerous for him to hazard his honour againſt them; but that if indeed they had ſinned, they might be as eaſily reduced as any other nation. This diffident and ambiguous counſel was not only diſpleaſing to Holofernes, but raiſed a tumult among the chiefs of Phœnice and Moab who were preſent, and who would have perſuaded him to put Achior to death for his inſolence, vaunting againſt the children of Iſrael, and ſetting them at nought [d].

WHEN the tumult was ceaſed, Holofernes called out to Achior, and treated him as a wretch, who had on ſet purpoſe propheſied againſt him, and blaſpheming againſt God,

(X) He here ſeems to have aſſumed beyond any of his predeceſſors. This may ſerve as an inſtance, that the Aſſyrians aboliſhed the religion of the countries where-ever they came, to introduce the worſhip of their own princes, dead or living; to keep the nations the more in awe, and the more to exalt the majeſty of their own kingdom. This may be added to what we have already obſerved of the ſame kind on ſeveral paſſages of this hiſtory and practice of the people.

ſpoke of Nabuchadonoſor as above him; he then ordered him out of his preſence, dooming him to death with the Jews, whom he intended ſhortly to cut off. Hereupon he ordered his ſervants to guard him to a ſtrong place belonging to the Jews, that he might there wait till his appointed hour was come. Bethulia was the place named, and thither he was accordingly carried; and being got into the city, he informed them of whatever he knew in relation to Holofernes and his deſigns [e].

Beſieges Bethulia.

THE next day Holofernes ordered, that a motion ſhould in general be made to inveſt Bethulia; the vaſt multitude obeyed and encamped upon a wide extent of ground from Dothaim to Belmaim, and from Bethulia to Cyamon, over-againſt Eſdraelon. The day after this, Holofernes, at the head of all his horſemen, and in the ſight of all the people of Bethulia, took a view of the paſſages to the city, and ſeizing upon and ſetting a guard over their ſprings of water, returned again to the groſs of his army. Upon his return, the chiefs of the Edomites adviſed him not to think of aſſaulting the beſieged, becauſe of their ſituation, but rather to keep the waters that ſupplied the city under a ſtrong guard, and ſo deſtroy the people by thirſt, while he ſat quietly in his camp, and ſaved himſelf and army the trouble of putting thoſe to death, who muſt of neceſſity die for want of water; and ſo be ſufficiently avenged on them for their rebellious behaviour. Holofernes approved the advice, and ordered the neceſſary diſpoſitions to put it effectually in execution [f].

HAVING continued in this inactive ſtate about 35 days, and waiting the miſerable end of the beſieged, who for want of water were indeed ready to expire; word was brought him of a beautiful and comely woman from Bethulia, who was without his tent. He was then repoſing himſelf under a rich canopy of purple, gold, emeralds, and other precious ſtones, and hearing of Judith, that was the woman's name, he went out to ſee her in great ſtate, with ſilver lamps carried before him. Judith fell proſtrate on her face before him, and being taken up from the ground, he ſpoke kindly to her, deſired her to fear nothing, and aſſured her he never did harm to thoſe who were willing to ſerve his great maſter Nabuchadonoſor; and more to the ſame purpoſe, relating to herſelf and the people ſhe came from. In the end, ſhe told him an artful ſtory to encourage him in his his hopes against the people of Bethulia; with her words she deceived him, and with her beauty she ensnared his heart. For four days he left her mistress of herself, unattempted and unconfined, though her actions and behaviour were entirely calculated to deprive him of life. At the end of this term he could refrain no longer, but ordered his chief eunuch, Bagoas, to persuade her to his bed; which she dissembling a readiness to comply with, Holofernes gave himself up to an excess of wine, and being left alone with her, she took her opportunity in the dead of night, and severed his head from his body, with his own sword, and carried it off with her to the besieged [g] (Y).

(Y) This story may meet with very little credit, and indeed we are very apt to think it is not true; and this may derive such a blemish on the whole book, as to make some doubt of the sincerity of any thing else said in it; nor should we be very ready to add much faith to any part of it, were it not so directly confirmed to us by Herodotus, and so sufficiently by Ctesias and all his followers, as we have observed in some parallel places. The heroine herself, Judith, may be a fictitious character, calculated more for example than any thing else, and visibly meant to inculcate into us an heroic love of our country and readiness to sacrifice ourselves in its defence; or it may have been meant some how or other as a compliment to the Jews, by representing them to have had the honour of a share in pulling down the proud towers of Niniveh. Whatever may have been intended by what is told of Judith herself, the substance of the book in other respects is undoubtedly true, as may be made to appear, not only by the concurrence of the authors we have mentioned, but also by the time it was wrote in, which it is perfectly consistent with. One of the greatest difficulties to be surmounted in the vindicating of this apocryphal book, is, that throughout the whole there is no mention made of a king in the land; whereupon Prideaux (14) observes, that if we could put this history so far back as the minority of Manasseh, it would be a most important point gained; for that then there would be reason enough not to mention the minor king; but only the chief minister and guardian of the kingdom in the transacting of the whole affair. To put this history so far back as he would have it, he confesses impossible, but we have proved, that if the years of the reign of Manasseh and his son Amon are right, and

THE Assyrians, ignorant of what had been transacted in the recesses of their general's tent that night, and perceiveing the besieged in motion the next morning, as if they intended an assault, sent notice of it to Holofernes who was found headless in his tent, to the unspeakable surprize of all that beheld or heard it. At this the Assyrians lost all courage, and, seized with a panic, betook them to the most precipitate flight, as if in the tragical end of their general they foresaw their own. They left all their treasure and baggage behind them, and were pursued with a great slaughter to Chobai [h].

THUS ended this insolent expedition; but whether exactly after this manner or any other we have not to say; but that it was unfortunate, and highly so, may appear by what in a few years after followed, meaning no less than the fall of the Assyrian empire. What farther relates to this emperor we are at a loss to know, except that we are told he was succeeded by a king called and if Ptolemy's canon is to be depended on, this story may stand most naturally in the first years of Josiah, who was a minor of but eight years of age; so that, according to him, it is no wonder, there is no mention made of so very young a king throughout this whole book of Judith. Those who would know more of this may consult the same learned author, who has professedly treated on this subject (15), which is somewhat foreign to our design, and would besides draw us into too great a length.

(Z) This name may have been contracted from Sarchedon, as this was from Asserhadon, Asserhadon-pul, or Sardanapalus (16). Here we seemingly see then, whence we are to derive the two Sardanapaluses in profane authors (17), and particularly those in Suidas (18), distinguished, the one as a warrior, the other as an effeminate creature (19). The great Asserhadon (20) was the former, and this king, who according to our supposition must have been the second of the name, was the latter.

kingdom of Babylon for himself, (A), and in that kingdom therefore may be said to have been the immediate successor of Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonosor (B), as he stands in the canon of Ptolemy. The two revolted kingdoms of the Medes

(A) This Nabopallasar was confessedly an Assyrian by his name, which must have been derived from Nebo-pul-assur; this sufficiently declares the nation he was of, and it is confirmed by Polyhistor (21), who calls him, upon what authority we cannot conceive, Sardanapalus. So that according to this there must have been two Sardanapaluses existing together, the one rising into prosperity, the other falling into the pit of adversity. From some such notion it must have been, that we read also of another city of Niniveh, to which the unfortunate Sardanapalus sent in his distress (22). But he was then actually blocked up in his capital, by the united force of the Medes and Babylonians, and this man, according to our historian (23), was the Babylonian that actually joined with the medes to destroy Niniveh; so that there is no manner of congruity in the two facts as related. The apparent truth of this man's accession to the throne of Babylon seems to have been this; as he was confessedly an Assyrian, he may have laid claim to the throne of Babylon in right of succession, as of the younger branch of the Assyrians descended from the great Nabonassar, who seems to have had the kingdom of Babylon allotted to him by his father, or grandfather, Pul, the first Assyrian conqueror, while he left Assyria to his eldest son. He may, it is likely, have made this claim, and the seemingly unfortunate end of the reign of Chyniladan (24) may, upon the death of that emperor, and the unsettled state he must have left things in, have tempted him to seize on Babylon immediately for himself, and in his own right; which, it is probable, he had never dared to attempt before. Hence it must seemingly have been, that we have no mention of Sarac, or whatever else he may have been called in Ptolemy's canon.

(B) The note above makes this sufficiently appear, and what we have there already said seems to have been really the case. The Medes were at open war with the Assyrians (25), the rest of the nations were partly ready to shake off the yoke which had been reimposed on them by Chyniladan (26), if they did not really shake it off upon the defeat of his army under Holofernes (27); and partly in an actual state of independence, having shaken off the yoke even in the days of Asserhadon, and perhaps before (28); and Medes and Babylonians conſpired together againſt the emperor at Niniveh, entered into alliances with each other, Nabopallaſar particularly ſending to Aſtyages the Mede, to demand his daughter, Amyite, or Aroite, in marriage for his ſon Nebuchadnezzar [k] (C). and this ſeiſure on Babylon muſt have been ſuch a blow to the Aſſyrian monarchy as it never after could recover; and when the two potent and enterprizing kings of the Medes and of the Babylonians came to unite their forces together, it is no wonder the Aſſyrian, who was deſerted on all hands, could not long withſtand ſuch a conjunction, and immediately began to dwindle, till he became quite extinct, and afterwards obliterated.

(C) Here we ſee the new prince of Babylon making the moſt effectual court to the king of the Medes, and contracting the moſt intimate of alliances with him for their mutual ſupport. Theſe two are then the Beleſis and Arbaces of Cteſias (29) under different names; but more rationally employed towards the ſubverſion of the Aſſyrian empire. We ſee them here contracting with each other as conſiderable princes, who could no longer brook ſubjection, and not two obſcure revolters and conſpirators, ſecretly combining togther at Niniveh. It is to our purpoſe, that Polyhiſtor (30) calls this Babylonian Nabopallaſar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, or Nabuchadonoſor, the firſt Babylonian monarch that makes his appearance in ſcripture, and thereby ſo quadrates therewith, throughout the whole ſyſtem of the Aſſyrian and Babylonian hiſtory, as there recorded, as to ſettle the riſe of the Babylonian empire, and the fall, nearly of the Aſſyrian, beyond any poſſibility of diſpute; nor can Cteſias's Beleſis (31) have been any other than this Nabopallaſar, and the rather as Polyhiſtor (32) ſays, he was no more than governor of Chaldæa or Babylon, while he calls Aſtyages the Mede, his friend, the ſatrapa or lord of Media, and thereby makes the diſtinction of ſuperiority between them which Cteſias aſſerts; ſo that in the main, Cteſias may be ſaid to agree with this author, and to have had his accounts imperfectly delivered to him, if he did not indeed make it his choice to embelliſh this part of his Aſſyrian hiſtory, as well as the reſt, with the glaring tinſel of romance.

and himself therewith [1], and may, it is likely, have been the Sardanapalus talked of by profane historians (D). Thus fell the empire of Assyria, or in some such manner, (E), and the Medes and Babylonians triumphed over its ruins

(D) He dreaded perhaps the fury of such implacable enemies as these may have been, and particularly of Cyaxares, the son of Phraortes (33), who was determined to avenge the death of his father (34) Phraortes, who must have been the same with the Astyages of Polyhistor (35), and the Arphaxad of the Apocrypha (36); or perhaps the excess of his pride was such, that he could not bear the thoughts of captivation or deprivation, but chose rather to undergo the most cruel of deaths, even burning itself. It is observed (37) to be very extraordinary, that so many have voluntarily undergone this most exquisite torment, when they had it in their choice to put an end to life so many other ways. In the case of those who have burned themselves merely to put an end to their days, without any sort of constraint, after the manner of the Indians, religion or superstition may be urged in their behalf, than which nothing has a more powerful effect upon the minds and tempers of men. But in the case of Sardanapalus and others, who may have dreaded a severe constraint of person, or a disastrous loss of life by the hand of a remorseless enemy, it is no such great wonder, that they should take the most effectual way to destroy both themselves and what belonged to them, that the enemy might not quench the thirst of his rage with their blood, or inrich himself with their spoils. The motive to this, in those that have suffered it, may be ascribed to the highest sort of revenge; it being the only method they could take to disappoint the enemy, and make him, what he might call a sufferer even by their destruction.

(E) We have made it our business in several preceding notes in this section, and in some at the latter end of the former, to shew, that there are two Sardanapaluses in the profane writers, and that these two can have been no other than the great Asserhadon and this last king of Assyria (38), who may have been the second of the name, as the contraction of his name, which is all we have of it, seems to imply. The profane accounts, as we have seen, represent the one to have been a great and magnificent prince, and to have built even two cities in one day, as Tarsus and Anchiale, and to have died peaceably peaceably and quietly in his bed(39); the other a sluggard, who perish. ed in the flames that consumed his palace, his servants, and his treasures(40). The former then must have been the great Asserhadon, or Sardon-pul, of scripture, and the latter must have been this obscure prince Sarac, Sarchedon, or Sardon-pul; for that the empire did not fall under the former is most evident, and that it fell under the latter is almost as plain, by the obscurity of what is related concerning him. For by Herodotus (41) it is clear, it had dwindled away apace after the death of the great Asserhadon, and languished greatly under the inactive reign of Saosduchinus, who gave the turbulent Medes an opportunity of recollecting that strength, that may have been impaired by the successes of his fortunate predecessor, who was certainly the greatest of all the Assyrian monarchs; insomuch, that Chyniladan, who succeeded Saosduchinus, with all his resolution and valour had much ado to curb them (42); but he dying under some misfortunes, as should seem by his history, and his successor Sarac perhaps proving to be an effeminate and slothful man, the Assyrian throne sunk still deeper than it had ever been, and those who had professed obedience to it hitherto began to desert it, and to conspire against it; and being under this cloud, and just on the verge of disappearing for ever, it is no wonder, we have no certain notice of what particularly befel it at its final dissolution; and the rather, as all these parts were at the same time disturbed by a violent irruption of the Scythians, who kept things in suspence, or rather in subjection to them during 28 years, during which time the Assyrian at Niniveh must have grown less and less considerable, and but gasped till the fatal blow was given. Hence it is, that we know so little of Sarac, the last king of Niniveh, and the exact time of the fall of this empire.

(F) After this manner it certainly came to destruction, for besides what Ctesias (43) writes, and Polyhistor (44), even Herodotus (45) intimates, that it was subverted by the Medes and Babylonians; by saying, that the Medes conquered all Assyria, excepting a part of the province of Babylonia. Whereby he seems to understand, that the Babylonian was a dependant on the Mede; though he did not deserve the honour of being accounted his ally and confederate, as if the Mede would have been powerful enough of himself, without such assistance as the Babylonian could afford afford him. In this he tacitly agrees both with Cteſias and Polyhiſtor; for the former repreſents the Babylonian rather as a client, than an aſſiſtant, to the Mede (46); and the latter tell us, the Babylonian had no ſooner ſeized on his portion than he applied to the Mede for protection, and, to ſecure himſelf and deſcendants in his new poſſeſſions, ſued to him for a marriage between the families (47); and that there was this difference of rank between them, may be pretty clearly underſtood by a prophecy in Iſaiah, which we ſhall not fail to take notice of preſently. Upon the whole, though Cteſias is to be condemned for having made a romance of the Aſſyrian affairs, and for the many inconſiſtencies and falſhoods he has heaped together concerning the ſame, it appears, that he had ſome ſort of information concerning the fall of this monarchy. We have already ſeen ſome paſſages in him parallel with others in the book of Judith, as forerunning the ſubverſion of this empire (48); but then he has miſapplied his facts to Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonoſor, the laſt king but one, and not to Sarac, or Sardanapalus, the laſt king of all.

(G) The exact time of this great event may perhaps be ſettled pretty nearly. If Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonoſor, died in the ſixth year of Joſiah, as we have as good as proved (49), it muſt follow, that the ſame Joſiah, being ſlain by Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, when there was a king of Aſſyria ſtill in being (50), that kingdom continued many years after the death of Chyniladan; for Joſiah reigned 31 years (51), the laſt of which may coincide with the fourth year of Nabocolaſſarus, or Nebuchadnezzar, ſo that his father Nabopallaſſarus, who immediately ſeized upon the kingdom of Babylon, upon the deceaſe of Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonoſor, did not live to ſee the deſtruction of Niniveh, which may have ſtood ſome years after his death. Now that it came to paſs, that Niniveh ſtood ſo long after the combination of the Medes and Babylonians againſt it, was owing to a ſtop put to their deſigns, by an irruption of the Scythians (52), who can have been no other than the Bactrians mentioned before (53), to have come upon the Medes and Babylonians, while they were beſieging that city. Theſe Scythians held dominion over Aſia, as it is called, (54) for the ſpace of 28 years; during which the confederates were ſo far from being able to act againſt the king of Aſſyria, that they muſt have been under conſiderable conſtraint and tribute, as well as the other kings and princes in theſe parts. The Scythians then were lords in theſe parts about ſix or ſeven years after the death of Nabopallaſſarus, and the work of deſtroying the kingdom of Aſſyria could not be compleated till the Scythians had been driven out of this part of Aſia, which happened at the expiration of the term of 28 years above-mentioned. They then proceeded againſt Niniveh, and deſtroyed it about the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah; but whether in the ſecond, third, or fourth year of his reign, we ſhall leave the reader to determine; but it is certain, to a ſufficient demonſtration, that in one of thoſe years Niniveh ſubmitted to fate.

Therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became long because of the multitude of his waters, when he shot forth. All the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs, and under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young, and under his shadow dwelt all great nations. Thus was he fair in his greatness, in the length of his branches; for his root was by great waters. The cedars in the garden of* [p] Idem. xxxi. p. 8, 9.

(I) These two, the one not a mighty man, the other not a mean man, seem plainly to allude to the mighty Mede, and the dependent Babylonian, as we have distinguished them in a note or two above; so that this prophecy seems very naturally applicable to the two men that destroyed the kingdom of Assyria, as they are represented by the bulk of authors.

(K) We cannot help doing Ctesias the justice of observing, That this flight from the sword, this discomfiture of the young men, and this retreat to the strong hold for fear, seem exactly to quadrate with the circumstances he relates concerning the latter end of Sardanapalus (56). The flight for fear may allude to his flight when surprised in his camp (57); the discomfiture of his young men, to the slaughter of his army under Salmeneus (58); and his passing over to his strong hold, to his betaking himself to his city of Niniveh (59). We leave this matter to the reader's fancy or determination, and have taken notice of it chiefly to shew, that it is not from any prejudice conceived particularly against Ctesias, that we have laboured so much against him, or because we are fond of erecting or sustaining an hypothesis; and that we should have been as ready to have followed him as any other, could we safely have done it. In a word, he meant no Assyrian monarchy but that in scripture, which was either strangely distorted for him, or he must, studiously and most unpardonably, have disguised it himself.

of God could not hide him: the fir-trees were not like his boughs, and the chesnut-trees were not like his branches; nor any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty. I have made him fair by the multitude of his branches: so that all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, envied him. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height, and he hath shot up his top among the thick boughs, and his heart is lifted up in his height; I have delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen: he shall surely deal with him. I have driven him out for his wickedness. And strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him: upon the mountains and in all the vallies his branches are fallen, and his boughs are broken by all the rivers of the land, and all the people of the earth are gone down from his shadow, and have left him. Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, and all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches. To the end that none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves for their height, neither shoot up their top among the thick boughs, neither their trees stand up in their height, all that drink water: for they are all delivered unto death, to the nether parts of the earth in the midst of the children of men, with them that go down to the pit. Thus saith the Lord God, In the day when he went down to the grave, I caused a mourning, I covered the deep for him, and I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed; and I caused Lebanon to mourn for him, and all the trees of the field fainted for him. I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall, when I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit: and all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, all that drink water shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth. They also went down into hell with him unto them that be slain with the sword, and they that were his arm, that dwelt under his shadow in the heathen[q]. . . . . Thy shepherds slumber, O king of Assyria, thy nobles shall dwell in the dust: thy people is scattered upon the mountains, and no man gathereth them. There is no healing of thy bruise: thy wound is grievous: all that hear the bruit of thee, shall clap the hands over thee; for upon whom hath not thy wickedness past continually[r]? Such was the great empire of Assyria, such her glory, as to be accounted, even by God himself, the first and supreme of nations, and such her fearful fall; nor is all this meant of any

The Hiſtory of the BABYLONIANS.

SECT. I.

The Deſcription of the Country of BABYLON, or CHALDÆA.

WE have already done conſiderably towards the geography of this kingdom, and particularly with regard to the times immediately ſucceſſive to the deluge [t]. Its moſt antient name was Shinaar, Sennaar, Senjâr, Singara, and the like [u], but whether or no it extended to what has been ſince known more peculiarly for the dominions of Babylon, we have already declared [w] we know not, nor is it poſſible to gather it to any great degree of ſatisfaction, though Names.

[t] See vol. i. particularly in the notes, p. 362, 408. [u] See vol. i. p. 361, 408. [w] See before, in the places of the two foregoing citations.

though there is some reason to think it did, because it is used to denote this whole kingdom, when in the meridian of empire *. Babylon is a name universally supposed to have been borrowed from that of the tower and city of Babel; and Chaldæa from the Chaldæans, or Chasdim [x].

These two last names sometimes extend themselves over the whole territory, being indifferently usurped for each other; but are sometimes limited to certain parts of it, Babylon being used for the parts between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, and the country more immediately in the neighbourhood of the city itself of Babylon; and Chaldæa for the parts more immediately conterminous with Arabia, and stretching south-eastward to the shore of the Persian gulph. These two great names were also used in distinction of each other upon another account, not so much to our present purpose; finally, they were sometimes swallowed up by that of Assyria [y].

Divisions. By this means this kingdom came to be divided into two principal parts, together, it is likely, making up a considerable extent, and including a very great portion of Mesopotamia, and a good and valuable tract of what may be, properly enough, called Arabia; whence it may be distinguished into the Mesopotamian and the Arabian.

Extent uncertain. How far this country extended northward is past our determination, but for its limits westward, southward, and eastward, we cannot be very much at a loss, seeing it was

Situation and boundaries. to the eastward bounded by the Tigris, which divided it from Assyria; to the southward by the conflux of the two rivers and the Persian gulph, and to the westward by the Desart Arabia; to the northward it must have been bounded by some part of Mesopotamia, but by what part of it we shall never be able to tell, till we know how far they incroached upon each other, and were considered as distinct countries. Hence it is sometimes a practice with geographers to treat of Babylonia and Mesopotamia at the same time and once for all [z], as being properly one and the same country.

This ample region may very naturally suit with the majesty of the Babylonian kings; but the name must certainly ly have prevailed, in antient days, beyond its proper limits (L); and that it did not become even more universal, must have been owing to its being second to the Assyrian, which had rooted itself firmly over all the kingdoms about, and for which the Babylonians must have had too much veneration to attempt to change it, seeing it may have been by them deemed their greateſt glory, that they were of Aſſyrian origin themſelves, as will be ſeen hereafter. But it is certain, that the proper Babylon, in later times, was confined to the very ſouthermoſt parts of Meſopotamia, which our maps ſometimes repreſent as a peninſula, or rather, as it is, a cluſter of iſlands; this ſmall territory, together with the proper Chaldæa already mentioned, is now deſcribed for this country, which, in antient days, obtained as far to the northward, as ſhould ſeem, as Senjâr at leaſt.

(L) The limits of the Babylonian empire were much the same with those of the Assyrian empire after the revolt of the Medes, and hence the Babylonian name was almost as widely extended as the Assyrian, and indeed they are frequently used the one for the other, though this latter seems to have had the ascendant and pre-eminence, as being prior, and, as it were, superior to the former. "Berosus saith, That Nebuchadnezzar held E-" gypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia; and Strabo adds Arbela " to the territories of Babylon; and saying that Babylon was " antiently the metropolis of Assyria, he thus describes the limits " of the Assyrian empire [or more properly the Babylonian]. " Contiguous, saith he, [l. 16.] to Persia and Susiana are the As-" syrians; for so they call Babylonia, and the greatest part of the " region about it; part of which is Aturia, wherein Ninus " [or Niniveh], and Appolloniatis, and the Elymæans, and the " Parætacæ, and Chalonitis by the mountain Zagrus, and the " fields near Ninus, and Dolomene, and Chalachene, and Cha-" zene, and Adiabene, and the nations of Mesopotamia near the " Gordyæans, and the Mygdones about Nisibis, unto Zeugma " upon Euphrates; and a large region on this side of the Euph-" rates, inhabited by the Arabians and Syrians, properly so called, " as far as Cilicia, and Phœnicia, and Libya, and the sea of E-" gypt, and the Sinus Issicus:" And a little after, describing the extent of the Babylonian region, he " bounds it on the north " with the Armenians and Medes, unto the mountain Zagrus; " on the east side with Susa, and Elymais, and Parætacene, in-" clusively; on the south with the Persian gulf and Chaldæa, and " on the west with the Arabes Scenitæ as far as Adiabene and Gor-" dyæa:" Afterwards, speaking of Susiana and Sittacene, a region between Babylon and Susa, and of Parætacene, and Cossæa, and Elymais, and of the Sagapeni and Siloceni, two little adjoining provinces; he concludes, [l. 16. p. 745.] " And these are the na-" tions which inhabit Babylonia eastward: to the north are Media " and Armenia, exclusively; the greatest part of Adiabene is plain, " the same being part of Babylonia: in some places it borders on " Armenia; for the Medes, Armenians, and Babylonians warred " frequently on one another (60)." We here see Assyria and Babylonia most remarkably confounded together, not only as the same empire, but as the same country.

Climate and fertility.

THIS country, lying within the fifth north climate, enjoys an air very temperate and wholeſome for the moſt part, though at certain ſeaſons of the year no air can be poſſibly more dangerous to breathe in. The heats are ſo extraordinary here, that the richer ſort were uſed to ſleep in tubs and ciſterns of water *, nor could they bear to live without this pernicious practice, which ſtill continues, as every body that has been in theſe parts very well knows; and at certain ſeaſons they have here the dreadful plague of a peſtilential wind, much talked of by modern travellers, and which we ſhall be more particular about in the geography of Perſia. It ſeldom or never rains here for certain months of the year; ſo that the inhabitants, in the northermoſt parts of this country, and generally all over it, are at great labour and trouble in watering their lands, when the convenience of waters will allow them to do it; and eſpecially along the banks of the Euphrates, where their engines and wheels are ſo frequent, as ſometimes to hurt the navigation of the river †. This drought continues commonly eight months of the year [a]; nay, it has been ſometimes known not to have rained here for two years and a half together, and the inhabitants reckon, that if it does but rain twice or thrice in a year, it is enough for their purpoſe [b]: this is remarked by Herodotus [c], who ſays, that in the land of the Aſſyrians it ſeldom rained; and that, though the country was quite like Egypt, its fertility was not cauſed by the inundations of the river, as in that country, but by the painful labour of the inhabitants, who either actually watered it by hand, or dug trenches, and other conveyances of that kind, for the refreſhment and

and fecundation of this country, though, however, the ſame ſort of labour is neceſſary even in Egypt [d]. The ſoil being rich, the climate in general excellent, and the induſtry of the inhabitants what it ought to be, this country for fertility uſed to vie with any other ſpot on the face of the earth. We have ſeen it compared to Egypt, as above, and the ſouthermoſt parts of it between the rivers may be particularly compared with the Delta of that country, it being, like that, made up of endleſs iſlands, ſome formed by nature, and ſome by art, and is beſides almoſt under the ſame parallel of latitude; nor is the other part of it, Chaldæa properly ſo called, between the Euphrates and the mountains of Babylon, as they are commonly termed, much leſs watered by rivers and canals conducted from the Euphrates, and large reſervoirs or lakes ſeemingly borrowed from the ſame river. And hence it is, that [e] Herodotus compares this country with Egypt, and hence, together with the excellence of its ſoil, it was ſo fruitful, that the ſame venerable author [f] imagines it impoſſible any one ſhould believe what he could ſay about it, that had not, like himſelf, been an eye-witneſs of the ſame; though he ventures to aſſert, that, for the plenty of its productions, it was reckoned to be a third part of Aſia, that is of the Perſian empire, and that, when it exceeded even itſelf, it would yield 300 fold, but 200 moſt commonly.

BEING a country of ſuch plenty of waters, and being for the moſt part low and flat, it may chiefly, of trees, have abounded with the willow, whence it came to be called the The Valley of Willows, as Prideaux [g] would, after Bochart, mend the text [h]. The palm alſo flouriſhed naturally all over this land, and chiefly that of the date kind, as we underſtand our author [i], which afforded them, as he expreſſes himſelf [k], meat, and wine, and honey, though the vine, the olive, and the fig, were what this otherwiſe happy country could not boaſt of [l], no more than her ſiſter Egypt. But for grain it exceeded every other land; the millet and the ſeſame ſhot up here to the ſize of trees, and the leaves of the barley and wheat were uſually four good fingers broad [m]. The ſeſame afforded them oil inſtead of the olive, and the palm afforded them wine inſtead Productions.

ſtead of the grape [n]. In ſhort, for vegetable productions it may be juſtly compared with Egypt; and to dwell on them would be little better than repeating what we have already ſaid about that country [o].

Rivers, canals, &c.

ALL this fertility muſt have been greatly owing to the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, which were wont in the months of June, July, and Auguſt, to overflow their banks, and lay this country under water; the ſnow in thoſe months melting away in great quantities from the mountains of Armenia. But this being found detrimental and deſtructive to the inhabitants, theſe inundations were guarded againſt by numbers of artificial rivers and canals, whereby the waters were diſtributed and abated, the country in general benefited, and an eaſy communication effected between the inhabitants. Some of theſe canals were ſo large as to be navigable in the winter months [p], but the chief of them all ſeems to have been the Naharmalcha, or Royal River [q]. Concerning this, and the reſt of its kind, we muſt always be a good deal in the dark; for till of late years we have known next to nothing of the face of this country, from the experience of our own travellers, or the aſſiſtance of the antient eaſt geographers, without which it is next to impoſſible to fix any thing certain about it in the antient weſtern geographers. Nor have we as yet, it is to be feared, ſufficient inſtructions with regard to the particulars of this intricate country, which can never be properly delineated, but by an actual and accurate ſurvey, which is what we can never ſo much as hope for. We ſhall therefore only obſerve, that the Naharmalcha, which, as repreſented by the antients, muſt have been a vaſt work, is not now eaſily diſtinguiſhable from the other branches and canals of this country. There is ſome difficulty to make the antient geographers, in this particular caſe, conſiſtent with the beſt of our preſent maps, nor are the ſame geographers in this caſe very conſiſtent with themſelves; ſo that in a point of this obſcurity we ſhall be as brief as poſſible deſpairing, with all the lights and aſſiſtances we have, to be able to fix this royal river quite to the ſatisfaction either of the reader or of ourſelves. The Naharmalcha is then by ſome [r] ſuppoſed to have been the ſame with the river of Cûtha, now called Couti, or Cûti, which ſeems to have been an artificial branch conducted from the Euphrate

Euphrates into the inland of Arabia, where it falls into ſome lakes or waters, called the lake of Rahama, or Al Batayeh, in De Liſle's maps, and muſt have been, together with ſome overflowed lands, farther eaſtward in the proper Chaldea, the Paludes Babylonicæ of the antients. This river is ſaid to have been dug by Cûtha, or Cuſh, king of Babel, but it is more uſually by the oriental writers attributed to his ſon Nimrod [s]. This Naharmalcha is called a branch of the Euphrates, and is ſaid to have emptied itſelf into the lakes and upon the overflowed lands, to have divided the country, and to have waſhed the towns of Irâk, and is ſaid to have been the ſame called the river Sûd, the river of the Black Country, or of the Black Towns [t]. By this it ſhould have been no more than a branch of the Euphrates, by labour and art conducted into the inland of Arabia. The river of Nehardea, or River of Knowledge, ſuppoſed to be the ſame with the Narda of Ptolemy, and to have run not above 20 miles above Sora, or at leaſt the univerſity itſelf of Nehardea, a famous one belonging to the Jews, is ſaid to have been no farther diſtant from Sora, and to have been ſeated on the eaſtern banks of the Euphrates, and to have been many miles above the place from whence the royal river, or Naharmalcha, was derived on the oppoſite ſhore, by which it is to be concluded, that it ran weſtward or ſouthward of the Euphrates, and conſequently, that it could not poſſibly have had any communication with the Tigris, whereas by all the antients we underſtand, that it was a very large canal, navigable by ſhips, between the Tigris and Euphrates, and that it was cut for that very purpoſe. By Ptolemy we underſtand, that it did not only communicate with the two rivers, but alſo diſcharged itſelf into the Paludes, or ſtanding waters and overflowed grounds; by him we underſtand, that it was derived more properly from the Tigris, that it waſhed the walls of Babylon, or at leaſt ran not very far from that city, and that thence, mixing with the Euphrates, the canal was immediately continued away to the Paludes. It is not to be doubted, but that this Naharmalca was contrived more particularly for the great city of Babylon, that ſo it might have the immediate advantage of both the great rivers at once; and accordingly we have in De Liſle's maps a cut or canal repreſented from the Tigris to the Euphrates, juſt by what are now called the ruins of Babylon; and exactly in a line with the river Cûtha, or Cûti, as it is now called and repreſented, which continues itſelf to the waters in the inland of Arabia; and thus we ſeem to have the true ſituation and extent of this river, which muſt certainly have been the ſame, and the rather as it is to this day called Almalec, the King, or Royal. It is in the ſame maps repreſented as imperfect, and as not reaching quite to the Euphrates, and therefore, as much as it may have been formerly conſidered as a branch of the Euphrates, it is now moſt properly a branch of the Tigris. It appears then, that it is partly choaked up, as it was in the days of Trajan [u], who reſtored it to its priſtine ſtate, after it had been for many ages dug by the great Nebuchadnezzar [w]. Thus, by comparing Ptolemy with the beſt of our modern geographers, it ſeems, that we have in general marked out the canal of the Naharmalcha, which may at firſt have included no more than the cut between the two rivers, though it came afterwards to be nominally extended to the incluſion of the river of Cûtha, which muſt have been a diſtinct work. At ſome diſtance to the weſtward of the Naharmalcha was another river, corruptedly in Ptolemy called the Maarſares, for the Naarſares, or the Nahar Sare, the Stinking River; this alſo he derives from the Tigris, and continues to the Paludes; but our beſt maps have no ſign of ſuch a river or canal at preſent in theſe parts; nor can we thereby fix the place of the Nehardea, or Naarda of Ptolemy above, which, though he mentions it as a town only, muſt by its name have been a river alſo, and, as we are told, to the weſtward of the Nahar Sare [x]. It may be labour in vain to attempt to trace out theſe and the other numerous branches and canals which watered the antient country of Babylon, though by the beſt helps we have. Many of them, that have been formerly conſiderable, may be now no more, and others may have been formed ſince, that were not in antient days; for a country ſo prodigiouſly watered, ſo low withal, and ſo ſubject to the violence of extraordinary inundations from two ſuch great rivers as the Tigris and Euphrates, and ſo neglected as it muſt for ages paſt have been, may be fairly con-

concluded to have changed face conſiderably, and frequently, ſince the time Ptolemy flouriſhed; and it muſt be next to impoſſible to delineate the exact face of this country, when it was the ſeat of empire, or when it had ſtrength and riches ſufficient to take care of its numerous banks, and to keep them in repair.

THE Euphrates, thus branched out and divided, may now claim to be conſidered ſeparately. The name of this river we have already ſpoken to [y], and have now to add, that it takes its riſe from the mountains of Armenia, and that it continues its courſe ſouthward, waſhing the eaſtern ſkirts of Syria, and ſouth eaſtward dividing Arabia from Meſopotamia, till, mixing with its fellow traveller the Tigris, it falls at length into the Perſian gulf. This conſiderable river is ſlow, for the moſt part, in its courſe [z], and not very well adapted throughout for navigation, becauſe of ſome parts of it which are ſhoal, and ſome parts of it that are rocky. We are told it is not navigable for the larger ſort of barks, any lower from Bir, or Beer, in Meſopotamia, than a place called Rouſvaine [a], which muſt be the Raſaine in ſome of De Liſle's maps, but that the ſmaller craft may go down quite to Baſſora. Beyond this Rouſvaine it ſeems there are rocks which are dangerous for the larger veſſels [b], but our author ſeems here to be quite miſtaken, for Rouſvaine, or Raſaine, is an inland place, at a diſtance from the banks of this river. A traveller [c] who actually went down this river, and ſeems to have had as great a ſenſe of the dangers of his voyage as any man could well have, makes no mention of rocks in this river till he comes down a great way below, to a place he calls Deer [d], and which is conſiderably beyond Racka, or Racca, where they were obliged to uſe the ſkill and aſſiſtance of pilots [e]. At Bir in Meſopotamia, which was the common place of embarkation from the weſtern parts, this river is compared to the Thames at London, but was then obſerved to have been conſiderably fallen [f]; and indeed the breadth of this river muſt be very uncertain, and, as the caſe uſually is, depend upon the ſeaſons and the weather. In many places it divides itſelf into ſeveral ſhallow branches, branches, and forms ſeveral iſlands[g]; in ſome parts it is broad and ſhallow, in others wide and deep like a little ſea[h], and, upon the whole, is not near ſo convenient as the Tigris[i]. Though the Euphrates, we have obſerved above, is moderate in its courſe, its water is ſo continually foul, that there is no drinking it till it has ſettled for a time, or been paſſed through a cloth, or a ſtrainer[k]; but its water, when in proper order, is preferred before any in theſe parts, and ſaid to be lighter than any other, whence the river is known, with the neighbouring people, by a name which ſignifies the water of deſire[l]. The fiſh of this river is alſo reported to be excellent in kind, and particular notice is taken of one ſomewhat like a carp, which ſometimes weigh 17 or 18 pounds[m], which is all that may be neceſſary to ſay on this ſubject.

THE antient way of navigating this river has ſomething very ſingular and extraordinary in it. The veſſels they uſed were round, without diſtinction of head or ſtern, and were no better than great wicker baſkets coated over with hides, which they guided along with two oars or paddles. Theſe veſſels were of different ſizes, and would ſome of them carry a burden of palm wine, or other merchandiſe, to the weight of 5000 talents, and, according to their ſize, had live aſſes on board of them. Having thus fallen down the river to Babylon, and unloaded their cargoe, they ſtripped off their hides, and ſelling the reſt of their veſſel, with the ſtraw and whatever elſe might have ſerved them for the convenience of ſtowage, and putting their hides upon the backs of their aſſes, they returned by land to the place whence they came, where they wrought up another frame, or baſket, to repeat their voyage; it being impoſſible for them to ſtem the ſtream up again by water[n].

Natural and artificial rarities.

THIS country is more than ordinarily remarkable for the ſeat of Paradiſe, which is moſt rationally ſuppoſed to have been partly, if not all, within the limits of it[o]; as alſo for the great plain of Shinaar, now Senjâr, where the whole race of mankind were gathered together in one body after the flood, and whence they diſperſed themſelves over the face of the earth[p]. The bitumen of this country we

we have already [q] ſpoken of at large, as well as of the place where it more remarkably abounded [r]. The ruins of Babylon, and what remains of the tower, as ſuppoſed, of Babel, might here claim a place, had not another more proper occurred in the former part of this work [s].

SECT. II.

The Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Cuſtoms, Arts, Learning, and Trade of the Babylonians.

BABEL is the firſt kingdom we find erected in ſcripture, and claims an origin prior to that of Aſſur, though, according to the common courſe of hiſtory, it muſt appear after it. Nimrod was the founder of it [t], but for many ages it enlarged not its bounds, and evidently appears to have remained a petty royalty, till the Aſſyrians paved the way to the empire it attained to. Or, on the other hand, if it be granted, that even under Nimrod himſelf it attained a height of power, nothing ſeems more natural than to conclude, that it ſuddenly fell down to a level with its neighbours, and even below ſome of them, and particularly the famous and antient kingdom of Elam, or Perſia; for ſo early as the days of Abraham we meet with a king of Sennaar, the antient Babylon, in the army of Chedorlaomer king of Elam [u], as a vaſſal, ſeemingly, and a tributary. The arguments we have formerly uſed to deſtroy the boaſted antiquity of Aſſyria [w], may be exhibited here to deſtroy that of this empire; but not to repeat what we have ſo fully urged, and which muſt of courſe affect this empire, as it confeſſedly roſe upon the ruins of the former; we would only take notice, that ſcripture knows nothing of any king of Babylon from the king of Shinaar above in the army of Elam, till the days of Merodach Baladan, who was contemporary with Hezekiah [x]; as alſo that, by the ſeveral hiſtories of the nations that precede in this work, it is plain, that no Babylonian ſcepter awed any one of them, till many years after the ſaid Merodach Baladan. So that, though we confeſs this to have been the moſt moſt antient kingdom of the world, we deny it to have reached the imperial dignity till what we may call very lately, in compariſon of what has been vainly boaſted, and unwarily believed.

THE Babylonians, or Chaldeans, however laid claim to a moſt enormous antiquity, unwilling to be behind-hand with the Egyptians, or any nation elſe, pretending to have regiſtred the tranſactions of 150,000 years [y], according to ſome, or 473,000 years, according to others [z], reckoning down to Alexander, from the time they firſt began to obſerve the ſtars; a moſt monſtrous fable, which needs no refutation, though it may deſerve ſome animadverſion (M).

(M) This extravagant and ſenſeleſs deſire of ſeveral nations to be thought antient has not only been, in good part, the deſtruction of hiſtory, but has, to all appearance, alſo been conſiderably hurtful to religion. Vanity, as we have ſhewn (61), firſt introduced the forging of records to ſupply the want or loſs of them: and as antiquity was thought the moſt honourable diſtinction of a people, when nations, as the Babylonians, Egyptians, or others came to be great and powerful, and to remark how mean a figure their predeceſſors made, in compariſon, but a few years before, if they had any certain tradition about it, and that they had cannot very well be doubted; and to perceive, that perhaps ſome other nations had a great value for themſelves for their antiquity, they were aſhamed of their deficiencies, ſcorned in any degree to be inferior to any other nation under the ſun, and ſo not only run up their antiquities they knew not whither, but removed ſome of their eminent princes, who had lived as yeſterday, into ages far beyond the day of creation, and made gods of them; in their glory exalting themſelves above their fellows, and claiming a right of ſuperiority over them, which perhaps could never have been accounted for but by this method. We have in great meaſure given a glaring inſtance of this in the later Syrians, who, as Joſephus obſerves of them, celebrated the memory of their kings, Hadad and Hazael, in his time, and carrying their ſtatues about in proceſſion, vaunted their great antiquity, though they had not been dead above 1100 years; but by this they certainly meant no more than to ſet off the gods of their own country; for though they were ſtrangers in Syria at firſt, and introduced to ſupply the place of the natives who were carried away captive, they had then been in the country many ages, and reckoned oned themſelves as the original proprietors, juſt like the Iriſh at this day, who, though chiefly deſcended from colonies of Engliſh and Scotch, and not very antient ones either, diſown both the nations, and glory in what they find peculiar to that kingdom, true or falſe; and thus theſe later Syrians, though they had no manner of relation to the antient kings of their country, meant by this vaunting of their gods, Hadad and Hazael, to reflect a diſhonour upon the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, whoſe gods they knew by tradition or hiſtory to have been younger; and hence you have Adad, the firſt of gods (62).

If the want of regular hiſtory was not in ſome meaſure the ſupport of idolatry, which it certainly muſt have been, it was doubtleſs what gave birth to the notion of the world's being eternal. Philoſophers, at a loſs for the origin of things, and deſtitute of a guide to direct them thereto, preſently grounded themſelves upon falſe principles, and thence proceeded to ſubtiliſe themſelves into errors without end, and fancies infinitely abſurd, which were ſoon propagated among the ſtudious men in all branches of literature; ſo that hiſtorians and antiquaries thinking there was room enough to range in, and ſome of them being more greedy of it than others, though they were all deſirous of it, you have by this means the diſorder and diſagreement among antient authors never to be reconciled to one another, either with reſpect to affairs at home or abroad. Upon the whole, hence it is you have the variety of accounts given in by nations, one endeavouring to exceed another, as they have been partly collected (63) to our hands, and as they here follow:

relied on, was in its very infancy tyrannical and despotic; but that it continued so is not to be supposed, except at the same time it be conceived that first prince was succeeded by kings exactly of his own sort. After him it certainly became on a foot with the petty kingdoms of these parts, till the Assyrians, in process of time, laid the foundation whereon it afterwards exalted itself as the Queen of the East. And as from the former it derived its lustre and majesty, nothing is more likely, or indeed more certain, than that it adhered to the maxims and practices of its founder; and the rather, as these Babylonians themselves were Assyrians, descended from Pul the great Assyrian, who immediately gave rise to both the empires, as will be amply made to appear in the sequel. The government therefore of Babylon, like that of Assyria [b], was haughty and despotic, and the sceptre, as should seem, hereditary. The whole centered in the person of the king, all decrees issued from his mouth *; and how could it be less, when he affected even deity and divine worship, as the custom was with these princes? And here, by the way, it may be observed, that this political, not to say blasphemous, arrogance, was but natural to men who had such wide and unwarrantable views of lording it over the whole bulk of mankind. It was one of the most effectual means they could think of, to intimidate the nations who had not yet owned their power, and to restrain those who did, from asserting their right to be governed by whom, and in what manner, they pleased. For without some such bridle upon the superstitious minds of men, it had been next impossible to maintain dominion, over parts far remote from the seat of the imperial residence; and no doubt, the argument they used of having prevailed against all the gods of the nations, and of being mightier far than they [c], carried a conviction with it, which not only served all purposes for the present, but for the future also. And hence it must have been, or upon principles of the same sort, that the great conquerors of the east have always affected retirement from the immediate commerce of others, as too glorious to be beheld by vulgar eyes; a kind of arrogance which implies a superiority not much inferior to what was claimed by these first monarchs of the Assyrian race, as well on the throne of Niniveh, as on that of Babylon;

bylon; and is, as we have ſaid, one of the moſt politic methods of keeping in ſubjection a number of nations of different languages, complexions, and manners, to a man who muſt be a ſtranger to almoſt all of them. Theſe proud potentates, however, adminiſtered their government by officers of ſeveral ſorts, civil and military, and accordingly we find them divided into three claſſes, and ſuppoſed to be choſen from among the graveſt and moſt noble perſonages in all the empire [d]; the firſt had the charge of virgins and their diſpoſal in marriage, and were to judge in matters of adultery, and the like; the ſecond took cognizance of thefts, and the third of the reſt [e]. We find the ſubordinate powers under this mighty emperor, divided into princes, governors, captains, judges, treaſurers, counſellors, and ſheriffs [f], ſo that it is plain, nothing was wanting to keep peace and good order in the empire, and that the civil and military œconomy was under ſevere regulation: as for what relates to religion and ſuperſtitious matters, that will fall under another head.

His officers civil, and military.

THIS great King of Kings [g] had a houſhold equal to the ſublimity of his ſtation, the chief officers of which ſeem to have been the captain of his guard [h], the prince of his eunuchs [i], and the prime miniſter [k], in the nature of the Turkiſh vizier, who more immediately repreſented the perſon of his great maſter. The firſt of theſe had the execution of the arbitrary and ſanguinary commands [l]; the ſecond had charge of the education and ſubſiſtence of the youth of the palace [m], and the latter ſat in the king's gate, as it is called [n], to hear complaints and to paſs judgments. Beſides theſe, there ſeems to have been a maſter of the magicians always at hand [o], to ſatisfy the king upon any thing he might want to know, with regard to futurity and prognoſtication. Laws.

The laws of this empire, as we have hinted above, muſt have been quite vague and uncertain; yet there was one which ſeems to have been irrevocably fixed, and to have been very politically contrived to keep up and increaſe the number of the inhabitants, it being calculated in ſuch manner, that it was almoſt impoſſible for any man to live ſingle, and and designed particularly to encourage the poorer sort to engage themselves in wedlock, which is generally a great burthen to them the world over. By this law no man had it in his power to bestow his own daughters in marriage [u], but they were to be disposed of by the king, or his officers, in the manner we shall relate hereafter.

Punishments

As the laws were vague and changeable, the punishments seem also to have been unfixed, and to have been arbitrary and rigorous to the utmost, and such as might best suit with the degree of rage, which for the time happened to agitate the tyrant's breast. Beheading [w], and cutting to pieces [x], and turning the criminal's house into a dunghill [y], and burning in a fiery furnace [z], are punishments we understand to have been executed by order of the king's of Babylon.

Their religion.

Chaldees their priests.

The religion and boasted learning of the Babylonians are so blended together, that we hardly know how to separate them into distinct heads; for the Chaldees, properly so called, were not only their priests, but also their learned men; whose whole science seems to have been subservient to the purposes of superstition and infatuation. The Chaldeans, as distinguished from the Babylonians, were in some sort distinct from these people, and rather more so than the clergy were from the laity with us. These Chaldeans were as much revered in their country, as the Egyptian priests were in theirs; and are said to have enjoyed the same rank and degree in the kingdom [a]. They were wholly devoted to the business of their superstitious religion, and pretended to prophecy and the gift of prediction by the rules of augury, the flight of birds, and the inspection of victims; and professed the interpretation of dreams, and to explain all the extraordinary accidents and phænomena of nature, as portending good or evil to men or nations, and were thought by their inchantments and invocations to affect mankind either with happiness or with misery [b]. Having by their situation been early addicted to celestial observations, they, instead of conceiving as they ought to have done concerning the omnipotence of the creator and mover of the heavenly bodies, and of being confirmed in a due belief and practice of what had been handed by tradition down to men by Noah and his sons, fell fell into the impious error of esteeming them as gods, and the immediate governors of the world, in subordination, however, to the deity, who was invisible but by his works and the effects of his power [c]. They concluded then, that God had created the stars and great luminaries for the governance of the world, that he had accordingly placed them on high, and made them partakers with him, and substituted them his ministers; and that it was but just and natural they should be praised, and honoured, and extolled; and that it was even the will of God they should be magnified, and feared, and worshipped; just as a king desires his servants should be respected in honour of himself [d].

First Stage of idolatry.

PERSUADED of this they began to build temples, or Sacella, to the stars, to sacrifice to them, to praise them, and to bow down before them, that through their means they might obtain the favour and good-will of God, so that they esteemed them as mediators between God and them. For that there was a necessity for a mediatory office between God and man, is observed [f] to have been a notion that generally obtained among mankind from the beginning; "Conscious of their own meanness, vileness, and impur-
"ity, and unable to conceive how it was possible for them
"of themselves alone to have any access to the all-holy,
"all-glorious, and supreme governor of all things; they
"considered him as too high, and too pure, and themselves
"as too low, and too polluted for such a converse; and
"therefore concluded, that there must be a mediator, by "whose means only they could make any address unto
"him, and by whose intercession alone any of their pe"titions could be accepted of. But no clear revelation be"ing then made of the mediator, whom God had ap"pointed, because as yet he had not been manifested unto
"the world, they took upon them to address themselves "unto him by mediators of their own chusing; and their
"notion of the sun, moon, and stars being, that they "were the tabernacles or habitations of intelligences, "which animated those orbs in the same manner as the "soul of man animates his body, and were the causes of "all their motions, and that those intelligences were of a "middle nature between God and them, they thought

" theſe the propereſt beings to become the mediators be-

" the neareſt to them of all the heavenly bodies, and ge-

" world, they made choice of them in the firſt place for " their Gods Mediators, who were to mediate for them " with the ſupreme God, and procure from him the mer-
" cies and favours which they prayed for, and accordingly
" they directed divine worſhip to them as ſuch; and here
" began all the idolatry that has been practiſed in the " world [g]." For, perſuading themſelves of this doctrine, they became anxious about the moſt effectual means of making their worſhip acceptable to the ſeveral deities, whence they firſt began to build temples or tabernacles to them, as we have ſeen, dedicated to their ſervice, and to be as places of abode for them, but as in matters of this kind there can be no ſtable form, where there is no immediate revelation, and men, actuated either by fear, or avarice, or ambition, or ought elſe, had liberty to pretend to what they knew nothing of, in proceſs of time impoſtors aroſe, and gave out, that they had had it injoined and commanded them from God himſelf, That this ſtar, or that, or all of them, ſhould be worſhipped in this, or that manner, and repreſented under this, or that form, and that none of any age or degree ſhould be exempt from the worſhip thereof; and this they impudently gave out, in a ſolemn manner, for revelation. Upon this it was, that men began to furniſh the Sacella, tabernacles, or temples, with images, and to erect the ſame under trees, and upon the tops of hills or mountains; and from henceforward they aſſembled themſelves together to pay them worſhip, and began to hope for all good, and to dread all evil, as proceeding from them, and to honour them with deepeſt reverence, and to fear them *; and their prieſts, ſenſible of the ſweets of the trade, began to think of forms of duty and practice to be obſerved by the credulous and deluded multitude †. Other impoſtors there were who improved on the firſt, and pretended to have been honoured with particular inſtructions from particular ſtars, concerning the exact mode of the worſhip due or peculiar to them, and what

what ought, and what ought not, to be done to pleaſe them; ſo that, in proceſs of time, the name of God became obliterated among them; and the moſt ſtupid idolatry poſſeſſed the whole place of the true religion [h].

SUCH was the riſe of idolatry and the firſt ſteps of its progreſs, than which nothing can be more natural to conceive, and ſuch were the original Sabian doctrines, which, taking root firſt among the Chaldeans, did afterwards ſpread their branches ſo far as to over-ſhadow, at one time, all the nations of the eaſt with their prophane obſcurity. For it muſt be difficult to conceive, how men could have been deceived into ſo groſs an abſurdity, as to worſhip wood, ſtone, or metal, formed and faſhioned by their own hands, if it be not at the ſame time allowed, that they muſt have imagined their images to have been, ſome how or other, animated or informed with a ſupernatural power, by ſome ſupernatural means. A late author [i] thinks it more natural to ſuppoſe, that their loſs to know how to addreſs themſelves to the planets, when they were beneath the horizon, was what firſt ſuggeſted to them the uſe of images; for that, whenever they paid their devotions to any of them in their tabernacles, or Sacella, they directed their worſhip towards the planet, which they have thought of none effect, when he was abſent and hidden from ſight; and that therefore they thought to ſupply his abſence by a repreſentation: Thus it may have been, though it may be as natural to ſuppoſe, that as their prieſts obſerved the ſtars as their gods, and made them the chief ſubject of their ſtudy, and perſuaded themſelves that each ſtar or planet was actuated by an intelligence, they gave out to the people, from time to time, that thoſe ſuperior beings had revealed their will to them, juſt as their crazy imaginations, or deſigning craft, may have ſuggeſted to them.

LET this have been either this way or that way, it is certain that the firſt image worſhippers did not pretend to pay adoration to uninformed wood, ſtone, or metal, and that the Sabians, in their tranſition from planet-worſhip to image-worſhip, pretended to have infuſed the virtues of the planet into the image that was meant to repreſent it; which they thought to effect by forms of conſecration, and by various incantations, whereby to draw down from the ſtars their ſeveral intelligences into their reſpective idols; and hence hence came all the foolery of Teleſms [k], or Taliſmans, and upon theſe pretended principles of communicative operation all the branches of magic and ſorcery muſt have had their foundation.

THAT this was the firſt origin of image-worſhip is evident, and that the ſame was firſt derived from the heavenly bodies, the moſt conſpicuous and glorious to ſight, is evident by the primary gods of the heathen in general, which are Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Venus, and Diana; by which we can underſtand no other than the ſun, and moon, and the five greateſt luminaries next to them [l].

THIS was the religion of the Babylonians, Aſſyrians, and Meſopotamians, even before the days of Abraham; nay in the days of Enos, the ſon of Seth [m]; whoſe deſcendants are ſaid to have been the firſt that cultivated aſtronomy and aſtrology [n]; the Sabians themſelves boaſting the origin of their religion from Seth, and pretending to have been denominated from a ſon of his called Sabius, as alſo to have among them what they call the book of Seth, written by that ſame patriarch [o].

THIS was the ſtate of the old Babylonian religion, till they came to deify mortal men as well as the celeſtial bodies. In this we are apt to think they were not the firſt, and that the Syrians, whoſe empire was confeſſedly older than either the Aſſyrian or Babylonian [p], ſhewed them the way, by deifying their great kings, Benhadad the ſecond and Hazael [q]. A late learned author [r] is inclined to think, that the firſt Sabians, or idolaters, deſirous to have all the mediation poſſible with the ſupreme God, took it into their heads, that good men had a power with him to intercede for them, and that they deified many of thoſe they thought to be ſuch, and that thus they added to their polytheiſm: This is allowing much in favour of them, and is reflecting not a little upon the purity of the Roman church, which teaches the ſame doctrine, and allows of the ſame practice; and calls to our mind, how frequently Rome is ſuppoſed to be ſignified under the type of Babylon; and, perhaps, there may not be ſo wide a difference between ſome parts of the two religions, as may be generally imagined. But to wave this, as foreign to our purpose, we should rather chuse to think, that they deified their greatest and most powerful men, and that however they may have paid the same honour to men of virtue, their most conspicuous gods of this class were their greatest warriors and most potent kings.

ACCORDING to this we are told [s], That by the vain-glory of men idols entered into the world . . . That, in process of time, an ungodly custom grown strong was kept as a law, and graven images were worshipped by the commandment of kings, or [as it is in the margin] tyrants. That whom men could not honour in presence, because they dwelt far off, they took the counterfeit of his visage from far, and made an express image of a king, whom they honoured, to the end, that, by their forwardness, they might flatter him that was absent, as if he was present. This was most certainly the case with regard to the deification of kings, who could not be contented with being less than gods. The same author [t] assigns two other reasons for this practice, which must strongly cooperate with the former; first, "The grief of a parent "for his child untimely snatched away, whose image he "may have been tempted to honour as God when dead, "and to deliver to those beneath, or in subjection to him, "ceremonies and sacrifices of duty and commemoration;" and secondly, "The skill of the workman, who by his "art might contribute greatly to the deception of the ig"norant; for that, ambitious to flatter some great man, "he may have exerted all in his power to represent him "beyond what he truly was, and so, by the beauty of his "work, captivate and delude the unwary multitude, who "took him now for a god, whom a little before they ho"noured but as man; and that thus men, subject ei"ther to calamity or tyranny, did ascribe unto stones and "stocks the incommunicable name of God."

SUCH were the causes of idolizing dead men, tyranny to compel to it, immoderate affection to consent to it, and the exquisite skill of the workman to allure to it. That the Assyrians and Babylonians were, in a particular manner, obnoxious to the first of these, must appear by the histories of their several kings, who seem, at least, to have been as absolute abſolute tyrants as were ever ſuffered to live; and that they did give into this error is plain, both by ſacred authors and prophane writers; theſe laſt for the moſt part, aſſerting, That the Aſſyrians were the people that firſt ſhewed the example of it to others; though that this was falſe, we have ſeen in the hiſtory of the Syrians, who before them deified their great kings [u].

Pul meant by Belus.

HOWEVER, it was an opinion, that Ninus was the firſt that ſet up images to be worſhipped, and particularly one to his father Belus [w], and granted privileges and pardons to thoſe who reſorted to it. Who this Ninus ſhould have been but Tiglathpileſar, the ſon of Pul, or Belus, in ſcripture, we know not, and therefore we muſt conclude, that Pul, and none other, was the firſt that was worſhipped in theſe parts as a god [x], and that conſequently he, who was the undoubted founder of the empires both of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, and none other, was the boaſted Belus of the later Babylonians, Phœnicians, and others, where the deſcendants of his family extended the dominion he had founded.

His temple.

THIS Belus had a temple erected to him in the city of Babylon, and was revered as their primary god, he being the firſt founder of all the Aſſyrian and Babylonian grandeur, and ſource of all the reverence and adoration claimed by his ſucceſſors, both at Babylon and Niniveh. To him they erected the tower, we have formerly deſcribed, ſo famous in all ages ſince; though it ſhould ſeem, that the honour of this tower or temple was meant to be divided between him and the true God. This building, as we have obſerved before, conſiſted of eight towers raiſed upon one another, and in the uppermoſt was a bed magnificently ſet forth, and a golden table near it, but no image was here [y]; nor was any body ſuffered to be here in the night but a particular woman, who, as the prieſts gave out, was in an eſpecial manner preferred by the god before all others (O). In this place they taught, that he was wont to come and repose himself [z]; for that, according to this, they must have held him to have been the supreme over all, the living and self-subsisting, who either could not be represented, or would not bear such presumption in them as to offer at it. But beneath this there was another temple, where there was a gigantic image of Jupiter, [Belus] all of gold, with a table before him of the same metal: his throne was gold also, as was all the furniture about him; insomuch, that the whole work was valued at 800 talents of gold [a]. This, it seems, was not the only statue in this temple; for, we think, we read of another all of solid gold, and twelve cubits in height [b]; but whether our author really designs to describe two distinct idols, by giving the weight of the one, and the dimensions of the other, or whether he gives the weight and the dimensions above as belonging to one and the same, is not quite clear.

Partly erected to him, and partly to the true God.

However, this great Jupiter, who, we think, cannot possibly be any other than the great Pul, or Belus, by being thus placed in subordination, as should seem, to the great and supreme God, was exalted to the utmost height they could raise him; and by this they must, to all appearance, have implied, that Belus, or Pul, divided the empire of the universe with him, and that as he was Lord above, the other was lord below; that as the other was the God of heaven, the other was at least delegated god on earth, and invested with all power here, by the immediate appointment of the invisible ruler of all things. Thus the thing seems to have been by this account of the temple at Babylon (P), and as it is perfectly of a piece with their superstitious persuasions, and agreeable to what we may safely conceive concerning this their first warrior, we know not how to think otherwise; and wonder not at what has been since exaggerated, concerning the age and pre-eminence of this great Belus.

As

(P) It may be disputed, whether or no the Babylonians did not actually mean the sun, rather than God himself. We are told, they never represented the sun, or, at least, that the Syrians never did (66), who derived their religion from these people, concluding it ridiculous to represent what was so gloriously conspicuous

(66) See vol. ii. p. 289.

As there were two gods in this temple and tower, there belonged to it alſo two altars; they ſtood without, one of gold of a moderate ſize, and another much larger; upon the golden altar none but ſucking victims might be ſacrificed [c], and on the great one none that were not full grown [d]; concerning which we leave the reader to make his own conjectures, only obſerving, that as it was evidently two diſtinct gods they ſacrificed to, the golden altar ſeems to have been devoted to the ſupreme God, and the other to his ſubordinate Jupiter; for by the ſucking victims they ſeem to have meant, that they peculiarly belonged to him as the nouriſher of all things, and that the full-grown ones, being brought to the perfection he deſigned them, he committed them to the care and government of his vice-gerent below, who therefore had none but full-grown creatures ſacrificed to him. But as here they plainly ſacrificed to them in diſtinction of each, they at other times ſeem to have ſacrificed to them in common; for the prieſts reckoned, that they, every year, upon the great altar, burnt 100,000 talents of fragrant libanotus [e]; this may ſeem to have been intended for them both, but that it may as likely have been intended as an acknowledgment from Belus to the God above him, might be inſiſted on, ſo far as it is poſſible to be certain in things of ſuch an ambiguous nature, were we a little fonder than we are of building upon conjecture. The two altars, and the different ſacrifices upon them.

SUCH was the god Belus among the Babylonians, and ſuch his temple and the rank he held in it; but that he was the inventor of the ſidereal ſcience, or of aſtrology, as ſome would [f] have it, muſt not be wondered at, after what has cuous (67), and we have ſuppoſed, that they ſometimes paid adoration to the ſun and moon immediately (68); but it does not ſeem likely, that theſe Babylonians ſhould ever give it out, that the ſun himſelf was wont to come and repoſe himſelf upon the top of this tower, as we have ſeen; they never could have perſuaded the people to that abſurdity; ſo that if they had not an immediate view to the great God, in thus leaving his temple free from images, they muſt have deſigned it for the intelligence of the ſun, and that may with them have amounted pretty much to the ſame thing.

(67) Ibid. (68) See vol. ii. p. 350.

has been attributed to his daughter-in-law Semiramis, as we have partly ſeen already [g], and as we ſhall ſee farther in a more proper place. Nor muſt this ſame Belus, or Baal, be confounded with the others we read of in ſcripture, before the riſe of the Aſſyrian empire, as the Baal-peor of the Moabites [h], the Baal, or Moloch, of the Ammonites; the title ſignifies lord with all theſe people, who, and particularly all ſuch as are ſaid to have paſſed their ſeed through fire, meant thereby the ſun, whoſe heat being, as it were, the life of all things, they accounted the heat of fire to be ſacred; which muſt have been one of the firſt doctrines of the Sabians in Chaldea (Q), who, as we have ſaid, firſt broached this error, and communicated the ſame, by degrees, to the nations round about. This appears by what we read of Abraham, who left his country, on the other ſide of the Euphrates, for the idolatries of the land [k], and, to avoid them, came into the land of Canaan, where he found the ſentiments and practices of men more conformable to religion and the duties we owe to God; for Melchiſedec was then alive in Canaan, and ſtiled the prieſt of the moſt high God [l], and the people were, for the moſt part, in a ſtate of purity in matters of religion, as all the nations about muſt alſo have been [m]; nay, in theſe days we do not find, that even Egypt was much, if at all, infected with idolatry; ſo that whatever the Greeks may pretend of the Egyptians, that they brought idols and falſe gods into faſhion [n], the contrary appears by the book of Geneſis, which ſufficiently informs us, that while the country on the other ſide of the Euphrates was thoroughly polluted with all abominations, the countries on this ſide were as yet ſtrangers to them. Nothing then is plainer, than that all we have ſaid concerning the religion of the Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Edomites, Amalekites, Canaanites, and Philiſtines, is only the old Sabian religion of the Chaldees; ſo that that we ſhall not here need to repeat what we have ſo fully exhibited in the hiſtories of thoſe ſeveral nations.

BUT upon the building of Babylon by the Aſſyrians, the old religion, it ſeems, fell into ſome diſcredit, and eſpecially the more inferior branches of it; nor can it well be doubted, but that if ever they had, before the days of Pul, deified any heroes, he muſt have ſoared above them all, who could not properly be called the gods of the Babylonians before the city itſelf was built; for as much is granted by all authors, who ſuppoſe Belus to have been the immediate founder of the Aſſyrian greatneſs, and therefore deified; but who this Belus was we may read in ſcripture [o], and be confirmed in a certainty thereof by Ptolemy's canon, and therefore we are not to look ſo far back as Nimrod, or any man elſe that lived a thouſand years or more after him. Hence it may appear, that by Bel, or Baal, the Babylonians underſtood either the ſun, or their founder Pul; but whether or no they tranſlated him into the ſun, or whether they kept their planet-worſhip and their heroe-worſhip ſo diſtinct as never to confound them with each other, may be paſt our ſolution, and a point which might draw us into a needleſs length.

Succoth Benoth, the Aſſyrian Venus.

THE deity next in order to this ſeems to have been the Venus of later days in the weſt, and that ſhe was no other than the goddeſs Aſtarte of the Phœnicians, may be gathered moſt evidently from what is to follow. Succoth Benoth is mentioned as an idol of the Babylonians [p], though it was apparently rather the ſhrine, or ſhrines, of an idol belonging to ſome deity we have ſince tranſlated into the laſcivious goddeſs Venus, for the import of the word is, the tabernacles of Benoth, or, the tabernacles of the daughters [q], though there are thoſe who render them, a tabernacle of wings [r], and ſuppoſe the idol itſelf to have been repreſented as a hen brooding over her chickens, and that ſhe was deſigned in honour of the conſtellation, called vulgarly, the hen and chickens, but more learnedly the Pleiades; but this a dream ſeemingly. It is more likely, that theſe tabernacles of the daughters were for Venus, whom the Babylonians called [s] Mylitta, ſignifying Genetrix, or Mother, or Urania, as the Greeks will have it, and to this goddeſs, the daughters of the country, or the wo-women, were, once in their life-time, bound to make a ſacrifice of their modeſty and virtue, a practice which will be found among the cuſtoms of this people. And hence it is, that a very learned author [t] gathers her not only to have been our Venus, but hence it is alſo, that he derives the very name itſelf from Benoth, by changing the B for a V, and the Theta for a Sigma, whence you will have Venos (R). This ſeems partly confirmed by an author, who ſeems to call her Binos; but particularly by what we are told of a city in Africa, called Sicca Venerea [w], a name which ſeems to have been tranſported from Phœnice, and evidently formed from this Siccoth, or Succoth, Benoth; and where there was a temple, where women were obliged to purchaſe their marriage-money by the proſtitution of their bodies [x]. Her temples ſeem to have been fixed at this place, and at Aphac [y], and at Babylon [z], and may likewiſe have been erected at other places; but for the convenience of ſuch as had not ſuch a building dedicated among them, the prieſts ſeem to have taken them into their conſideration, and to have carried ſmall tabernacles, or models of the ſeveral temples, upon their ſhoulders, for the public emolument and their own gain for their labour.

The derivation of the name of Venus.

Both maſculine and feminine.

THIS god, or goddeſs, for ſhe is underſtood to have been both Mars and Venus, though here placed ſecond to Belus, is generally underſtood to have been of much greater antiquity than the times we are ſure he lived in; but this is upon a ſuppoſition, that the prophane hiſtorians, poets, and mythologiſts are not out in the length of their computations, and hence you have an argument of her antiquity deduced from the words of Æſchylus [a], who calls Phœnicia the land of Aphrodite, or Venus, to which the ſcholiaſt ſubjoins, that ſo it was called, becauſe it was ſacred to her on the account of Byblus and Libanus, where ſtood her temple at Aphac [b]; but this may be no very great argu-argument to prove it; for if the Aſſyrians, whence the Phœnicians had her, are not ſo very antient as pretended, this deity muſt be deprived of the veneration conceived for it on account of its years. Though the date of this idol will not much depend upon the riſe of the Aſſyrian, or Babylonian empire, if it was a ſtar they meant by this Venus; for we have already obſerved, that the Chaldees, as they are called, worſhipped the ſtars by images before they conſecrated the Aſſyrian Belus, or perhaps any other mortal man; ſo that it may be worth the while juſt to enquire, whether or no this idol was really deſigned to repreſent ſome ſtar from among the hoſt of heaven, or ſome woman who may have been preferred to deification, for reaſons, in thoſe days, thought meritorious? or whether, as in the caſe of Baal, both a planet and a perſon may have been intended, and reciprocally tranſlated into each other?

We have ſeen, by ſome parallel circumſtances, that ſhe was, to all appearance, the ſame with the Phœnician Aſtarte, and we ſhall produce ſeveral others, to confirm the ſame, in the courſe of this ſubject. In the mean time, to begin with this Benoth, from whom the whole tribe of great goddeſſes ſeem to be derived; She is called the celeſtial Venus, and ſaid to have been firſt of all worſhipped by the Aſſyrians [c], whereby, though our author, it is moſt likely, means the Syrians properly ſo called, we ſhall plainly diſcover, that the former were the firſt authors of this worſhip, and tranſmitted it to the latter. This goddeſs was of both ſexes, and accordingly it was the cuſtom to worſhip her ſometimes in the habit of a man, and ſometimes in the habit of a woman [d], the men and women mutually changing dreſſes with each other [e], whence it is ſuppoſed, that Moſes forbids [f] the woman to wear what pertaineth to the man, or a man to put on a woman's garment. According to this, the worſhip of this planet, or idol, muſt have been of very antient date; and that the words of the text before us, are meant of this mode of worſhiping, is underſtood by Maimonides [g], who obſerves, that in the book of magic, compoſed by one Centir, as he is corruptly [h] called, it is written, that a man ſhould put on the flowered garments of a woman, when he ſtood before the the ſtar called Venus, and that a woman ſhould put on the arms and armour of a man, when ſhe ſtood before the ſtar called Mars [i]; and hence the Aſſyrian prieſts are ſaid [k] to have been unfit to wait on the goddeſs Venus, except they effeminated their countenance, and aſſumed all the ſoftneſs and dreſs of a woman. And hence a Greek author [l], who calls her the moon, ſays, that the men ſacrificed to her in the habit of a woman, and the women in the habit of a man, and the reaſon, becauſe ſhe was both maſculine and feminine; whereby it is plain, that it is this Aſſyrian Venus he means, though, being tranſlated into Greece, he may not exactly have meant the ſame. That this Uranian or celeſtial Venus of the Aſſyrians was the moon, cannot be doubted, by the rank ſhe holds next to Bel, or the ſun; and that ſhe was ſo, will be immediately ſeen by what we certainly know of her, under other names: and that ſhe was of both ſexes, will appear as plain by the ſame evidence. For to bring her nearer to us, we ſhall find ſhe was the ſame with the Syrian goddeſs.

She is the ſame with the great Syrian goddeſs.

THIS Syrian goddeſs, as we have her deſcribed to us, and by her rites, was no other than the celeſtial Venus of the Aſſyrians. She was called Juno, and the ſtatue of her was contrived ſo as to partake of Minerva, Venus, Luna, Rhea, Diana, Nemeſis, and the Deſtinies, as if ſhe included them all, and that ſo ſhe did has been ſufficiently proved by very great men [m]. She was drawn, or ſupported, by lions, ſhe had rays on her head, and a tower, and was girt with the ceſtus, or girdle of the celeſtial Venus [n], and as ſhe was contrived to be the ſource of all idolatry, in honour of the female ſex; ſo we find her to have been equally honoured by Egyptians, Indians, Ethiopians, Medes, Armenians, and Babylonians [o], who all came in pilgrimage to this mighty goddeſs of Hierapolis, or the Holy City, which, in this reſpect, ſeems to have ſucceeded the city of Babylon, whence ſhe had been chaſed by the Perſians. Her eunuch prieſts, who took on them the habit and offices of women [p], declare her to have been one and the ſame with the Aſſyrian Mylitta; and the Babylonians, who, among others, are ſaid to have paid liberal contributions to her, abundantly confirm it.

If then it appears, that this great Syrian goddeſs was no other than the celeſtial Venus of the Aſſyrians, the ſame will as evidently appear of the Phœnician Aſtarte. We have ſeen her the Queen of Heaven [q], the Moon, Lucifer, Juno, Venus, Minerva, and Io [r], and married to an Aſſyrian [s]. We have ſeen her the luſtful goddeſs [t], and the warlike deity [u], and accordingly addreſſed to under both ſexes; nor need we cite the monſtrous effeminacies of the men at Aphac [w], or the impudent and mercenary proſtitution of the women at Byblus [x], to prove, that the one is in general a very faithful copy of the other; for as to the proſtitution of the women in particular, it muſt be confeſſed to owe its origin to an an infamous cuſtom, among the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, to be mentioned hereafter. She is the ſame with the Aſtarte of the Phœnicians.

Nor ſhall we find, that the Atargatis, or Derceto [y] of the proper Paleſtine in general, or of Aſcalon in particular, was any other than the Babylonian or Aſſyrian Venus. For although ſhe is made diſtinct from the great Venus, and is ſaid to have undergone her diſpleaſure, and in conſequence of that to have ſuffered a metamorphoſis into a fiſh [z]; the worſhip that was paid to that animal, under the eye of the great goddeſs at Hierapolis, declares her to have been the ſame; and this is not conjecture only, for Atargatis is ſaid to have been worſhipped at Hierapolis, by a very judicious author [a], who, in ſo ſaying, moſt evidently confounds her with the Syrian goddeſs, and makes them one and the ſame. Nor is he ſingle in this, for others [b] do the ſame, and particularly one [c], who calls her the mother of the gods, and Aſtarte, and the Hierapolitan, or Aſſyrian, goddeſs. In ſhort, Atargatis was alſo Venus, and Juno, and Minerva, and the Syrian goddeſs [d], and conſequently the celeſtial Venus of the Aſſyrians. That ſhe muſt, at the ſame time, have been Aſtarte, we need not ſay; but that we may depend as little upon probability as we can, we have an author who ſays, that the Syrians abſtained from fiſh, in regard to the rites of Aſtarte; ſo that we ſee her the ſame goddeſs tranſported from the banks of the Euphrates, into which ſhe is ſaid firſt to have plunged herſelf; to eſcape the fury of the [e] inexorable Typhon She is the ſame with Derceto of Aſcalon.

phon (S); and but juſt varied ſo as to give each particular country the honour of having an original of its own. So the Syrians, who ſeem to have received her firſt, and were neareſt to the place of her native abode, preſerved her, it is likely, in the moſt genuine form; the Phœnicians, who were next, altered her no farther than to make her a Phœnician; and the Philiſtines, or Aſcalonites, who were a little farther off, that they might make her their own alſo, turn her into a monſter, woman upwards and fiſh downwards [g], and rather than not have her their own, are willing to allow her to have been in ſubordination to ſome other goddeſs, who had power over her to the degree of chaſtiſing her by a change from her firſt ſhape [h].

It appears then, that all this adoration to this various goddeſs came from Aſſyria and Babylonia, and that it was eſtabliſhed in theſe countries by the prevailing might of thoſe two potent empires, who ſucceſſively ſubjugated all theſe parts; and while they flouriſhed, it is likely, they maintained a ſtrict uniformity of worſhip and tradition among them; but theſe empires being aboliſhed by the Perſians, who had an averſion to all this Sabianiſm, each of them forgetful of the ſource whence they derived their ſuperſtitions, claimed them as peculiar to themſelves, and new modelled them accordingly.

Is worſhipped as Semiramis.

And now it may not be amiſs to inquire, how far the tradition of Semiramis quadrates with what we are told of this goddeſs; as alſo, whether or no we cannot from thence make it out, that ſhe, as well as the moon, the earth, or any other ſubject, may have been adored as the celeſtial Venus, or Syrian goddeſs. Her preſence in the temple at Hierapolis [i] is as ſtrong an argument as any, that the ſuperſtition there migrated from Babylon; and her inferior degree [k] there will argue nothing againſt her original ſuperiority, if it be remembered, that this temple was built by Stratonice [l] the wife of Antiochus Soter, who may have had ſome pique to the memory of Semiramis, whom ſhe may have remembered with envy, and therefore reſolved reſolved to degrade her; if it may not rather be attributed to the ſenſeleſs caprice, or ſome ſtrange inconſiſtence with relation to the Aſſyrian heroine, whom they might ſome how or other, and in ſome caſes, make inferior to herſelf. Theſe are points not for us to dive into.

THUS much is certain, we ſhall in the tradition of Semiramis find ſo many circumſtances to make us believe ſhe was worſhipped as the ſupreme goddeſs of the Babylonians, that few will heſitate perhaps a moment to be of this opinion. We have ſeen her born of a goddeſs at Aſcalon [m], who, for the ſhame of conceiving her, plunged herſelf into a lake, and became a fiſh [n]; and hence fiſh are ſaid to have been worſhipped, though indeed not ſo much upon her own account, as ſhould ſeem, as on account of her mother Derceto, or Atargatis, who underwent this transformation. We have ſeen her miraculouſly fed by doves or pigeons in a deſart [o], and hence that bird became ſacred; hence it ſhould ſeem, and from other fabulous circumſtances it is, that you have the dove from the land of Aſſyria [p]. We have ſeen it predicted, that ſhe ſhould not die, but vaniſh from the ſight of men, and obtain divine honours from the Aſiatic nations [q]. We have ſeen it was pretended, that ſhe made her exit in the form of a dove, and that ſhe went off attended by a flight of them [r]; and hence another reaſon is given why the dove became ſacred. We have ſeen her the abandoned proſtitute [s], and the martial heroine [t]; and hence ſhe may have been the celeſtial Venus adored under both ſexes, and the Phœnician Aſtarte, now painted in arms [u], and now repreſented as the patroneſs of lewdneſs and effeminacy [w]. In ſhort, we have ſeen her the firſt that made eunuchs [x]; and hence we may have the origin of the eunuch prieſts, or Galli, who attended upon the Syrian goddeſs [y]; which was certainly more the caſe than what is pretended in the idle ſtory of Combabus and Stratonice [z], who, being wife to one of the Seleucidæ, cidæ, lived some hundreds of years after Semiramis, and who, as we have suggested above, may have affected to raise herself upon the depression of this great Babylonian queen, who is said even to have first built the temple at Hierapolis [a], which, though it is certainly false, may yet argue the tradition to have been, that she was meant by the celestial Venus, or the Syrian goddess, and that so she was must appear still farther, by her being called Rhea [b], Nemesis [c], and the like, if there could be any necessity farther to inculcate this opinion, after such variety of corroborating evidence.

Upon the whole, we think it self-evident to conclude, that the celestial Venus of the Assyrians, the Astarte of the Phœnicians, and the Derceto, or Atargatis, of the later Philistines were all derived from Semiramis, or whatever else her true name was, the first Babylonian foundress; who seems to have been translated into the bright and various Queen of Heaven, the moon, as Belus, or Pul, the first Assyrian monarch, was into the sun; and that whatever the mythologists and allegoricians may pretend by explaining all this worship into an adoration of the universe, or nature, or the earth, or any other element, which is what we are very ready to grant them, and what we may professedly treat of in the mythology of the Greeks, as we have partly already in the theology of the Egyptians [d]; yet nothing is more certain, than that all the Jupiters and Junos, and the rest who are supposed to have been once mortal, or conversant here on earth, are all derived from this source, and that on this Assyrian or Babylonian foundation the whole superstructure of the Greek polytheism and idolatry was raised. For the Greeks had their religion from the Phœnicians partly, and partly from the Egyptians, who had theirs from the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, as may be pretty clearly gathered from the apparent religious state of the countries on this and that side of the Euphrates in the days of Abraham, as we have hinted before. The Egyptians seem in time, indeed, to have erected a system of their own, though not very widely different from the Babylonian, as any body that will compare them together will at the first glance perceive.

The

The Phœnicians, who had equally communication with the two nations, ſeem to have mixed the variations in each together, and we have plainly ſeen, that they worſhipped what the Babylonians worſhipped, what had been impoſed on them by the tyranny of that empire; in ſhort, Aſtarte, who, as we have proved as plain as things of this nature can be proved, was the celeſtial Venus of the Babylonians, was alſo as plain the Egyptian godddeſs Iſis [e]. And indeed there was hardly any difference as to the main points between the religion of thoſe two great and antient nations, who being in conſtant rivalſhip with each other, and emulous of ſurpaſſing each other, you thence have the ſeeming differences between them in religious matters, the Egyptians particularly contending the honour of antiquity * and ſanctity with the Babylonians, though by the Moſaic hiſtory they muſt yield to theſe laſt; nor is there any diſcrepancy between their great and favourite gods, but barely in the names they have conferred on them, to evince them reciprocally their own. Nor is there any thing plainer than that there was, in the main, a perfect uniformity between all the nations on both ſides of the Euphrates, as to the fundamentals of their religion; and conſequently, if we fix the place whence they were branched, which we think we have done, we have, at the ſame time, a clue at hand to guide us through the immenſe labyrinth of heatheniſm and idolatry: But for want of this certain ſtand to take the ſurvey from; for want of a due attention to the natural progreſs of idolatry, but eſpecially by not accommodating the fabulous writings of prophane writers to the tenor of ſcripture, which plainly points out to us, who were the firſt great Aſſyrians or Babylonians that were deified and tranſlated; our mythologiſts have rambled backwards to Noah, and Nimrod, and the whole tribe of the poſtdiluvian patriarchs, to diſcover in them what is deſigned more particularly for mortal men, who lived many and many ages after them; whereby they have moſt ſtrangely perplexed this part of learning, which would be full intricate enough without this help towards making it the more ſo, and, what is worſe, have caſt an impenetrable miſt upon the firſt days of profane hiſtory, which moſt certainly is fabulous, and quite ſo, if we make a very few few exceptions, till about the firſt riſe of the Babylonian empire, in the reign of Joſiah king of Judah. For not only the art or method of writing a regular hiſtory was not diſcovered, or at leaſt practiſed, as ſhould ſeem, till the days of Herodotus, who lived in about the middle of the Perſian empire; but the gods of all theſe nations being ſuppoſed to have been once meer men, and no more, the prieſts and others had no way to derive a depth of veneration for them, but by making them antient and fabulous, and by that means removing them as far as poſſible from the then race of mankind. If we had no other inſtance of this than Sanchoniatho's Phœnician Hiſtory [f], it would be abundantly ſufficient to juſtify us in what we ſay; and if we had no other example of this affectation than that of the Syrians in the days of Joſephus, who in thoſe days boaſted of the antiquity of their great god Adad, who was one of their deified kings [g], who, at moſt, did not live above 901 years before Chriſt [h]; it might be deemed enough for our purpoſe. And here we cannot but note a common inaccuracy, even in the moſt learned, who, inattentive to the hiſtory of the antient empire of Syria, ſuppoſe this Adad to have been an Aſſyrian or Babylonian deity [i], and only, as ſhould ſeem, becauſe he is in prophane authors called an Aſſyrian, forgetting, that the name of Aſſyria extended itſelf over all Syria and the adjacent parts [k]. He was then, to all appearance, no Babylonian deity, but one who had been tranſlated into the heavens by the antient Syrians, and, as ſhould ſeem, revived again after the deſtruction of the Babylonian empire, whoſe new gods muſt have brought him into diſcredit [l], not only as having proved too weak for the gods of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, but alſo as being a ſtranger to the people tranſplanted into theſe parts [m], in the room of the firſt inhabitants, by the ſucceſſors of Pul; though ſome how or other received again into veneration, as we have obſerved before [n]. However, Adad was alſo the ſun as well as Bel, or Baal, Oſiris, and others. And this is what we have thought neceſſary to premiſe preparatorily to what we ſhall hereafter have to ſay of the Greek

Adad not properly a Babylonian deity.

Greek mythology, and which we have on purpoſe deferred, till we came to this place, as the moſt proper for a reſearch of this nature.

Fiſhes and Doves worſhipped, and whence.

To return to our celeſtial Venus, or Syrian goddeſs, or Aſtarte, or Derceto, or Semiramis, we find, that fiſhes [o] and doves [p] were peculiarly ſacred to her; and whence this ſuperſtition took birth we have partly ſeen in the metamorphoſis of Derceto [q], and the birth, education, and apotheoſis of Semiramis [r], and we have ſeen, that both at Aſcalon [s] and Hierapolis [t] they were equally revered; ſo that they may well deſerve to be conſidered as deities with this people, and are ſeemingly ſo allied to this great and multiplied goddeſs, that, though we have ſome other deities of this nation, who may deſerve to take place of them, we have not been able to ſeparate them from their great miſtreſs. As for fiſhes in particular, they are ſaid to have been revered by the Syrians, or the Aſſyrians rather, not only on account of the metramorphoſis above [u], but alſo becauſe they were ſaid to have ſaved one Derce, [Derceto] a daughter to Venus, who happened to fall into the ſea [w], or becauſe ſhe took refuge among the fiſh when ſhe fled from Typhon [x]. It is ſaid, that Venus and Cupid being in Syria on the banks of the Euphrates, the giant Typhon came ſuddenly upon them, and made them jump into the river, and take on them the form of fiſhes to ſave themſelves [y]; in ſhort, Venus and Cupid are ſaid to have been tranſlated into the zodiacal ſign called Piſces [z]; ſuch were the reaſons given why they not only abſtained from fiſh, but worſhipped them likewiſe. As for doves, they ſeem to have been worſhipped as ſymbols only of luſt and fondneſs, which made up part of their goddeſs's character (T); but of theſe we have ſaid enough in this place [a].

Salambo. Salambo, as ſhe is called [b], was alſo a goddeſs of the Aſſyrians or Babylonians, and is plainly Aſtarte, or any other of the goddeſſes whom we have ſhewn to have been the ſame with her; but we particularly mention Aſtarte, becauſe this Salambo, or Salambas, is ſaid to have been a demon, or goddeſs, who was eternally roaming up and down, and mourning her loſt Adonis [c], ſo that we need add nothing farther concerning her.

Sheſhach. Shach, Saca, or Sheſhach, is another god, or goddeſs, of the Babylonians as uſually reckoned [d], and ſuppoſed to have been the earth, and to have been the ſame Romans afterwards worſhipped under the names of Tellus and Ops [e], and if ſo, ſhe was partly the ſame with Mylitta, or the Syrian goddeſs, whom we have already ſeen under the title of Rhea, and the mother of the gods [f], in whom all theſe titles and imaginary deities are ſaid plainly to have centered. However, there is ſome doubt, whether or no ſhe may not be more properly a Perſian goddeſs [g] than a Babylonian; though that ſhe was the latter, may appear to ſatisfaction from the prophet [h]; who calls Babylon the land of Sheſhac, before the Perſians aroſe to any thing like the height they afterwards did; and at a time when Babylon, to all appearance, had diſdained to have received any thing of this nature from them. In commemoration of this goddeſs, the Babylonians were wont to celebrate a feſtival for ſeveral days together, which we ſhall take notice of among the cuſtoms of this people, and which confeſſedly gave birth to the Saturnalia at Rome.

Nebo. Nebo, or Nabo, was alſo an Aſſyrian or Babylonian deity [i], and his name is often compounded in thoſe of the Aſſyrian and Babylonian kings [k]; he therefore may be concluded cluded to have once been in high account with them, and bids fair to have been one of their moſt antient gods. He is thought to have been the Chemoſh, or the Baal-peor, of the Moabites, and accordingly we have formerly mentioned him in the religion of Moab [l], and ſaid almoſt as much of him as we know. However, we have to add, that by the prophet he is joined with Bel [m], and ſuppoſed generally to have been the ſun, and therefore may have been prior to this latter, whom we have aſſerted to have been the deified Pul, the firſt Aſſyrian [n], who may, by the viciſſitude of things, have taken place of him; though there are others who are of another mind, and conceive, that, by their being joined together, we are rather to underſtand him to have been deſigned for the moon [o], Bel being, for certain, known to have ſtood for the ſun, concluding it to be a ſenſeleſs tautology to mention the ſame deity, at the ſame time, under different names; ſo that, inſtead of ſuppoſing him to have been one with Bel, we are rather to conclude him to have been the ſame with Mylitta the great goddeſs; but this may appear a weak argument to thoſe who perceive how apt theſe people, and all that followed them, were to multiply one and the ſame god into many; and eſpecially if it be recollected, by what ſteps ſabianiſm or idolatry advanced among theſe apparently firſt founders of it, and how, by degrees, it began from the hoſt of heaven, till it degenerated, if we may uſe the expreſſion, into the adoration of men; till a full ſtop ſeems to have been put to this practice, in honour of the great Aſſyrian and Babylonian family, who muſt, for very ſtrong reaſons ſuggeſted formerly [p], have eclipſed all that went before them; ſo that nothing need prevent our ſuppoſing Nebo to have been worſhipped as the ſun before the riſe of Pul, to whom he may, according to the fantaſtic theology of this people, have been accounted inferior afterwards. This Nebo ſeems to have been famous as an oracle, his name being interpreted as ſignifying prophecy or divination [q]; but all this, and whatever elſe may be advanced concerning him, is too palpably obſcure for us to dilate on; all we know for certain is, that he was ſome god of the Babylonians.

Sardanapalus.

HOWEVER, if true it be, that he was the ſame with Chemoſh, or Baal-peor, or Phegor, and if what is ſaid of the obſcene rites of this god [r] be juſt, we have a ſeeming reaſon to aſſert, that the famous, or, as the common tradition goes, infamous, Sardanapalus took the place of this ſhameleſs idol, in the latter days of the Aſſyrian family; and that, to all appearance, the Babylonians converted him into this god, when they deſtroyed the city of Niniveh, and extirpated the kings there. For that he was a god of theirs is evident enough, by the place given him in the ſame temple with the Babylonian Venus at Hierapolis, the Holy City [s]. We find him there in a particular habit and attitude [t], but whether or no this attitude was the ſame we have formerly mentioned [u], it is certain, that by the traditionary character of him [w], and as it is likely, that all the kings of Aſſyria to a man were deified after their death, he may very well have ſerved for a god of beaſtlineſs and ſenſuality. And this is plainly underſtood by the common way of ſpelling his name, for the moſt part, in antient manuſcripts, which write him Sardanapallus with a double L [x], and ſeemingly with an obſcene intention, for Phallus, or Pallus, ſignifies the privities of a man; and hence Cicero pronounces [y], he was not more odious for his character than this name; and the Priap which ſtood near him [z], in the temple of Hierapolis, may have been intended for him; for as there were confeſſedly two ſtatues of Semiramis in this temple [a], the ſame may have been with regard to Sardanapallus, as we will for this once write him.

Rach.

OTHER gods the Babylonians and Aſſyrians had, as Rach [b], who is generally thought to have been intended for the ſun, and therefore we may claſs him under the great Pul, or Belus, who, as we have ſeen, was ſubſtituted for the ſame. But a diſpute may take place, whether or no he was a deified man or ſome intelligence, as for example, that of the ſun, and if this latter be the caſe, he muſt be removed higher up, as he muſt have been much more antient than Belus. This we leave to the reader, for there is nothing particular beſides related of him.

NEGO [c] and Nergal [d] were alſo gods of this people, if they were not one and the ſame; but as they are generally agreed to have been worſhipped as fire, we forbear farther mention of them, till we come to the religion of the Magians. Nego, and Nergal.

MERODACH [e] alſo was a god at Babylon; but who, or what, he was, is quite in the dark to us. Merodach.

IN a word, we may call in the gods of the ſeveral nations, whoſe hiſtories precede in this work, to complete the liſt of the Babylonian idols; for they are confeſſedly ſprung from the city of Babylon; and hence it is, that Maimonides, in ſpeaking of the death of Thammuz, who was ſlain a martyr to the Sabian religion, relates, That all the idols of the world flew to the great temple of the ſun at Babylon, and there mourned the death of Thammuz [f]; ſo that we ſhall not here need to repeat what we have ſpoken ſo largely to already.

THUS we have ſeen, that the great Jupiters, and other gods and goddeſſes of mortal origin, are to be derived from the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, and that, inſtead of being ſo antient as mythologiſts and hiſtorians make them, they began not above 771 years before the birth of Chriſt among the Aſſyrians, who firſt erected themſelves into what we call a monarchy; as is by all confeſſed, though falſely, for the moſt part, related.

THE Sabians, as well as the Magians, had a veneration for fire, and therefore we might here conſider them in that light, did we not reſerve that ſubject for the ſection where we ſhall ſpeak of the Magian religion, in the hiſtory of the Perſians. Fire-worſhip.

THE ſtory of Bel and the Dragon [g] might here claim to be conſidered, were we not aſſured that the whole is ſpurious. We have therefore only to add, that by the Dragon here we ſhould underſtand a Serpent, or Aſp [h], which the Babylonians uſed as the ſymbol of God, for which they had ſeveral reaſons to give, as that this creature without the aſſiſtance of limbs, and by a kind of virtue or power latent within himſelf, could not only move [i] at a conſiderable rate, but alſo wind and turn himſelf into various forms; that he lived to a great age, and, as it were, renewed his life with his coat every year; and that the the acuteneſs of his ſight might aptly enough qualifie him to repreſent divine providence, or God [k]. Other reaſons were given for this ſerpent-worſhip both by the Babylonians and the Egyptians, but we wave them, and ſhall only obſerve, that theſe ſame people revered the ſame reptile as the ſymbol of health and of prudence, not forgetting alſo, that they made him the emblem of fraud [l].

As the Babylonians were hardly at all different in religion from the Egyptians, but in many articles concurred with them, and particularly in the adoration they paid to fiſhes [m], ſo in other points of worſhip they were the ſame with each other. The goat they worſhipped as well as the Mendeſians [n] in Egypt, and for the ſame reaſon; and the onion, as mean an object as it may ſeem, was conſidered with a religious eſteem by both the nations [o], and for a reaſon, it is moſt likely, we have already given [p].

Worſhip a goat.

THEIR god Thurras, Thourias, or Mars, we have ſpoken to already [q]; and now refer the reader for the religious rites and ceremonies of this people, beſides what we have obſerved here, and ſhall relate hereafter, to what we have ſaid of the kind in the religion of the Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Canaanites, Syrians, Phœnicians, and Aſſyrians.

Their temples, idols, and prieſts.

WE have a general view given us of their temples, their idols, and their prieſts, in the epiſtle of Jeremiah [r]. Their idols were of gold, and ſilver, and wood, and carried about in proceſſion, with multitudes attending them before and behind, and worſhipping them. They were crowned, and cloathed with purple, and beſmeared with the ſmoak of incenſe, though they were carefully wiped and cloathed as they wanted it. Their temples were full of ſmoke and duſt, raiſed and cauſed by the numerous reſort of votaries; and their prieſts took care of themſelves. They would ſometimes make free with the gold and ſilver preſented to their gods, and either keep it for themſelves, or beſtow it upon lewd proſtitutes, who were accounted ſacred. Whatever was offered a ſacrifice to their gods, they were wont to embezzle, and appropriate to themſelves; and cloath their wives and children with the garments that had been given to adorn their idols. In return for this, they were were ſure to light up numbers of tapers and candles to their images, and to ſit in the temples with their beards and their heads cloſe ſhaven, and uncovered, and with garments rent and torn, and roaring and crying out before their gods, as for the lamentation of ſome perſon deceaſed; and finally, that their gods and temples might be in no danger of the ſpoiler, they were ſure to lock and bar them up with great care. Such was the corruption and degeneracy of this people, and ſuch their practice, which muſt have had a very bad effect on their morals, as will appear in the ſequel. In the mean time;

Human victims.

THE Babylonians having given riſe to all the idolatries and ſuperſtitions in vogue among the neighbouring nations, we muſt charge them with the horrible cuſtom of ſacrificing human victims to appeaſe or conciliate their god or gods. That this muſt have been an antient cuſtom with all theſe people, we have ſometimes as good as aſſerted, in what we have ſaid of them in their religious capacity; and that it took birth among the Babylonians, muſt be as readily granted, as that they communicated the reſt of their ſuperſtitions to all their neighbours about. That this was a practice, in early days, in Meſopotamia and Babylonia, may appear by the attempt Abraham made to ſacrifice Iſaac [s]; for he came from thoſe parts; and though he is abundantly to be juſtified in that attempt, it is ſeemingly plain, that the thing was familiar to him; but if we had no other proof of it than in Jephthah, who, as the ſtory is commonly taken, actually made a victim of his only daughter [t], that would be ſufficient to charge the deed upon the nations of thoſe early times. This cuſtom, however, grew ſo ſhocking to human nature, that the prieſts ſeem to have been unable to maintain it long in credit, and by degrees it came to be diſuſed, and ſeems, in the latter days, at leaſt, of the Babylonians, to have been confined to a particular ſect or tribe. For the Sepharvites are ſaid by way of diſtinction from the other Babylonians, to have burnt their children in fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim [u]. Who theſe two gods were, we have ſeen already [w], and that theſe Sepharvites were Babylonians, properly ſo called, appears very plainly, if we can, with the moſt learned geographers, agree, that their city was that of Sippara in Ptolemy. However, there are

are traces of this antient cruelty to be diſcerned in the worſhip and rites of the Syrian, or rather Aſſyrian, goddeſs, at Hierapolis, to whom they without remorſe made away with their children, by precipitating them down a ſteep at her temple [x]; which is all we need ſay about it.

To enter into the allegory of all this worſhip and deification is what we have above profeſſed to avoid; for the preſent, and indeed for the future, we ſhall have no great matter to add to the ſubject, which we have in general treated already. In the hiſtory of the Egyptians [y] we have already declared almoſt as much as is known, as to the intent and meaning of all this idolatry in a phyſical or natural view; nor could we expatiate thereon here without a direct repetition of what goes before. We need only obſerve, that if the Babylonians, and others after them, made gods of the ſun, the moon, or any other luminary; that if they extended their view to the whole ſyſtem of nature in the worſhip they paid to their great deities, or if by them they meant the earth it ſelf, the air, or any other element or created being of any ſort or degree, the whole muſt be attributed to a kind of miſtaken gratitude at firſt for benefits received (V), which at length degenerated into

(V) Sir John Maundeville (73) has ſo judiciouſly ſummed up the hiſtory and progreſs of idolatry, that, for the curioſity of it, we cannot, though ſomewhat long, but preſent it to the reader, in his own words: ſpeaking of a people in India, he ſays, "Summe of hem worſchipe the ſonne, ſumme the mone, ſumme "the fuyr, ſumme trees, ſumme ſerpentes, or the firſt thing "that thei meten at morwen; and ſumme worſchipen ſymulacres, "and ſumme ydoles. leſs than this we could not have ſaid in this place, where the whole ſeems to center, and where the whole, or at leaſt a great part of it, may be fixed to a chronological æra, which may be of uſe to us hereafter, in ſpeaking of theſe deities, or ſome borrowed from them, in climes far remote from this.

Their cuſtoms. IT may be now time to ſpeak of the cuſtoms of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians; and of theſe one of the chief ſeems to have been their method of diſpoſing of all their young women in marriage. No man ſeems to have had a right to diſpoſe of his own daughters, but as ſoon as they were of age fit to marry, they, with others, were expoſed in ſome public place appointed for the purpoſe, where, in the midſt of a crowd of men who attended upon theſe occaſions, they were ſold one by one. The moſt beautiful of them were firſt put up, and delivered to the higheſt bidder, and ſo on. When all that were valuable for their charms were thus diſpoſed of, the money, that was raiſed by this ſale, was applied in behalf of ſome of them to whom nature had not been ſo laviſh of her exterior gifts. The homely ones were then offered to ſuch as would take the leaſt money with them; and the poorer ſort, to whom the uſe of a little money was more precious than all the beauty of a wife, were as eager in underbidding each other, as the wealthy men had been before in vying for the fair ones. The conſequence of this was, that their young women were all diſpoſed of in marriage; the poorer ſort of the men only labouring under this particular reſtriction, that they ſhould give ſecurity to take the girls they had conſented to, before they were in proper poſſeſſion of the money they had agreed to take with them.

Every Babylonian woman was once in her life-time bound to proſtitute herſelf to ſtrange men, at the temple of Venus. A number of them ſat crowned with knots and garlands at the door of the temple, while ſome were continually going and others coming. They were ſo ranged between lengths of line, and parted by the ſame in ſuch manner, that the men had paſſage among them, and the convenience of getting at thoſe they beſt liked. The women having once ſat down before the temple, it was unlawful for any one of them to return home, till ſome ſtranger had thrown money into her lap or boſom, and taken her aſide; the man as he threw the money to her, ſaying, I implore the goddeſs Mylitta for thee. The money, how little ſoever it might have been, was by no means to be rejected, being accounted ſacred; nor had the woman the power of rejecting any man that accoſted her in the form preſcribed, but ſhe was abſolutely to retire with him without delay; and having ſuffered his embraces, and performed the accuſtomed rites to the goddeſs, ſhe returned home; after which no temptation, though ever ſo great, could procure the enjoyment of her. Thoſe who were handſome were ſoon diſpatched, but thoſe who were not ſo happy, lingered a long time before they could fulfil the law; ſo that they ſometimes waſted two or three years in a wretched expectation (W). Thoſe who were rich, and ſcorned to ſit with the meaner ſort were conveyed thither in ſome covered vehicle, and ſeated therein [b], while their ſervants waited their return at ſome diſtance. Proſtitution to Venus.

For five days in one month of every year they celebrated a feſtival they called Sacea, or Sacca, during which the ſervants commanded their maſters, one of them being, for the time, conſtituted chief over the houſe, and wearing a kind of royal garment they called Zogana [c]. Feſtival of Sacca.

From this particular of their cords being broken, it has been ſuppoſed they were cords of ruſhes (76), which might be eaſily broken.

Manner of treating the sick, and burials.

THEIR manner of treating their sick was very extaordinary. Having no physicians among them, it was their custom to expose them publicly in the most frequented places, that so every body might see them, and offer their advice, if they had any knowledge of the case, either from their own experience, or from the experience of others; nor was it lawful for any that passed by to omit this office. Their dead they buried in honey and wax, and mourned for them much after the manner of the Egyptians [d].

The Babylonians; their character.

THE Babylonians were excessively credulous, superstitious to the utmost, and as lewd and as debauched as nation well could be. Their credulity must appear by the esteem their Chaldeans, priests, or juglers were in among them, and their superstition must appear by the same, and what we have said of their religion; and so excessively prone to idolatry were they, that we even find an instance of their great Nebuchadnezzar falling down before Daniel to worship him [e]. Debauchery ran high among them, in which they were justified by the example of their princes, who lived beyond all the bounds of decency and moderation; as we may gather by the banquet Belshazzar was giving when he saw the fatal inscription on the wall [f]. Nor was the king's example all, their religion as inculcated by their priests, and as we have seen in the rites of their great goddess and others, together with the reverence paid to prostitutes [g], compleated them the most sensual and abandoned race that can be imagined. Parents and husbands would, for money, expose their wives and children to the embraces of their guests. Drunkards they are particulary said to have been, and their women were admitted to their debaucheries. The women, upon these occasions, first appeared modest and reserved, till putting off their cloaths by degrees, they at length appeared quite naked; and this was the practice even with the married women and the maids, who thought it good breeding thus to reveal whatever belonged to them [h]. Such is the character given of the Babylonians, and it seems exactly to agree with their religion, which encouraged such monstrous impudence in the women and shamelessness in the men; though it cannot be supposed, that in the beginning of their empire they were quite so dissolute as here represented.

THEY

THEY seem to have indulged themselves in dress as well as in other respects, and to have affected some pride and effeminacy therein; their under garment was a linen vest, down to their heels, over which they had another of woollen, and over all a white mantle, or cloak. They wore their own hair; their heads were adorned with a tiara or mitre, and their bodies were anointed all over [i] with oil of sesame [k]. They each of them wore a seal-ring on the finger, and in their hand a wrought staff or scepter, adorned at the head with some particular ensign or figure, as an apple, or rose, or lilly, or an eagle, or some such badge, without which it was unlawful to appear with one of these sticks or staves. On their feet they wore a kind of slippers [l]. Traces of which may be picked out of the figures remaining at Persepolis, as we may observe hereafter. Their habit.

THIS people was famed for learning, and particularly those of them that were peculiarly called Chaldæans, who were, as is said, their priests, their philosophers, astronomers, astrologers, soothsayers, and the like. And in respect of this pretended claim to learning and supernatural knowledge, the Chaldees are distinguished from the Babylonians, and are said to have inhabited a region peculiar to themselves next to the Arabians and the Persian gulf [m]; just where we have placed them. They were divided into several sects, as the Orcheni, the Borsippeni, and known by other names of distinction, borrowed either from particular places [n], where different doctrines on the same points were held, or from particular persons, who had doctrines peculiar to themselves. Many of their learned men were famous, and known by name among the Greeks, as Adena, Naburian, Sudin, and many others [o]. Learning of the Chaldees.

WE have already considered this tribe as set apart for devotion and superstitious concerns, when just now we spoke of the religion of this people; we are now to speak of them as philosophers only, and of what they taught as such, as well as of their manner of institution.

WE have already seen how they pretended to have first come by their learning [p], and their strange fable concerning their first instructor Oannes, who, long before the deluge, came out of the sea, and formed them in the several branches Had not their learning from the Egyptians.

branches of policy, religion, and learning, and particularly explained to them geometry and aſtrology; and I have obſerved, that, as the tradition went, he was a monſter, partly man and partly fiſh, and that by his coming out of the ſea he muſt have been ſome ſtranger, that his name might be, with no great violence, derived from a word, which in Syriac ſignifies a Traveller, or a Foreigner [q]; as alſo that by ſome circumſtances he muſt have been the ſame they meant by their Mylitta or great Venus [r], and would now add, that, by what is ſaid of his inventions and uſeful communications to men, he may have been conſidered as the Egyptian Iſis, or Oſiris, or both. However this may have been, the report of Oannes's appearance in Chaldea from out of the ſea has given birth to an opinion, that Oſiris and Oannes were at leaſt contemporaries, and that the Babylonians had all their learning from the Egyptians, and that not much earlier than the days of Ammon and Seſac, or Shiſhak, whom our author [s] will have to have been the ſame with Seſoſtris, or not long before the days of David and Solomon. To prove this, he exhibits the authority of ſeveral antient authors, the one [t] writing, That the Egyptian Belus, the ſon of Neptune and Lybia, carried colonies from Egypt into Babylonia, and that, ſettling upon the banks of the Euphrates, he inſtituted prieſts with the ſame privileges as in Egypt, and that theſe were called Chaldæans, and were to obſerve the ſtars after the manner of Egypt; another [u] declaring the Babylonian Belus had his name from the Egyptian of that name, the ſon of Lybia. In a word, our author [w] concludes, that when Sabbaco, the Ethiopian, invaded Egypt, multitudes of that country fled from him into Chaldæa, and carried with them their aſtronomy, aſtrology, architecture, and the form of their year, which they preſerved in the æra of Nabonaſſar; and, as a farther proof of this, he produces the form of the tower or temple of Belus at Babylon, which was built pretty nearly after the manner of the Egyptian pyramids. All this, according to our author's hypotheſis, ſeems plauſible enough, but muſt be confeſſed to be quite deſtructive of what we read in ſcripture, by which the reverſe ſhould appear.

Both

BOTH the nations, their very countries, and situations, have certainly in all respects a very near resemblance of each other, and an exact parallel might be deduced between them to make it self-evidently appear. We have seen, that they were constant rivals with each other for antiquity [x], in which the Babylonians must have had the preference, according to scripture, where we read, that they kept possession of what we may call the original seat of mankind after the flood; and must have been therefore settled before any of the other nations, who left them behind in Shinar, a country which must have been a good deal improved before the dispersion, when all the rest went out in quest of new seats. This historical circumstance may be sufficient to rank them the first of nations, though the Egyptians would never allow them that honour; and if these unjustly arrogated the point over them in this respect, why may they not have done the same with regard to others? Arguments to prove it.

THE truth is, both these nations have been strangely addicted to fable, and both of them may be questioned in most we know of their pretences to superiority; and are doubtless to be equally disbelieved. But if the Egyptians are preferred to the Babylonians in any respect by the Greeks, it must be attributed to partiality and prejudice, in favour of such near neighbours as they were in comparison; and if not to this, at least it may be owing to their better acquaintance with the former than with the latter, and to their hearing of the story but on one side. We have at least as good authority to argue in behalf of the Babylonians, as can be produced in favour of the Egyptians.

THE early transaction of attempting to raise the tower of Babel, in the very country of this people, must imply them to have been informed of architecture in those days, and some of the concomitant arts; and as for the learning of either of the nations, it does not seem to have been such as to deserve the contending for; it appearing to have been rather the corruption of human knowledge, than the refinement of it, or, at least, it seems to have been built upon such principles, as were a reproach to sound reason, rather than an honour to the human understanding, and rather calculated to deceive, than to inform; to spread the mists of ignorance, than to clear up the lights of knowledge.

HOWEVER, to turn the tables, we have as good an authority as to the contrary, that the Egyptians were instructed in all their knowledge by the Chaldees, and namely by Abraham [y], who was one of this country. This is the tradition of the Jews, the Arabians, and the Indians, which deserves at least as much credit, and even more, with regard to this people, as the pretences of the Egyptians, who were immediately parties concerned, or of the Greeks, who were particularly biassed in their favour. Nor are these orientals unsupported by the traditions of the westerns, according to whom the Assyrian or Babylonian Belus was the inventor of the sidereal science [z], and the nation he belonged to the foremost in antiquity for empire and power, and consequently for the arts and learning; and as they derived their instructor Oannes from times preceding the deluge [a], as should seem, and suppose him to have sprung from the primigenial egg; it is seemingly plain, that whatever constructions may have been put upon his appearance from out of the sea, or the derivation of his name, they acknowledged themselves beholden to no nation under the sun for what they pretended to know; and indeed it must be confessed, that by the bulk of what we understand, both by sacred and profane writers, our author, has here strained things too violently to accommodate them to his hypothesis; but to insist no longer on this doubt, let us take a survey of what the learning was that is so contested.

Their manner of institution.

THEY acquired not their learning in the manner of the Greeks, but possessed what they knew by tradition from father to son, and being exempt from all offices or impositions to divert their studies, they had nothing to do but to apply themselves to the instruction they received, which came not from the mouth of a mercenary pedagogue or master. They never departed from what they imbibed, fully satisfied of what they received from their ancestors; and, by a tenacious adherence to their point, they became perfectly knowing in what they professed [b].

SUCH was the manner of their institution, and the tenaciousness of the adherence to what they had received from

from their fore-fathers, which if true, we need no other proof to assure us, that they made little or no progress, even in the learning they particularly professed, and that so it really was, may be discovered in the sequel.

Their doctrine about the world.

THEY taught, that the world was eternal, that it never had beginning, and never shall have an end, though they acknowledged a divine providence; that the motions of the heavens were not directed by blind chance, or performed spontaneously, but by the guidance and direction of superior agents, or gods. They are universally said to have been the first that cultivated astronomy, and are pretended to have made such progress therein, as to have not only discovered the exact motions of the heavenly bodies, but also to have found out certain influences they have over things below, and to have thence been able to foretel what was hidden in the womb of futurity [c].

They were more astrologers than astronomers.

BY this it appears, that whatever advances they made as astronomers, they were more particularly valuable, if we may so express ourselves, as astrologers. From this delusive amusement, they boasted a knowledge of what was to come, with the power of averting evil, and the procuring of good; hence chiefly they were considered as magicians, and, as we call them, fortune-tellers [d].

THE planets they called Interpreters, and made the greatest account of their influence, and particularly, as we are told, of that we call Saturn; the next degree of eminence with them was Sol, or the sun, Mars, Venus, Mercury, and Jupiter; six in all, which were all the planets they reckoned: These they called Interpreters, as by their motions and aspects they, in a more evident manner, portended the will and pleasure of the gods. They sometimes judged by their rising, and sometimes by their setting, and sometimes by the colour or degree of their light; whence they foretold storms of wind, or of rain, or exceeding droughts; as also the appearance of comets, eclipses of the sun and moon, earthquakes, and the whole train of pretended fore-runners of the good or bad fortune of nations in general, and of kings and private persons in particular [e].

The system of their astrology.

UNDER these six planets they ranged 30 stars, which they called Counselling Gods; and half of these they allotted to take notice of what was done under the earth; and the other half to take cognizance of what was done by men, or transacted in the heavens. And they gave out, that once in ten days one of the superior of these stars descended to the inferior, as it were a messenger from those above; and that in return one of the inferior ascended to the superior in the same nature; and that this their mutual correspondence was natural to them, and to continue for ever. They reported, that the chief of these Counselling Gods were 12 in number, and assigned to each of them a month of the year, and a whole sign of the zodiac [f].

ALL these stars they gave out to have influences over the nativities of men, and to forbode whatever is to befal them of evil, or happen to them of good, in the course of their lives. Again, out of the zodiac they selected 24 stars, and placed 12 of them towards the north pole, and 12 towards the south. Those of them within our sight they assigned to the living, and those not within it they called the stars or constellations of the dead; and these stars they termed the judges of all things: In short, the Chaldeans were complete astrologers, and pretended to excel all other nations therein [g].

Deficient in astronomy.

THEIR astronomy, which ought to have taken place of the former, in respect of its dignity above it, must yield its rank here, it being seemingly what they cultivated as a science secondary to the other; and accordingly we find it to have been quite coarse and plain. They had notions, that the earth was like a vessel or boat, and that it was hollow within; and had a way of supporting this doctrine by various arguments [h].

WE have seen their division of the zodiac into 12 signs, throughout which they taught that the several planets performed their revolutions: But they seem to have had no notion of the immense distance of some of the planets from the sun, and accounted for the time they took up in their revolutions, purely by the tardiness of their motion; though, by their theory of the moon, the contrary should appear, for they taught, that she completed her course the soonest of any, not because of her extraordinary velocity, but because her orbit, as we now speak, was less than the orbit of any other body that circumvolved in the heavens. They taught, that she shone with a light not her own, and that when she was eclipsed she was immerged in the shadow of the earth.

But

[f] Idem ibid. [g] Idem ibid. [h] Idem ibid.

But for eclipſes of the ſun they were quite out and extravagant, nor could fix the time when they would happen [i]. In ſhort, the whole of their philoſophy and learning ſeems to have been chiefly what we now call judicial aſtronomy; a ſcience, falſly ſo called, as much contemned with us, as it was prized by the antients.

Their boaſted learning condemned.

NOR has this boaſted knowledge and learning of the Chaldees been arraigned by the moderns only; it has alſo been condemned by the antients, as inconſiſtent with the nature of things, and as implying a fatal neceſſity and deſtroying the freedom of our will [k]. And this was the mighty learning for which the Chaldæans were ſo famed, as to be denominated, as it were, a diſtinct nation from the Babylonians for the ſake of it; and indeed from ſcripture we gather they were no better; for Daniel, ſpeaking of them, divides them into four ſorts or kinds, as magicians, aſtrologers, ſorcerers, and Chaldæans [l], adding afterwards to theſe wiſe men or ſuch as divined by lots, and ſooth-ſayers or ſuch as foretold events by the inſpection of entrails [m]. And though there are thoſe who ſuppoſe the Chaldæans, as here diſtinguiſhed from the five other ſorts, to have been a ſect peculiar to themſelves, and to have been of deeper and more ſolid learning [n]; we may eaſily perceive, that they, as well as the reſt, pretended to divination, and that they were called upon, as well as the reſt, to diſcover what was hidden to other men. Whence we may ſafely conclude, that they all in their ſeveral ways were ſo many oracles, and they were all devoted to the ſame end, however they may have been divided as to the means and methods of attaining thereto; ſo that ſeemingly theſe Babylonians had their ſcience branched out amongſt them, much after the manner the Egyptian phyſicians had theirs [o]. Their learning muſt have been made up entirely of ſuperſtitious practices and deluſive arts, and if any better they had, they muſt have concealed it under ſuch enigmas, and far-fetched reſemblances and allegories, as muſt have rendered it quite a ſecret even to themſelves, who, conſidering that they are ſaid from father to ſon to have received implicitly whatever was taught them, may have been as little able to explain what was really intended by their doctrines, as others were to conceive them to any ſolid purpose; and it seems not to have been without good reason, that many [p] of later times have made slight of them as philosophers, and concluded, that the Greeks were in this respect little, if at all, beholden either to them or the Egyptians.

Babylonians in distinction from the Chaldees; their arts.

As the Chaldees were peculiarly the men of learning among this nation, so the Babylonians, properly so called, were the men of art; though perhaps we shall have more reason to call these the men of learning among them than the former, if true it be that they were wholly addicted to, and set apart for, the sidereal consultations, and the propagation of the extravagancies, which must, as should seem, have made up the system of their philosophy. For in this case the Babylonians, as distinguished from the Chaldæans, must have been good mathematicians and mechanics, as must appear by the immense buildings they reared, and which could not be effected without great skill in the several branches of the mathematics and geometry. This we may say in general; but to say how far, or how far not, they excelled in perspective and the true harmony of proportion, may not be quite so easy a matter, though that their ornaments and decorations fell short of what was afterwards seen in Greece can never be doubted. This may be plain to any body that has seen the representations of the ruins of Persepolis, which must certainly have been built in the Babylonian manner, which, how far it was beneath the Grecian for elegance and proportion, may be more properly considered, when we come to speak of the Grecian architecture, and to compare it with that of the Egyptians and this people, who, it is certain, were more ambitious of being vast in their performances of this nature than exquisite. And hence we may pronounce, that their paintings and statues, however gaudy, rich, and colossean, were nothing to compare with the fame that took birth with the Grecian artists.

Music.

Music they had, but in what perfection we must never hope to know; nor would it be worth our while to labour in so unfruitful a field. But that they had a variety of instruments among them, we are well assured, for we read, that they had flutes, cornets, harps, sackbuts, psalteries, dulcimers, and all kinds of music [q]. What these instruments ments exactly were, no-body will ever know; but if we may judge of their skill in harmony, by what we can diſcover of their painting and ſtatuary we muſt not equal them with the Grecians in the harmonic ſcience.

THEIR poetry we have nothing to ſay to; but muſt leave the reader to form his judgment of it, by that of the other eaſtern nations their neighbours, both ancient and modern. Nor do we pretend to ſay by whom it was particularly cultivated, whether by the Chaldæans or the Babylonians, but as it has at all times been ſacred to religion and ſuperſtition, we may ſuppoſe the former, as prieſts, laid claim thereto as a part of their province. Poetry.

PHYSIC we have declared to have been no regular ſcience among this people, in what we have ſaid of their manner and cuſtom of treating the ſick; though that the ſame, as a ſcience, grew into vaſt repute with the Perſians, their ſucceſſors, will be obſerved when it comes properly in turn. Phyſic.

WE have already declared, there is no more difference between the Syriac and the Chaldee, the language of this people, than between the Engliſh and the Scotch [r]. Their common alphabet we have already given [s]; and as for the Mendean character, which is alſo peculiar to them, it is not only what we may call modern, but alſo ſo nearly like the Eſtrangelo of the Syriac [t], that we have thought it unneceſſary to inſert it. Bochart [u] ſuppoſes they had a ſacred character as well as the Egyptians, but upon a very unſatisfactory foundation. Language.

THE Babylonians, properly ſo called, were great architects, and ingenious in the caſting of metals, and great workmen and contrivers, as will be particularly remarked when we come to ſpeak of their great city of Babylon; and therefore it may be needleſs to expatiate thereon in this place, when we have reſerved another, where we intend to do them ſufficient honour for their great labour and induſtry in theſe reſpects, wherein they will be obſerved to have fallen ſhort of no one nation under the ſun; and in which they, perhaps in great meaſure, ſhewed the way to every nation beſides. Architecture.

NOR were they leſs famous for their manufactures, and particularly for their rich embroideries, ſumptuous veſtments, and magnificent carpets, and fine linen; inſomuch, Manufactures and fine linen.

that

that we read of Cato, that he immediately ſold a Babylonian cloak or mantle, which was left to him by inheritance, as being what he was aſhamed to wear [w]; and elſewhere, that at Rome there had been paid for a ſuit of Babylonian hangings for a dining-room ſix thouſand four hundred and fifty-eight pound ſix ſhillings and eight pence [x]. It were to no purpoſe to quote authors for farther inſtances of this magnificence, which is known to a proverb; or to aim at a detail of the ſeveral products of their induſtry: we would only add, that the Babylonians, as well as the Tyrians, had their purple, which they ſent into the eaſtern parts by way of traffic [y]. This purple they had from a port called Apologus near the Euphrates [z]; but as it is diſputed, whether or no this was what may be called a diſcovery among them, and whether they were not before uſed to ſupply themſelves therewith from Tyre [a], we ſhall not inſiſt thereon, any farther than to take notice, that their country afforded the beſt material of its ſort for dying, meaning alom, both natural and artificial [b].

Particular tribes.

THIS people was not only divided into two great tribes, the Babylonians and Chaldeans properly ſo called; there ſeems to have been other ſubordinate tribes or ſects of them. Three of theſe are ſaid to have fed upon nothing but fiſh [c], and thereby ſeems to have infringed a ſacred law among them, in reverence of their great goddeſs, for whoſe ſake the Babylonians ſeem to have abſtained therefrom. Thus we have ſeen, that ſome of the Egyptians worſhipped the fiſh which others of them fed upon. However, it may not have been upon a religious principle that this people departed from the reſt of their countrymen; and the rather as it ſeems to be imputed to neceſſity [d], theſe tribes living among the fens, and being deſtitute of corn; to ſupply the want of which, it was their cuſtom to dry their fiſh in the ſun, which they afterwards made into paſte, and having baked it ate it by way of bread [e]. Something yet more extraordinary than this we are told of the inhabitants of Borſippa, where the bats being much larger than uſual in other places, they were uſed to ſalt them for food [f]; and and this, whether it proceeded from any ſuperſtition or want, which laſt ſeems a little hard to believe in ſo plentiful a country as this muſt have been, we leave undecided.

THE trade of this antient people is no where, that we know of, profeſſedly treated of; but that it muſt have been very conſiderable, is not in the leaſt to be doubted, and eſpecially when Babylon was in the meridian of her glory; whoſoever contemplates the ſplendor of this monarchy, and the commodious ſituation of this country in general, and its capital in particular, cannot doubt, but commerce muſt here have flouriſhed to a very eminent degree. Babylon was ſituated, as it were, in the very midſt of the old world, and by means of the two great rivers, the Euphrates and Tigris, had very eaſy communication with the weſtern and northern parts, as alſo with the eaſtern by the means of the Perſian gulf. In a word, it may, either by land or water, have had eaſy commerce with all the points of the compaſs; and as it was not only the ſeat of a potent monarchy, but alſo afforded many productions and manufactures of its own to exchange with its neighbours round about, and lay ſo within the reach of them all, it is not to be doubted, but that trade was as extenſive here as ever it was any where. Whether the Babylonians were famous for ſhipping of their own is pretty much in the dark; though it cannot well be diſputed, but they muſt have been conſiderable as navigators; the ſame is hinted at (X), and as Babylon

Commerce.

(X) Beſides what might be gathered to prove this point in the Prophets, the book of Revelations, (77) deſcribing the fall of Babylon, has theſe words, which at once diſplay the mighty riches of this city as an emporium, and convince they muſt have abounded in ſhipping; Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen . . . . The merchants of the earth ſhall weep and mourn over her, for no man buyeth her merchandiſe any more: The merchandiſe of gold, and ſilver, and precious ſtones, and of Pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and ſilk, and ſcarlet, and all thyine, or ſweet-wood, and all manner of veſſels of ivory, and all manner of veſſels of moſt precious wood, and of braſs, and iron, and marble, and cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincenſe, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beaſts, and ſheep, and horſes, and chariots, and ſlaves, and ſouls of men . . . . The merchants of theſe things which were made rich by her, ſhall ſtand afar off, for the fear of her torment, weeping, and wailing, and ſaying, Alas! alas! that great city, that was cloathed in fine linen, and purple, and

(77) xviii. 2. 19.

Babylon was so much a city of waters, as the prophet expresses himself, it is but natural to conclude, that they very much abounded in shipping of their own.

SECT. III.

The Chronology of the BABYLONIANS, from the first rise of the monarchy, to its dissolution.

WE are here to consider the Babylonians in two very different views; first, as composing a small, though perhaps a formidable, kingdom, immediately after the deluge, the chronology of which we have already settled as exactly as the nature of the thing will bear [g], and secondly, as constituting a potent and wide-spreading empire, founded by, and at last rising upon the ruins of, the Assyrians their brethren [h]; so that in effect we are here only to look back to the early times of the Assyrian monarchy, of which this was a collateral branch, and possessed, as should seem, by princes of the same blood with those who filled the throne of Niniveh. We may refer the reader back to what we have said, in the chronology of the Assyrians, to satisfy himself concerning the chronology of this people; for they properly took rise in one and the same person, meaning Pul king of Assyria, and nearly at one and the same time. But not to anticipate what may be more properly insisted on hereafter in the course of this section, we shall proceed to distinguish the kingdom of Babylon from the kingdom of Assyria, and to exhibit, according to our custom, a series of the kings of Babylon, according to several authors.

This table contains on the one ſide a genuine and moſt correct copy of Ptolemy's aſtronomical canon (Y), and on on the other a corruption of it. We ſhall not here inquire into the differences between the two liſts, or the liberty the author of this eccleſiaſtical account has taken with his original, which we may occaſionally conſider under the reigns of theſe kings. Syncellus, whence we have taken this eccleſiaſtical computation, has under the ſame head another, the authors of them being Africanus and Euſebius [i]. We ſhall therefore have little to do here; few arguments can be wanting, and indeed none can be neceſſary, to prove the firſt riſe and duration of the Babylonian empire, which is ſo happily aſcertained to our hands by Ptolemy, whoſe canon is ſo exactly agreeable to ſcripture hiſtory, that if this latter could poſſibly ſtand in need of confirmation as to the hiſtorical parts of it, ſo far as it relates to the hiſtory of the great empires of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, nothing could be ſo effectual towards it as this canon, which has given birth to one of the moſt famous profane æras, that of Nabonaſſar the firſt king in it, and without which there would be the moſt palpable darkneſs over the affairs of theſe people. Nothing is more ſurpriſing, than that this moſt noble monument ſhould have been ſo little examined, by the light naturally reflected on it from the ſacred pen-men, as not to have extricated the whole body of chronologers and hiſtorians from out of the labyrinth they have almoſt all bewildered themſelves in, miſled by the extravagances of one fabulous Greek writer, who has been blindly followed by the antients, and unnaturally by the chriſtian moderns. This canon takes date from about the 23d year of Pul's firſt appearance on this ſide of the Euphrates, about the year 2252 after the flood, according to our computation, and 747 years before Chriſt; which ſhews the kingdom of Babylon to have been immediately of Aſſyrian origin, according to the prophet *; Behold the land of the Chaldæans; this people was not till the Aſſyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderneſs; they ſet up the towers thereof, they raiſed up the palaces thereof. The kingdom of Babylon was then founded by the Aſſyrians. This is ſo plain, that it may be needleſs to multiply words in proof of it, eſpecially after what we have ſaid in the chronology of Aſſyria, which tends directly to make it appear.

The æra of Nabonaſſar.

Ptolemy, we may perceive, could diſcover no king of Babylon older than Nabonaſſar, and therefore begins with him;

him; and ſcripture mentions no king of Aſſyria before Pul, who appeared on this ſide of the Euphrates about 23 years before the firſt year of the canon; and as Nabonaſſar is an Aſſyrian name, moſt evidently compounded of Nebo-addon-aſſar, we may be certain, that he was the ſon or grandſon of Pul, who upon his death divided his monarchy between his children. This is a moſt evident point, and abundantly helps us to underſtand what the prophet means in the text above; and without which it is impoſſible to underſtand how the Aſſyrians ſhould have founded the land of the Chaldees. This kingdom of Babylon being then of Aſſyrian extraction, and conſidered as a ſiſter-kingdom with Aſſyria, and being a natural branch of it, we have nothing here to add to what we have already urged, except that we can fix the date of it with ſomewhat more certainty than that of the Aſſyrian empire, which we could have no notice of till the firſt appearance of Pul in the weſt. It may begin then with us in the 24th year of Pul's appearance to the weſtward of the Euphrates, 2252 years after the flood, and 747 years before Chriſt: It ends 2462 years after the flood, and 537 years before Chriſt. So that its whole duration was no more than 210 years complete; to which if we add the 23 or 24 years of Pul before the date of this canon, we ſhall have a number not exceeding 234 for the years of the duration of the great Aſſyrian family; whether at Niniveh or at Babylon, with reſpect to what we know of the riſe of theſe kingdoms; and that Niniveh, which is confeſſedly the oldeſt, did not much exceed this number, muſt appear to any one that gives himſelf the trouble to recollect what we have ſo amply obſerved in the third, fourth, and fifth ſections of the preceding chapter.

THE Chaldees, we are told, were founded by the Aſſyrian, and, by the undoubted authorities of ſcripture and Ptolemy's aſtronomical canon, this Aſſyrian can have been no other than Pul. If any one can prove the exiſtence of another Aſſyrian conqueror or founder before him, we ſhall be very ready to congratulate him upon the diſcovery. The canon itſelf directs us when to date the fall of the Babylonian empire, meaning the 18th year of Nabonadius; though according to the canon he reigned but 17 years; for every king's reign there begins with the laſt Thoth of his predeceſſor's reign.

SECT. IV.

The history of the Babylonians.

BEFORE we enter upon the history of this people, as constituting a wide and most famous monarchy, we must just take a retrospect of their first establishment as a kingdom, which is vainly given out to have existed before the deluge. In doing of this, we have little more than to remind the reader, that we have already exhibited the antediluvian princes of this part, according to the several authors, and that we have already said as much of its first founder Nimrod as we have been able to collect. We have therefore now nothing that remains, but to declare who are said to have been his immediate successors in this infant kingdom, a list of which we have transcribed.

OUR authors, we see, perfectly agree as to these kings who are called the dynasty of the Chaldees, and indeed, in this case Syncellus has faithfully copied Eusebius. This dynasty, which lasted no more than 224 years, was no sooner expired, than the Arabians became uppermost, and produced a race of six kings at Babylon. This Arabian dynasty lasted 216 years, and the two dynasties together lasted 440 years. The whole interval, as we have stated it, between the first of the reign of Nimrod and the call of Abraham, is 646 years. This Arabian dynaſty then expired 206 years before the call of Abraham, and was ſucceeded by the Aſſyrian dynaſty, beginning with Belus and ending with Sardanapalus, as we have given it in the chronology of the Aſſyrians [k]. The Aſſyrians muſt then have erected their monarchy long before the call of Abraham, and the ſame muſt have continued at leaſt a thouſand years after him without any intermiſſion, according to the moſt common accounts, which may be ſufficiently diſproved by this one argument. Beſides there can be well no doubt, but theſe Arabian kings were, according to ſcripture, of the country of Elam or Perſia; for under Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, we find Amraphel king of Shinar, the undoubted Babylonia, warring upon the kings of the Canaanites; we may then as good as ſatisfy ourſelves, that this Arabian dynaſty, as it is called, ſubſiſted after the call, when Abraham reſcued his brother Lot from them; ſo that hence it may appear, that if any people can claim to have been properly the firſt monarchy, the Elamites or Perſians are the people, as we ſhall obſerve in its proper place.

FROM the year of the flood 431, or from its foundation, we have no certain notice of any thing relating to this kingdom, except that, about 600 years afterwards, there was a king of it called Amraphel, who warred under the king of Elam [l]. This is all we have to ſay concerning theſe early times of this antient kingdom, except we adopt the Cteſian accounts of Semiramis, who, according to him, muſt be called the foundreſs of Babylon; and that is what we need not repeat. First kingdom of Babylon, when founded Amraphel.

HOWEVER, we cannot but take notice, that the ſeries we have given of the Aſſyrian kings, as they ſtand in Euſebius and Syncellus, is reckoned as the third dynaſty of the Chaldæans or Babylonians, and called the Aſſyrian; but concerning this we muſt refer the reader to our chronology of the Aſſyrians, where we hope he will meet with what may ſatisfy him of the little weight this ſucceſſion of dynaſties ought to have with him.

ACCORDING to this method of arrangement, the kings in Ptolemy's canon ſhould be called the fourth dynaſty of the orientals, and diſtinguiſhed by the title of the Babylonian; nian; but this we muſt reject as built upon no tolerable foundation, and eſpecially with us, who diſtinguiſh, ſo widely as we do, between the antient kingdom of Babylon and the monarchy or empire of the ſame.

WE have now brought all the hiſtory we know of this people down to the æra of Nabonaſſar; but before we begin with that genuine race of princes, who are the only kings of Babylon we can poſſibly acknowledge, from the days of Amraphel above to the ſaid Nabonaſſar, we muſt relate what is fabulouſly reported of the man, who, according to ſome prophane authors, muſt be accounted the firſt king of Babylon.

The ſtory of Beleſis, or Nanybrus.

HE is by ſome called Beleſis [m], and by others Nanybrus [n], and both affect to give us an extraordinary ſtory of him, which will be almoſt all we ſhall be able, in theſe authors, to find concerning the Babylonian empire, till it was put to an end.

UNDER the name of Beleſis this firſt prince is repreſented as a crafty and a mean-ſpirited knave, and as nothing leſs than a hero. It is ſaid he was baſe enough to circumvent Arbaces, his collegue and friend, in the moſt ſhameful manner, by pretending a vow he had, in the midſt of the war, made to his god Belus, That if ſucceſs was the event of it, and the palace of Sardanapalus was conſumed, as it was, he would be at the charge and trouble of removing the aſhes that were left to Babylon, and there heap them up into a mount near the temple of his god; there to ſtand as a monument, to all who ſhould navigate the Euphrates, of the ſubverſion of the Aſſyrian empire. He, it ſeems, had been privately informed, by an eunuch he kept cloſe up to himſelf, of the immenſe treaſure which had been conſumed in the conflagration of the palace at Niniveh, and knowing it to be a ſecret to Arbaces, he was tempted to forge this pretence. His requeſt was granted him, the aſhes were given to him, to do with them as he would; and not only ſo, but Arbaces conſtituted him king of Babylon, with an exemption from all tribute. Beleſis, by this artifice, carried a prodigious treaſure with him to Babylon; but when the ſecret was diſcovered, he was called to an account for it, and tried by the other chiefs who had been aſſiſtant in the war, and who, upon his confeſſion of the crime, condemned him to the the loss of his head. But Arbaces, a magnificent and generous prince, freely forgave him, left him in possession of the treasure, and also in the independant government of Babylon, saying, The good he had done ought to serve as a veil to his crime; and thus he became at once a prince of great wealth and dominion [o].

In process of time, and under the successor of Arbaces, he became a man of dress and shew, and effeminacy, unworthy of the kingdom or province he held. Nanybrus, for so we must now call Belesis, understanding a certain robust Mede, called Parsondas, held him in the utmost contempt, and had sollicited the emperor of the Medes to divest him of his dominions, and to confer them upon himself, offered a very great reward to the man who should take Parsondas and bring him to him. Parsondas, hunting somewhere near Babylon with the king of the Medes, and straggling from the company, happened at length to fall in with some of the servants of the Babylonian Nanybrus, who had been tempted with the promised reward. He had been all the day at his exercise, and being very thirsty, and these servants being purveyors to the king of Babylon, he asked them for a draught of wine, and they, knowing him, very readily plyed him therewith, and not only so, but prevailed on him to stay and eat a meal with them. Parsondas, who was thoroughly fatigued, thankfully accepted the offer, and sending the prey he had taken to his king, he indulged himself in what was laid before him, and especially in some rich wines, which were plentifully poured out on purpose to inebriate him. Parsondas quite flustered called for his horse, that he might go to the king of the Medes where he was encamped, but instead of his horse they brought him some beautiful women, and desired he would pass the night with them, and defer his departure till the light of the next morning. He consented, and being fated with his pleasures, and fallen into a profound sleep, they rushed upon him in the midst of the night, bound him, and carried him off to Nanybrus; who no sooner saw him, than he began to expostulate with him for his subdolous attempts to displace him in Babylon, without any the least offence given on his part, that should make him an enemy. In the end, Parsondas, resolutely declared, That he thought himself to be more worthy of the dominion, than so indolent and effeminate a prince as he was; which the other taking into high disdain, and reflecting on him for the manner in which he had suffered himself to be surprised by his servants, vowed he would make him as soft, and as tender, and as delicate as any body [p].

HAVING thus sworn by the gods Belus and Molis, [or Mylitta as it should be] he called for the eunuch who had charge of his music girls, and ordered him to shave him, and smooth, and paint him, and dress him just after the manner of those girls, and to see that he learned their art, and by all the means and methods possible to transform him into one of them; so that in a very short time Parsondas was quite effeminated, and became more delicate than the fairest female of them all, and exceeded them all in singing and playing, and the other arts of allurement; and whoever saw him at the entertainments the king gave, not only pronounced him a woman, but the most beautiful of the train in waiting [q].

THE king of the Medes, Artæus it seems by name, had in vain sought after his favourite companion Parsondas, and in vain offered rewards to whoever should produce him alive or dead, and hearing no news of him, gave himself up to grief for his faithful servant, concluding he had been destroyed by some wild beast in the chase when he lost him. At length, after seven years, it happened, that an eunuch having been most cruelly scourged and beaten by Nanybrus's order, Parsondas took the opportunity of the man's discontent, and, with great promises, prevailed on him to fly to the king of the Medes, and to make known to him his metamorphosis. The eunuch went and told what he was ordered, and the king of the Medes no sooner heard it, than he was moved with the highest indignation. Immediately he dispatched an officer to Nanybrus to demand Parsondas; but when the officer arrived at Babylon, he denied, that he had ever known any thing of any such person. This answer being carried back to the Mede, he sent a more resolute and robust officer, than the former, with letters commanding Nanybrus, without delay or reserve, to send him the man whom he had shamefully debased and confined among his eunuchs and music girls, or to expect the sudden loss of his head; and ordered the officer, if he persisted in the denial, to to bind him with his ſaſh or girdle, and to lead him to immediate execution. Nanybrus, ſcared at this, and conſulting his own ſafety, promiſed to deliver up the man, though he could abundantly juſtify himſelf with the king of the Medes for what he had done in this reſpect. He then entertained the officer at table, and the diſhes were no ſooner placed before them, than 150 women, among whom Parſondas was, made their appearance, ſinging and playing upon various inſtruments; but Parſondas was more charming to the eye and to the ear by far than any of the reſt; and accordingly Nanybrus inquiring of the Mede which he liked beſt? he immediately pointed at Parſondas. The Babylonian at this clapt his hands; and fell into an immoderate fit of laughter; and aſking his gueſt, whether or no he ſhould be willing to paſs the night with his favourite? and he declaring his deſire that the thing might be ſo; Nanybrus told him he could not poſſibly grant it: Why then did you aſk me the queſtion ſaid the Mede? Nanybrus pauſed a while, at laſt, This, ſays he, is the Parſondas you want. The officer was aſtoniſhed, and incredulous of what he heard, till at laſt the Babylonian convincing him that what he told him was fact, alledged, that what he had done with Parſondas he could anſwer for before the king of the Medes. Artæus, wondering at the prodigious alteration he ſaw in Parſondas, aſked him, how it had been poſſible for him to live ſo long under ſuch a load of infamy? Parſondas pleaded neceſſity, and the deſire he had to ſee his face again, as alſo to live to ſee himſelf revenged; and begged of all things that he would take revenge for him accordingly. Artæus promiſed him fair, and Parſondas recovered himſelf to his former maſculine habit and appearance [r].

ARTÆUS came to Babylon attended by Parſondas, who was continually calling upon him for juſtice; but when Nanybrus appeared before the king, he pleaded his cauſe with great reſolution, urging that Parſondas, towards whom he never was guilty of the leaſt offence, would ſubdolouſly and barbarouſly have procured his death, that ſo he might ſucceed him in the kingdom of Babylon. The king of the Medes obſerved, that this was but a weak argument in him, who had preſumed to act as judge in his own cauſe, and inflict puniſhments in his own right, inſtead of appealing to him, and ſubmitting to what he ſhould have ſeen to have been moſt proper to be done in the caſe; and in ſhort, declared, that in ten days time he would paſs the ſentence on him he had deſerved [s].

NANYBRUS, terrified at this, repairs to an eunuch called Mitraphernes, who was in greateſt favour with the king of the Medes, and promiſed him 10 talents of gold, 100 talents of ſilver, 10 golden cups, 200 of ſilver, and a great quantity of fine cloathing, if he would but ſtand his friend. As for the king of the Medes himſelf, he made him by his eunuch, at the ſame time, an offer of 100 talents of gold, 1000 talents of ſilver, 100 golden goblets, 300 of the ſame in ſilver, innumerable veſtments, and other rich gifts, if he might but have his life ſpared, and the kingdom of Babylon ſecured to him [t].

THE eunuch, thus tempted, repaired to the king's bed-chamber, and preſſed him very much in the behalf of his client, repreſenting, that he had done nothing worthy of death; that he had not even taken a cruel revenge on Parſondas; that he had abſtained from his blood, and ſerved him only in kind. He then urged, that, if after this it ſhould be thought right to deprive him of life, he might be ſpared for his ſake, and promiſed, that if the favour was granted him, the Babylonian ſhould preſent him with vaſt gifts, and give Parſondas 100 talents of ſilver. The king, at length, gave ear to the inſinuations and arguments of this his favourite eunuch, and ſentenced Nanybrus to a fine accordingly; which, as it gave great joy to Nanybrus, affected Parſondas equally with indignation and diſdain, who beſtowed his maledictions upon the man who firſt found out gold, ſeeing for the ſake of that he was to live the ſport and deriſion of an effeminate Babylonian. The eunuch, who had thus interpoſed with his good offices, underſtanding that Parſondas ſtill glowed with rage, and even more than ever, not only exhorted him to be reconciled to Nanybrus, but told him, it was the king's will and pleaſure he ſhould be ſo. But Parſondas, deaf to all that could be ſaid to him on that ſubject, continued to meditate revenge both on Nanybrus and his friend the eunuch; and in the end had the ſatisfaction of being revenged on both [u].

BUT we have been too particular in theſe ſtories about this firſt king of Babylon, ſo ſelf-evidently fabulous, and to dilate thereon would only lead us into a repetition of what is gone before in diſproof of it.

FROM

FROM this fictitious relation then, to proceed to the genuine hiſtory of the Babylonians, in which there is a vaſt chaſm of many hundreds of years, between the times of Nimrod and Amraphel to the time we have now reached down to; the firſt Babylonian king we meet with after theſe, and thoſe we have mentioned to have ſucceeded between them, that we meet with in hiſtory ſacred and profane, is Nabonaſſar, the firſt in Ptolemy's canon. Concerning this king, ſo well known for the æra that paſſes under his name, we have nothing particular recorded but as it may be of great uſe to know in what manner he came to be king of Babylon, and how it comes to paſs, that Ptolemy could be aſſured of no Babylonian king who lived before his time, ſo late in compariſon of what has moſt generally, and till very lately, been pretended, we will venture to ſupply the deficiency by ſome probabilities and conjectures, which may carry ſo much weight with them, after what we have ſaid of the firſt riſe, progreſs, and apparent obſcurity of the antient kingdom of this people, as may ſatisfy every reader, that no point of hiſtory has been ſo perfectly miſtaken, as that which relates to the firſt riſe of the Babylonian kingdom, ſo much talked of by profane writers.

Nabonaſſar.

TOWARDS this attempt we have done much already, but this muſt be here premiſed, or rather repeated, that, however, we diſtinguiſh the Aſſyrians and Babylonians from each other; they were but two branches of one and the ſame family. By ſcripture this moſt evidently appears, where the Babylonian names are pure Aſſyrian; and by profane authors as much as explicitly confeſſed, who own and declare the city of Babylon was built by the Aſſyrians; and hence we are to conclude, that the antient people, that were in immediate ſubjection to Nimrod, have properly nothing to do with the great Babylonian kingdom, which aroſe in after-times, but that the whole muſt be attributed to the people who migrated with Aſhur, or Aſſur, and ever after retained his name. If any proof of this could be wanting, after what we have ſo often attempted in favour of it, we might not only recur to Cteſias himſelf and to Herodotus, but to the whole tribe of Greek and Latin writers; we therefore ſhall inſiſt no farther on it here, ſuppoſing it to be what muſt be univerſally granted, and ſhall only obſerve, that in Ptolemy's canon the king's of Babylon are called Aſſyrians, and that in the ſame the kings of Perſia are called the kings of the Medes, as it were in honour to the two nations of which they were natural tural branches; for, in ſtrictneſs, the hiſtory of the empire of Babylon is no other than a continuation of the hiſtory of the Aſſyrian empire; juſt as the empire of the Perſians is of the empire of the Medes, and hence in the title of the canon above you have mention only of the Aſſyrians and the Medes, though none but the kings of Babylon and Perſia are to be found therein, excepting the princes which follow Alexander the great.

HAVING ſettled this point, as we think, beyond the poſſibility of diſpute, we ſhall next endeavour at the proof of what we ſuggeſt, by the very ſituation of the countries in reſpect of each other, and the nature of things; by which it muſt be plain, that the kingdom of Babylon took birth with the kingdom of Aſſyria, and that they were twin ſiſters, or at leaſt produced within a few years of each other. Previous to this we muſt juſt repeat, that Pul, the firſt Aſſyrian with us, does not appear as a conqueror weſtward above 24 years before the firſt of the reign of Nabonaſſar, and we would venture to aſſert, that Pul muſt then have been in the middle of life, and that after this he may have lived at leaſt 24 years. And this being ſuppoſed, as it very naturally may, we ſhall have as good a proof as we can almoſt require, that he divided his empire between two of his ſons; for, according to Ptolemy, Nabonaſſar, had Babylon for his portion, and, according to ſcripture, Tiglath-pileſar had Aſſyria for his; for in ſcripture we find him as the immediate ſucceſſor of Pul, in about ſeven years after whoſe death, as we have here ſtated it, he appears on this ſide of the Euphrates, and leads off with him a number of captives of different tribes and nations; ſo that no chronologies can more exactly concur together than the ſcripture and the canon in this particular; and what is more, they will, at the ſame time, help us to ſome lights to guide us to the truth of what Cteſias and his followers have ſo ſeemingly diſguiſed, as we ſhall not fail to obſerve. In the mean time, to return to our point: The very ſituation of theſe countries may convince us, that the thing was as we contend; for they ſo mutually extend againſt each other on the banks of the Tigris, which was the common boundary of both, and the only partition between them, and Babylonia was ſo throughout a barrier between Aſſyria and the weſtern parts, that the Aſſyrian could not have reached any of them, but by croſſing ſome part or other of the country of Babylon [w], and and but to imagine he attempted to croſs the Euphrates, before he had made a conqueſt of this rich and fertile land, were an abſurdity of the moſt glaring kind. And accordingly we find, that Cteſias, how inconſiſtent ſoever he may have been in other points, was ſo ſenſible of this, that he makes this the firſt conqueſt the Aſſyrians attempted, even though he as good as confeſſes his Ninus never to have croſſed the Euphrates, concluding, it would appear ridiculous, that a man, who had taken it into his head to become a conqueror, and to extend his dominion over all other countries, ſhould not firſt make ſure of ſo near a neighbour, which muſt have been more tempting to him than any other he could poſſibly have in view.

Now, as we have plainly ſeen, that the two kingdoms took birth together in one man, it is inconſiſtent to ſuppoſe, they were not in ſubordination to one another; and accordingly it appears, that Nabonaſſar was the younger ſon, and conſequently in ſubjection to his brother Tiglathpileſar, who is ſtiled the king of Aſſyria, and held his reſidence at the original ſeat of the empire Niniveh, which that it was older than the city called by us Babylon, is not only to be gathered from the prophet [x] and other paſſages in ſcripture, but from the bulk of prophane authors, who concur, that Niniveh was finiſhed before the foundations of Babylon were laid.

This being ſettled, we ſhall have no more reaſon to wonder, that theſe two kingdoms were in perfect harmony, than that two brothers ſhould agree together; the ambition of the one muſt have contributed to the grandeur and proſperity of the other reciprocally; and that a right of ſuperiority was acknowledged by the younger branch at Babylon, towards the elder at Niniveh, may be eaſily conceived. If this was not exactly the caſe, we ſhall have ſuch difficulties ſtart up againſt us, both in the hiſtory of Babylon and that of Aſſyria, as are quite inſurmountable. We know they exiſted as collateral kingdoms, for while the great Sennacherib was in his full glory, and warring in the weſt, we read of an embaſſy from Merodach Baladan, king of Babylon, to Hezekiah; not to mention the other kings before him and after him in the canon. Now if there had not been the ſtricteſt union, and a moſt natural ſubordination, between the two kingdoms on the other ſide of the Euphrates; is it to be imagined, that any king of Aſſyria would have croſſed that river to war in the weſt, while

while he was disjoined from his own country by ſo formidable and powerful a kingdom as Babylon muſt have been, and who might have taken the advantage in his abſence, when he had, as it is likely, drained his country of the choiceſt of his ſoldiery, to ſpoil and deſtroy it? Or might they not have joined the Ciſeuphratenſians againſt him, and have ſurrounded him on all ſides, and, by the additional numbers they muſt have brought into the field, have routed and utterly deſtroyed him? And muſt not this or the other have really been the caſe ſome time or other, if the kings of the two countries had not been bound together by the moſt ſolemn ties of obligation every way? Could the Babylonians, who were confeſſedly a kingdom all the time, have been ſo ſupine as ſuppoſed, with ſuch a neighhbour at their very door, and when, at the ſame time, they muſt have known, that all the weſtern nations would moſt readily have joined them to deſtroy theſe ambitious princes, who, by ſo frequently croſſing the Euphrates, expoſed themſelves, as powerful as their armies may have been, as often in great meaſure to their mercy? Other irreſiſtible arguments may be urged to maintain us in what we would here advance; but, apprehending, we have ſaid rather more than enough to convince the reader already, we ſhall paſs them over as needleſs.

Nabonaſſar likely to have been the Ninus of profane authors.

FROM all this we may gather, that Nabonaſſar, this firſt king of Babylon, bids as fair to have been the Ninus of Cteſias as Tiglath-pileſar, and rather more ſo; and particularly as he was, as is moſt likely, the huſband of Semiramis, who, if ſhe had any right to be denominated from any city of theſe parts, was confeſſedly, according to the common notion, a Babylonian, as we ſhall obſerve immediately. For notwithſtanding the Ninus of Cteſias is ſaid to have raiſed the city of Niniveh, in which he differs from what we think very evident, he agrees in ſo many other points with the perſon of Nabonaſſar, that he makes full amends for it. We have ſeen him the viſible ſon of Pul, whom we have aſſerted to have been the Belus of that author: and that he was a warrior, cannot be doubted, when it is conſidered, that the family he was a branch of had juſt began to eſtabliſh a power, by conqueſt, over all the nations they could reach. But that he may have been magnified a little beyond the truth, or indeed a great deal, muſt not aſtoniſh us, when we remember, that this younger family, riſing upon the ruins of the elder, may have have arrogated more to themselves than was really their due, and that even what they did arrogate may have been enlarged by tradition, which always spreads as it goes.

THUS far again we see a resemblance between Ninus and Nabonassar, the conquests of the former are confined wholly to the Transeuphratensian regions, he never once makes his appearance on this side of the river[y], except in the romantic lists of his conquests. And so it is most likely to have been with Nabonassar, who may have warred upon the Medes, the Bactrians, and neighbouring people, while the emperor, his eldest brother, was prosecuting a war, and grasping at conquests of far greater importance, whereby he hoped to become master of the great and wealthy kingdoms of Syria, Phœnice, and Palestine, and thereby to pave his way to Egypt itself; states, who for their great opulence must, above all others, have allured a race of princes, possessed with an unnatural lust to live upon the spoil.

As we have seen, that he may possibly have been the Ninus of profane writers, we are next to declare, that he can never have been either the Shalmaneser of scripture, or the Belesis of Ctesias, according to the generality of christians. Shalmaneser he cannot possibly have been; for he had, according to the canon, been dead five years before Shalmaneser seems to have begun his reign; nor can he have been Belesis, for if he be a prince any where in the canon, he must have been Nabopalassar, and indeed can have been no other. Now Nabopalassar did not begin to reign at Babylon till full 108 years after Nabonassar had been departed this life. Nor consequently can have been Nanybrus, who was confessedly the same with Belesis.

Semiramis most likely to have been the wife of Nabonassar.

To dwell no longer on the mistakes that have been committed with regard to this first king of Babylon, we would next observe, that the Semiramis of the Greeks must have been his wife, if ever there was such a queen of Babylon; whereby we shall still more amply evince that he may have been Ninus. We have been told she was born at Ascalon in Syria, that she was brought from that country by a certain officer belonging to the king of Assyria, and that Ninus fell in love with her, though married to that officer, and made her his queen[z]. Now as we have stated the chronology of Assyria and Babylonia, it was about the middle of Nabonassar's reign at Babylon, that his his ſeeming brother, Tiglath-pileſar, croſſed the Euphrates, and captivated ſome of the tribes and nations to the weſtward. Among theſe captives, it is very likely, Semiramis may have been, according to the ſtory of Cteſias; and, as ſhe muſt have been a woman of very ſuperior wit and beauty, it is not ſtrange, that ſome great Aſſyrian lord ſhould take her to his bed, and even make her his moſt favourite wife. It is poſſible alſo, that ſhe may have attended him to the war with the Bactrians as related [a], where we have made it probable, that Nabonaſſar may have commanded. And that this was ſomething of the caſe appears by this, that Ninus lived not very long with her, and left her behind him with a young child [b]. Now Nabonaſſar reigned but 14 years in all [c]; and it was in the ſeventh year of his reign that Tiglath-pileſar firſt made any captives from this ſide of the river. If then we ſuppoſe, as according to the ſtory we may, that ſhe lived with her firſt huſband five years, ſhe muſt have fallen to the lot of Nabonaſſar, if ſhe was his wife, in the latter end of his 12th, or the beginning of his 13th year, and ſo he can have lived with her but barely two years; and this agrees ſeemingly with Cteſias, who, as we apprehend, makes the duration of their marriage to be very ſhort [d].

Whence it came to paſs, that Semiramis ruled over Babylon.

If we build upon any foundation, as poſſibly we may, we ſhall hereby be able to diſcover, how it came to paſs, that ſhe had the ſovereign ſway over Babylon, as alſo that her reign was but very ſhort. For, conſidering her own perſonal excellencies that ſhe muſt have been the idol of her deceaſed huſband, and the mother and nurſe of a tender infant he had left to ſucceed him, nothing is more natural, than that ſhe ſhould aſſume the reins of the government, and in conſequence thereof attempt to make herſelf an everlaſting name, for her exploits abroad and her works at home. Accordingly it is poſſible, ſhe may have headed armies againſt ſome of the people mentioned in her hiſtory; and though ſhe did not build the city of Babylon, which by all circumſtances we may aſſure ourſelves ſhe did not; ſhe may ſo have added to it, or embelliſhed it, as to have intitled her as much, in proportion, to the honour of being reckoned the foundreſs of Babylon, as Nebuchadnezzar had to be eſteemed the founder. A woman of the ſort ſhe muſt have been could never ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity portunity of making herself conspicuous to all ages; and by her example she is said to have stirred an emulation in a queen, who succeeded almost 200 years after her, and who, it seems, vied with her to the degree of eclipsing her [c]. The name of this queen is Nitocris, and between her and Semiramis there is said to have been five generations [f], which, according to the common way of computing, being equal to 150 years, and the sum of the years of the Babylonian kings amounting to 210, if from thence we deduct the 14 years of Nabonassar's reign, and as many from that of Nabonadius, who was the last king, and the son of this Nitocris [g], we shall have a remainder of 182 years. This will be an argument against us, with regard to what we are attempting to prove of Semiramis, and we confess it; for after this rate Semiramis must have lived above six generations before Nitocris; we would therefore, since we have so many concurrent circumstances in our behalf, conclude, that Herodotus is mistaken in this matter, which he well may be, in so traditionary a piece of history as this must have been in his time. If no historian had made greater mistakes than this, we should not have been involved in such labyrinths, as we have often been throughout the course of this work.

Now if things were as we suspect them to have been, this great and deified Semiramis reigned but two years [h], for her son, according to this, lived no longer, and must have died at two or three years old; and indeed we have formerly made it an objection [i], that she should have reigned so great a length of time after her son was arrived at years of discretion. Nor can she have been any other than the wife of Nabonassar, by the tradition which makes her the foundress of Babylon, of which she is reported to have laid the very foundations; this is supposing her to have been the first queen there, and if so, as at the bottom of the profane accounts there may be something of truth, as we have observed [k] before, she can have been queen to no Ninus but Nabonassar, and can have reigned no longer than her infant son, who was king but two years.

Her reign but short.

HAVING thus picked some seeming truth out of Ctesias's fiction, we may from the several particulars reflect a light on the worship that was paid to her, particularly in Palestine, leſtine, Syria, and Babylon [l]. For ſhe may have really been born in the firſt, tranſported from the ſecond, and deified in the third; ſo that, each having a ſort of natural claim to her, it is no wonder they ſo eagerly contended to do her honour. All this may ſtand with the times we here ſuppoſe her to have lived in; but can poſſibly ſuit with no other that we know of. And that ſhe was of mean extraction at Aſcalon, that ſhe was in the ſtate of a ſervant in Syria or the parts adjacent; and that thence ſhe was carried to Niniveh or Babylon, does not only appear by the Cteſian account of her, and by what is poſitively aſſerted of her, that ſhe was originally a ſervant or ſlave [m]; but alſo by the fable invented to cover the obſcurity of her birth. In a word, the circumſtances, as related of her by profane authors, may very naturally be deduced from the circumſtances of the firſt riſe of the Aſſyrian monarchy in ſcripture; and it is plain, they are put backwards a number of ages, only to reflect the greater degree of reverence on her; nor muſt we wonder, that ſhe had forty years added to the length of her reign, by the prieſts, or others, who may have had a greater intereſt in magnifying her, than in adherence to the naked truth, any more, than that ſhe ſhould be ſaid to have done infinitely more than it is certain ſhe did; or that in the end ſhe ſhould have been deified; for whatever could contribute to derive the greater honour on her contributed the more to confirm her in the ſuperſtitious awe that in time came to be contracted for her.

Particulars concerning her.

HAVING thus ſeen, that Semiramis muſt, in all probability, have been the wife of Nabonaſſar, the firſt Babylonian king, and ſon to the great Pul, or Belus, we ſhall next take notice of ſome circumſtances concerning her, which we purpoſely omitted when we gave her hiſtory as queen of Aſſyria. She is equally famed as the foundreſs of the city of Babylon, and as a fortunate heroine, who aimed at no leſs than the conqueſt of the then known world, as we have ſeen: That ſhe may have embelliſhed or added greatly to that city we have granted, nor can we refuſe ſome ſort of credit to ſo general a tradition; nor will we deny, but ſhe may have warred againſt the Bactrians, and other nations in thoſe parts [n]; and of this her maſculine turn of mind may, by the way, confirm us in a belief, that that ſhe was from her youth bred up to the toil and labour of a ſervant, as reported, which muſt naturally have formed her to ſuch exploits. As for what ſhe did at Babylon, it muſt have been but little in compariſon to what was done to it afterwards, when it came to be improved by the great Nebuchadnezzar, as we ſhall hereafter obſerve; only for the preſent taking notice, that, as the city muſt in her time have been in its infancy, and ſhe at moſt reigned but two years without the participation of her huſband, and not above four years in all, and in the midſt of the wars then waging by the Aſſyrians with all the nations round about, it is not conceivable, but ſhe muſt have left that city in no very extraordinary ſtate for magnificence or grandeur.

AGAIN, as her reign muſt have been very ſhort, we would urge, that ſhe did not any thing like what is reported of her as an heroine; and that it is almoſt clear, that ſhe did no more than finiſh the war with the Medes, or with the Bactrians, or perhaps with both, as tradition informs us; and that thus ſhe completed what her huſband Nabonaſſar, according to our ſuppoſition, had begun and conducted towards an end. More ſhe certainly cannot have done in the ſhort ſpace of her adminiſtration, whether in the days of her huſband or of her ſon; and this muſt have intitled her to immortal fame, if, at the ſame time, as it ſeems, we muſt grant, ſhe did any thing notable towards the improvement or embelliſhment of the city of Babylon; nor is it ſtrange, that after this we ſhould be ſhewn her through the magnifying-glaſs of profane authors, who had their accounts from the Babylonians, who may have thought, they could not poſſibly do themſelves too much honour in reporting wonders of this their firſt and moſt fortunate queen. And all their tales being greedily ſwallowed even by the moſt judicious, we have her thence compared with Seſoſtris [o] a fabulous hero, and hence we ſee her building fleets, arming legions, raiſing Babylon, and, in ſhort, circumnavigating the red ſea, or Indian ocean, and reducing the Arabians and Ethiopians [p]; and hence her altars, together with thoſe of Hercules, the Liber Pater, and others towards the confines of India [q]. Hence ſhe is repreſented to have been a tyranneſs of the moſt rigid and inexorable inexorable fort[r]; and hence she is fabled to have been so active in keeping the people in subjection and awe, that hearing of a tumult and an insurrection of the Babylonians, as she was dressing her head, she would not give herself time to finish what she was about, but rushed forth from her chamber, with her hair half about her ears, to reduce the revolters, and would never so much as set her hair in order before she had done as she had resolved [s]; and that thenceforward she was represented, by a statue at Babylon, in an undress, and her hair dishevelled [t]. Hence it is she is represented as a monster of lust [u]; and hence she is celebrated for the many mighty deeds and exploits we have formerly related of her [w], and others equally fabulous, which we shall not here insist on. In fine, she is said to have been the first Assyrian queen and lady, to have first surrounded Niniveh with walls, and to have changed its name into Babylon [x], a strange absurdity we need not animadvert on. But after all that is boasted of her by the same author [y] he acquaints us, that she died in her bed [z].

Nadius. THE second king of the Babylonians is called Nadius [a], who reigned but two years; and if what we have ventured to conjecture in the foregoing reign was at all the case, as, by comparing things together as we have there done, it seems to have been, this Nadius must have been the Ninyas of Ctesias and his followers, and his followers, and must have dyed an infant of about three years old.

Chinzirus and Porus. THE next that filled the throne was Chinzirus [b] and Porus, who reigned five years: Concerning these we have nothing to conjecture. The names seem to belong to two persons, and they may have been brothers; or it may be, that one man may have born both the names, which seem to have no direct affinity either with the Chaldee or the Assyrian.

Jugæus. JUGÆUS * reigned next; there is nothing recorded of him, nor can we offer at one conjecture concerning him, except that he, as well as those he immediately succeeded, and those that came after him, down to Assar-addin, did nothing worthy notice, and that they may have passed their days in sloth and effeminacy.

MARDOC-EMPAD [c], he is certainly the Merodach-baladan of ſcripture, the ſame that ſent an embaſſy to Hezekiah king of Judah. The times of the former in the canon, and of the latter in ſcripture, agree exactly; and it muſt have been in the ſeventh or eighth year of his reign that he ſent to Hezekiah. In Iſaiah [d] he is called Merodach-baladan, as we have written him above, but in the book of Kings he is called Berodach-baladan [e], and in both places, the ſon of Baladan, whence we gather, that the Jugæus above, who ſeems to have been his father, would be more properly called Baladan, though that is what we would not venture to do. If, as is moſt generally ſuppoſed, he ſent this embaſſy to Jeruſalem, to inquire concerning the regreſſion of the ſhadow upon Ahaz's ſun-dial [f], he muſt be concluded to have been a prince of curioſity, and a man that cultivated aſtronomy, or at leaſt encouraged it in others: Though that this was all the buſineſs of this embaſſy, may be diſputed; for there ſeems to have been ſome other view in it, by the parade Hezekiah, upon this occaſion, made of his warlike ſtores and treaſures [g]. It may be ſuſpected there was ſomething more than the ſolution of a curious enquiry intended; for, as Senacherib was then alive, it cannot well be conceived, how there ſhould have been ſuch a liberty taken by his Babylonian relation or dependant, as to correſpond with an enemy by ambaſſadors. This is the firſt Babylonian king we read of in ſcripture to have had any intercourſe with the kings at Jeruſalem; and he muſt have been a man of reſolution and ambition, if we ſuppoſe he wanted to draw Hezekiah into an alliance with him againſt the Aſſyrian emperor. Upon the whole, the men he ſent from Babylon ſeem rather to have been private agents than public ambaſſadors, and what was tranſacted with them ſeems to have been quite a ſecret. He may have underſtood, that the Medes were on the point to revolt, as they certainly did a very ſhort time afterwards, and that other nations, their neighbours, were ripe for the ſame; this he may have known, and may therefore have attempted alliances with the Jews and others, on this ſide of the Euphrates, againſt Sennacherib, to ſecure his own dominions, or to enable him to withſtand withstand such incursions, as he may have dreaded from the same people; but we forbear to expatiate farther hereon. Thus far is certain, that things now began to threaten some calamity to Assyria; and it is likely, Merodach-baladan might have foreseen it, and bestirred himself to make sure of what belonged to himself. This prince reigned 12 years and was succeeded by

Arkianus. ARKIANUS [h], concerning whom all we know is, that he reigned but five years, and that after him there was an inter-reign of two years [i]. This is distinguished as the first

First inter-reign. inter-reign in the Babylonian kingdom, and thereby it might be fairly concluded, that the line of Nabonassar became extinct in the last king, or that it was set aside, if it be not more rational to suppose, that the kingdom was not hereditary, so as to fall of course to the eldest son. There may have been disputes among the sons about the succession, or the king of Niniveh, who may have appointed the kings of Babylon according to his own pleasure and good liking, may not, in this space of time, have determined who should next be king of Babylon. Assarhaddon was now emperor of Assyria, and the Medes had actually revolted five or six years before, and he may now have been at a loss whom to substitute in the throne of Babylon, which, if what we have observed be right, may have been filled with slothful and inactive princes ever since the death of Nabonassar, or his wife, if she was so, Semiramis. For while the kings of Niniveh were successively warring in the west, the kings of Babylon may have degenerated considerably, and have fallen into disgrace and vice, in conformity to what prophane authors relate of the successors of Semiramis; and may, by their indolence or connivance, have encouraged the Medes to shake off the yoke.

Belibus. BELIBUS [k] succeeded to this inter-reign, but by what means, or by what right, we know not, except that it may plainly appear, that he was appointed by Assar-haddon. He reigned but three years, at the end of which term, whether he died, or was displaced, may be doubted, by the shortness of his duration as king.

Apronadius. Regibélus. Mesessimordacus. HE made room for Apronadius [l], who reigned six years, and gave place to Regibelus [m], who, possessing the throne but one year, made way for Mesessimordacus [n], who held the the ſcepter but four years, and gave place to an interreign [o], which laſted full eight years. To fill up this chaſm, it may hence be confirmed to us, that the kings of Babylon were at the pleaſure of the king of Aſſyria, and appointed by him, as he thought proper, out of the Babylonian family; the ſhortneſs of the four preceding reigns may perſuade us, that the kings, between this inter-reign and the former, did not ſucceed each other as father and ſon, and the ſame we may indeed conclude of the kings between Nabonaſſar and the firſt inter-reign, who were but a little while on the throne, and ſeem to have been rather appointed governors for a certain term of years, than kings ſucceeding in right of each other; nor can it well have been otherwiſe. The elder family at Niniveh muſt in time have aſſumed conſiderably over the younger at Babylon, and contracted a jealouſy of them, and impoſed ſuch hardſhips on them, or have ſome way or other behaved to them ſo as to provoke them at laſt to join with the Medes to deſtroy them. Thus the thing ſeems to have been. Second inter-reign.

THE eight years of this inter-reign being expired, Aſſar-addin [p], the Eſar-haddon of ſcripture, poſſeſſed himſelf of the kingdom of Babylon. We have already ſaid all we poſitively know of him, when we formerly gave his reign as king of Aſſyria. It is remarkable, that he ſhould deliberate ſo long as eight years, before he aſſumed the government of Babylon in perſon. We formerly made it a doubt [q], whether or no he ſeated himſelf maſter here by art or by violence; but by what, we think, we plainly diſcover of theſe collateral kingdoms of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, he now ſet aſide the Babylonian family as uſeleſs, or dangerous, to his empire, which muſt now have been in a very crazy condition [r]. By this ſtep of policy he ſeems to have re-eſtabliſhed the Aſſyrian monarchy; and remarkable it may be thought, that he made no attempts towards the recovery and extenſion of the Aſſyrian conqueſts weſtward, till he had thus taken Babylon to himſelf [s]. Hence it may appear, that the former diviſion of the empire, however ſmall it may have been, was now judged hurtful thereto, and that ſo it had been, appears by the conſequences of this junction, after which the Aſſyrians roſe to a higher pitch than ever they had been, at leaſt in the weſtern parts, where under this king they eſtabliſhed their power more firmly than Aſſar-addin.

it ever had been, and even conquered Egypt [t]. The obſcurity of the kings of Babylon, between Nabonaſſar and this Aſſar-addin, may have given birth to what is related of the ſloth and inactivity of all the kings that ſucceeded between Semiramis and Sardanapalus, a name which we have as good as proved to have belonged to this prince [u]; but at the ſame time we have ſhewn there were two of the name, a warrior and an effeminate man. This then muſt have been Sardanapalus the warrior, for his hiſtory declares him to have been ſuch, but that is what we need not repeat. He reigned at Babylon 13 years, and was ſucceeded by

Saoſducheus. SAOSDUCHEUS, or Saoſduchinus [w], who, as well as his predeceſſor, was king both of Niniveh, and Babylon. We have already ſaid all of him we have been able to collect [x], as king of Aſſyria. He reigned 20 years and was ſucceeded by Chyniladan. CHYNILADAN [y], whom we have ſhewn to be the Nabuchadonoſor of the book of Judith [z], where we have given all the hiſtory we know of him. He, as well as his two predeceſſors, was king both of Aſſyria and Babylon, and reigned 22 years. The length of theſe three reigns, which in ſum make up 55 years, which exceeds the ſum of the nine reigns and two inter-reigns between Nabonaſſar and Aſſar-addin by two years, may convince us, that the kings of Babylon during that interval were little better than governors, placed and diſplaced by the kings of Aſſyria at their will and pleaſure; and continued or diſcontinued juſt as they approved themſelves more or leſs truſty and ſerviceable to the Aſſyrian kings. Hitherto the kingdom of Babylon had been dependent on the emperors at Niniveh; it now begins to emerge, and to rear up the head as an empire, exalting itſelf on the ruins of the Aſſyrian monarchy.

Nabopallaſſar. FOR Nabopallaſſar [a] ſucceeded Chyniladan, and is ſaid to have wreſted the kingdom of Babylon from the Aſſyrians, and to have ſeized on it himſelf, and is plainly the man who transferred the ſeat of the Aſſyrian monarchy to Babylon.

bylon [b]. His name declares him to have been an Aſſyrian, and to have derived his origin from Pul and Nabonaſſar his ſon, it partaking equally of both; for as Nabonaſſar is plainly compounded of Nebo-adan-aſſur, this man ſeems to have rejected the Addon for Pul, and to have had his name compounded from Nebo-pul-aſſur; which, it is likely, he may have aſſumed upon his revolt from the Aſſyrian Sarac, Sarchedon, or Sardanapalus [c], and claims, as ſhould plainly appear by his name, to have been lineally deſcended from Pul by Nabonaſſar, and ſo, it is likely, pretended to a right of inheritance in the kingdom of Babylon, of which his family had been unjuſtly deprived by the elder branch of Aſſyria. Thus it ſeems natural to conclude; if ſo it was, he had a fair opportunity of aſſerting his right, for being appointed over Chaldæa upon the death of Chyniladan, who left the Aſſyrian affairs in great confuſion, and at a time when the Medes were in full vigor of their purſuit againſt the kings at Niniveh [d], he took the advantage, and ſeizing on the kingdom of Babylon for himſelf, he entered into alliances with Aſtyages the Mede, and to confirm the ſame deſired his daughter Amyite in marriage for his ſon Nabocolaſſar [e], and joining heartily in the war with him againſt the kingdom of Aſſyria, they reduced it to a very humble condition, though, as we have made it appear [f], he did not live to ſee the final deſtruction of it; for the irruption of the Scythians put a ſtop to the progreſs of theſe new allies, for the ſpace, as we are told, of 28 years [g].

thians, who during his time prevailed in Aſia [o], was in imminent danger of being blaſted in his hopes by an invaſion from Egypt. For Pharaoh Necho, at that time king of the country, underſtanding, that the kingdom of Aſſyria was as good as diſſolved, by the combination of the Babylonians with the Medes, and that the confederates themſelves were under reſtraint from the Scythians, thought this a proper opportunity to be revenged on the Tranſeuphratenſians, who had captivated the kingdom of Egypt in the days of the great Eſar-haddon [p], and to raiſe himſelf an empire over the kingdoms and countries on this ſide of the Euphrates, which had, for ſome time paſt, been under the kings of Aſſyria by conqueſt. He proſecuted his deſign, ſuceeeded to his wiſh, and even took the great city of Carchemiſh, Circutium, or, as it is moſt corruptly written, Carchabeſa [q], upon the Euphrates [r]. This we are told was his caſe, but we have ſeen it is falſe; for before this invaſion of Necho he muſt have been dead [s] ſome time, as appears by the circumſtance we are told of Joſiah's death, who was ſlain at Megiddo in making head againſt Necho, as he was marching againſt the king of Aſſyria [t], who can have been none other than Sarac [u]; for as Joſiah reigned full 31 years [w], he muſt according to the courſe of ſcripture and Ptolemy's canon, have ſurvived Nabopallaſar. It is therefore plain, that we cannot rely upon Beroſus [x], when he informs us, that he ſent his ſon Nabuchadonoſor to quell the rebellious ſatrapa, or governor of Egypt, Phœnicia, and Syria, as he plainly calls Pharaoh Necho; nor did Nabuchadonoſor effect this till after his death, and after he had ſubverted Niniveh, which was brought to paſs by his valour and good fortune, in conjunction with Cyaxares the Mede his brother-in-law [y]. There was then no war between Babylon and Egypt during the life of Nabopallaſſar, nor was there any ſuch officer as a ſatrapa over Egypt, Phœnicia, and Syria, in his time, for the Aſſyrians; Egypt had recovered itſelf a conſiderable time before [z] from the conqueſt and captivation of Eſar-haddon; and Judah was all this this time under her own king Joſiah [a], and that all the weſtern regions, on this ſide of the Euphrates, had ſhaken off the Aſſyrian yoke is plain, not only by the hiſtory of Chyniladan [b], but by the trouble the great Nebuchadnezzar had afterwards to reduce them to Babylon. We may perceive then that Beroſus, in the paſſage before us, confounds the father and ſon together, and that he is too haſty in bringing on the deſtruction of Niniveh; for till that had been effected, there is no ſuppoſing the Babylonians could have pretended to croſs the Euphrates; and that there was a king of Aſſyria ſubſiſting in the day that Joſiah was killed by Necho, we learn from ſcripture [c], and that Joſiah ſurvived Nabopallaſſar, we underſtand by comparing the ſame with the canon [d]. This ſatrapa of Egypt and Syria muſt be underſtood proleptically, except we ſuppoſe the office to have ſubſiſted upon the conqueſts of Eſar-haddon; which if it did, whoever enjoyed it had little to boaſt but the empty title, as may be eaſily diſcovered. We are certain then of no one particular fact relating to Nabopallaſſar, except that he withdrew obedience from the king of Aſſyria, that he joined with the Mede, in order to put an end to that kingdom, and that he reigned 21 years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon.

(A) His name, taken which way you will, may be diſcovered to have been Aſſyrian, by the termination Aſſur. We have already given the ſeeming derivation of it, and only mention it here to remind the reader of what we have ſo often aſſerted, that the Babylonian monarchy, how much ſoever it may have been diſtinguiſhed from the Aſſyrian, was no more than a continuation of it. And this may be the more pertinently remarked here, as this prince was not only the firſt emperor at Babylon, properly ſo called, for his father can never be quite conſidered as ſuch; but as he was alſo the man in whom the Aſſyrian or Babylonian greatneſs arrived at its utmoſt height, as appears by Daniel, who, ſumming up the whole of it in his perſon, declares, that the golden head he ſaw in his viſion was meant to ſignify himſelf *.

was he that completed what his father had aimed at, and subjected what had been before the Assyrian empire to the obedience of the throne at Babylon; it is he that must be called the first Babylonian monarch. It has been said, that his father, grown old and feeble, had intrusted him with the reins of the government some years before he died, and that, in consequence of this, he waged war with Pharaoh Necho, who had conquered all Syria to himself, while the Medes and Babylonians were under restraint by the Scythians, or busied in the reduction of Niniveh; and that in this war he not only wrested Carchemish, or Circesium, or Circutium, a considerable town on the Mesopotamian side of the Euphrates, from Pharaoh Necho, and routed him with a great slaughter; but reduced all the provinces on this side of the Euphrates which had been seized by Necho, and made a conquest even of Egypt itself, where, understanding his father was dead at Babylon, he took the necessary measures to secure those countries, and, by the shortest way of the desart, hastened to Babylon [f]. This we have shewn to be a mistake, so far as it is possible to detect an error of this nature (B). He certainly

(B) We have already (1) demonstrated the thing to have been as we here suggest, concerning the death of Nabopalassar; but as it is a point which immediately concerns the history of this branch of the Assyrian family, we may be allowed to repeat our attempt here, by stating it in another manner, and to make it still clearer, if it be possible so to do. From the death of Assar-addin to the first year of the reign of Chyniladan is 20 years, and from the first of the reign of Chyniladan to the 12th, that he warred upon the Medes, is 32 years. Manasseh was taken prisoner by Assar-addin in the 21st year of his reign, and, according to all appearance, in the 9th or 10th year of Assar-addin's reign at Babylon. The 9th or 10th year we say; because, as he took Manasseh captive not long before he invaded Egypt and was to hold Egypt but three years (2), according to the prophet, and reigned at Babylon but 13 years, we cannot be induced but to think, he effected his conquest of Egypt in the latter part of his reign, and that, as he certainly must have kept the same in subjection all his life-time, he died within three or four years after he had taken Manasseh tainly did not croſs the Euphrates, before he, in conjunction with his brother-in-law Cyaxares the Mede, had put an

Manaſſeh priſoner. This being ſtated, if Manaſſeh was made a captive in the 9th or 10th year of Aſſar-addin at Babylon, and as Manaſſeh reigned 34 years after his ſaid captivity, if, to the 32 years between the war Chyniladan made upon the Medes and the death of Aſſarhaddin, we add three or four years, to make the 13 years of this laſt king complete at Babylon, it muſt follow, that Manaſſeh died either in the 10th or 11th year of the ſaid Chyniladan; and as, between the laſt year of Manaſſeh and the firſt of Joſiah, there is an interval but of two years, Joſiah muſt have begun his reign either in the 12th or the 13th year of the ſame Chyniladan; from the 14th or the 13th of Chyniladan to the laſt year of his ſucceſſor Nabopalaſſar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, muſt, according to this, have been either 30 or 31 years. Now Joſiah reigned 31 years, and therefore muſt either have outlived Nabopalaſſar by one year, or have died the ſame year he died; ſuppoſing the reign of this Babylonian to have ended with his life, and we know not how to think otherwiſe; for if he had committed the reins of his government ever ſo much to the guidance of his ſon, he muſt have been conſidered, according to all appearance, but as his lieutenant; the father muſt ſtill have been king, tho' we conſider him but as collegue with his ſon, and the years he lived and reigned, either in whole or in part, muſt have been reckoned to him accordingly. Now when Joſiah was killed, there was a king of Aſſyria ſtill in being; it was not againſt the Medes and Babylonians that Pharaoh Necho went up, as Joſephus * in a hurry miſtakes the matter: His buſineſs was apparently to get a ſhare of the Aſſyrian empire, which the Medes and Babylonians were on the point of dividing between them; Nabopalaſſar then could have claimed no lawful homage of the king of Egypt, who can have been no rebel to him, nor can he have even ſent his ſon to ſuch remote parts as Egypt, when he had ſo much to do at home, and found, that his whole force, combined together with that of the Medes, was not more than neceſſary to deſtroy the old Aſſyrian family; not to mention the Scythians, who, if ever they held any dominion in theſe parts of Aſia, muſt have held it now, in this interval between the fall of the Aſſyrians and the riſe of the Babylonians and the Medes. Beroſus then, in what he ſays of the expedition Nabopalaſſar ſent his ſon againſt his pretended Satrapa of the Syrians and Egyptians, ſeems rather to have deſired to magnify this firſt Babylonian hero, than to adhere to

to the truth. No attempt can have been made, either by him or his ſon, on this ſide of the Euphrates, till Niniveh had been deſtroyed and the Scythians expelled. Now in the very laſt year of his reign, Pharaoh Necho came upon his very frontiers, and took Carchemiſh from him, as we have here ſtated it, though, as we computed before †, this invaſion and ſucceſs of the Egyptian muſt have fallen out full four years after his reign had been expired. So that take it which way you will, and make all the allowances you poſſibly can in the behalf of Beroſus, it is plain, he is not ſincere with us in this caſe. Pharaoh Necho, who muſt have been the Satrapa or governor he talks of in the weſtern parts, muſt have been by far a more powerful prince than Nabopalaſſar his pretended maſter; and we are, for this reaſon, inclined to think, that by the ſame rule he degrades this potent Egyptian, he muſt have ſpun out the life of his Babylonian beyond its natural limits, and have made him a mightier man than he was. If Beroſus abounded with many ſuch miſtakes as theſe ſeem to have been, he deſerves to be as little regretted as Trogus, or any other we have condemned.

Here we would beg leave to rectify an overſight and ſeeming inconſiſtency, that formerly (3) eſcaped us, where we ſuppoſe the city of Niniveh to have been ſome time deſtroyed in the fourth year of Nebuchadnezzar, which, as we have ſtated things there, coincides with the year Joſiah was ſlain by Necho, though, according to ſcripture, there was then an Aſſyrian king abſolutely in being, and though we have elſewhere determined (4), that Nineveh was not ruined but in the ſecond, third, or fourth year of Jehoiakim, which is what we ſtill adhere to as moſt probable: By the computation here above it muſt appear, that Niniveh had been ſome time deſtroyed in the fourth year of Nebuchadnezzar; though there had been, as there actually was, a king of Aſſyria, when Joſiah was ſlain at Meggido.

(C) Eupolemus (5) tells us, that Nebuchadonoſor king of Babylon, underſtanding, that Jeremiah had propheſied in his favour, entreated Aſtibares, the king of the Medes, to aſſiſt him in this expedition againſt Syria and Paleſtine. That accordingly the army of the Medes and Babylonians united together, and conſiſted of pire, taking Carchemiſh from the Egyptians, and reducing Syria as related; but as for Egypt, he laid no hands on that till many years afterwards; as not only appears by the hiſtory of Egypt itſelf, as delivered by profane authors, but alſo by the plain concurrence of ſcripture.

He takes Carchemiſh, and conquers Syria.

HAVING deſtroyed the city of Niniveh, and poſſeſſed himſelf of Carchemiſh [g], he croſſed over to this ſide of the river Euphrates, and, having conquered Syria and the neighbouring countries, came with a mixed number of nations [h], and having ravaged [i] Samaria, Galilee, Scythopolis, and the Jews in Galaaditis, he at length laid ſiege to Jeruſalem [k], and took it on the 9th of the month Ciſleu, or November, a day the Jews commemorate even in our times [l]. He now took Jehoiakim priſoner, and bound him in chains with deſign to carry him to Babylon; but he changed his mind upon the humble deportment of the captive king, who ſwearing to be true to him as his vaſſal and tributary, he reſtored him to his liberty; though he did not abſtain from the plunder of Jeruſalem, whence he tranſported the veſſels in the temple to that of Belus in Babylon [m], and took with him ſome of the choiceſt and moſt promiſing youths, whom he committed to the care of Aſhpenaz, the prince of his eunuchs, with a charge to ſee them inſtructed in the learning [n] and language of the Chaldees, and to educate them in ſuch manner, that they might be fit to attend him as his royal domeſtics. Of theſe, particular notice is taken of Daniel and his three friends, Hananiah, Miſhael, and Azariah [o].

of ten thouſand chariots, one hundred and eighty thouſand foot, and one hundred and twenty thouſand horſe. By this author then it appears, they had made an end of the Aſſyrian monarchy, before they attempted any thing upon Syria, which though it is certain, without any ſuch evidence, we may yet quote it, to confirm what we have endeavoured to clear up in the note above.

(D) Thus it was, and moſt natural it muſt appear: he had ſettled himſelf in the eaſt, and his buſineſs now was to ſtrip Pharaoh Necho of his new empire over Syria, which had formerly belonged adorn and inlarge the ſeat of his growing empire, in proportion to the ſovereignty it was to poſſeſs over the nations far and near [p]; and being thus employed at home, it happened, that he was, in an extraordinary manner, affected by dreams [q]. Under great anxiety of mind, he called together his magicians, ſorcerers, aſtrologers, and Chaldæans, and not only demanded of them the interpretation of a certain dream which had eſcaped his memory, but alſo what the dream had been. Perceiving it was in vain he conſulted them, his diſappointment wrought upon him to that degree of fury, that he reſolved to put them all to death [r], and gave his orders accordingly to Arioch, the captain of his guard; who, being on the point to do as he was commanded, was accoſted by Daniel, who, expoſtulating with him upon the raſhneſs of the decree againſt the wiſe men, and requeſting him to ſuſpend the execution of it, gave him aſſurance, that he could ſatisfy the king in what he was ſo ſollicitous to know [s].

His dream of the image.

Daniel then went into the preſence of Nebuchadnezzar, and, begging that he would grant him a little time to conſider of the thing, repaired to his three companions above-mentioned, and joining with them in an addreſs to heaven, the ſecret was revealed to him in a night viſion [t]. Thus inſtructed from above, he went to Arioch, the captain of the guard, deſiring, he would not ſo much as think of the orders he had received againſt the wiſe men, but conduct him to the king, whom he was prepared to ſatisfy [u]. When the king ſaw Daniel, or Belteſhazzar, (that was his name in Babylon) he aſked him if he could tell him his dream, and what it portended; to which he anſwered, with a prefatory introduction to inſtil into the haughty prince ſome notions of the might and majeſty of god, ed to the Aſſyrian monarchy. He does ſo, drives the Egyptians from Carchemiſh, whence they pretended to curb the Babylonians even in their own country, recovers all the dominions of Syria and Paleſtine quite to the river of Egypt (7) and the king of that country dares no more ſhew his head in theſe parts; being more ſollicitous to defend himſelf in his own country, which was to have its turn of invaſion, as having been joined to the Aſſyrian empire by Eſar-addon (8), than any thing elſe.

God, that his dream had been as follows [w], That in his ſleep he ſaw an image, vaſt, and reſplendent, and terrible to the ſight; and the head of this image was of fine gold, the breaſt and arms of ſilver, the belly and thighs of braſs, the legs of iron, and the feet of part iron and part clay; that from an inviſible power he ſaw a ſtone, that ſtruck the image on the feet, which were part iron and part clay, and cruſhed them to pieces; that immediately all the metals in the body of the image became as duſt, which was ſwept away by the wind and no more ſeen; while the ſtone, which had cauſed this deſtruction, remained behind, grew into a mountain, and filled the whole earth [x]. That as for the interpretation of this extraordinary dream, He himſelf, as king of kings, was ſignified by the golden head of the image; that a ſecond kingdom, inferior to his, ſhould ariſe, which was denoted by the breaſt and arms of ſilver; and that from thence a third kingdom of braſs ſhould ariſe, and lord it over the whole earth; that a fourth kingdom ſhould ariſe, and be as ſtrong as iron, and deſtroy all that had gone before; but that, the feet and toes being part iron and part clay, this fourth kingdom ſhould be nevertheleſs partly ſtrong and partly feeble: That after theſe, God would ſet up a kingdom which ſhould endure for ever, and that this was ſignified by the ſtone hewn or thrown without hands, and which had ſhattered the gold, the ſilver, the braſs, the iron, and the clay of the image into duſt, which had been ſcattered abroad by the wind [y] (E).

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, amazed at what he heard, fell on his face and worshipped Daniel, commanding, that they should strait offer him an oblation and sweet odours, acknowledging his God to be a God of gods, and a Lord of kings [z]. He then promoted him to a great height of dignity, made him great presents, invested him with the government of all the province of Babylon, and made him chief of the presidents of all the wise men. But Daniel requested, that his three friends, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego (so they were called in Babylon) might have charge of the affairs of the province of Babylon, and the thing was so; while Daniel was appointed to sit in the gate of the king, as next immediately to himself [a].

WHILE he was thus at Babylon, news came to him, that Jehoiakim had rebelled against him, and refused to pay him any more tribute; but, not having a proper opportunity to chastise this distant king in person, he ordered the Chaldees, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites to make incursions into the territories of Judah [b]; and in this manner did they continue to perplex him for the space of three years; till, at length uniting, they besieged Jerusalem, and laying hands on Jehoiakim, they slew him, and threw his body into the highway [c]; a warfare related a different way by Josephus [d], according to whom Nebuchadnezzar must

He now reſolved to exert the utmoſt of his rigor, and to give a glut to his avarice; and, in conſequence thereof, he emptied the ſacred and the royal treaſuries, and cutting to pieces the golden veſſels of the temple, he carried all off, together with the inhabitants that were conſiderable either for valour or ingenuity; draining the land to that degree, as to leave none but the poorer ſort juſt to cultivate the land; and appointing Mattaniah, whoſe name he changed into Zedekiah, king over the deſolate kingdom of Judah [g]. Thus did he march back in triumph to Babylon, laden with the ſpoils of the Jews, and followed by numbers of the captive people, who, by their valour and ſkill, might have

(F) If it be wondered, how it came to paſs, that Nebuchadnezzar neglected, for at leaſt three years, to appear in this war perſonally; it is anſwered (9), That it is uncertain what detained him ſo long, though it is very probable, he was buſied in the conduct of his vaſt deſigns at Babylon; that, however, he may have been engaged, as a mediator between the Medes and the Lydians, who, after a war of ſeveral years, being on the point of fighting a deciſive battle, were interrupted by a total eclipſe of the ſun (10), which, as they interpreted it, prevailed on them to ſubmit to the arbitration of two neighbouring princes, they ſhould agree to chuſe for each other. It is now ſuppoſed, that Nebuchadnezzar was choſen by the Mede, and that he was employed in that affair, while the nations mentioned made war upon Judah; but Herodotus expreſly ſaying it was Labynetus (11) who was this mediator, we ſhall defer what may be ſuggeſted thereon to the time of his reign.

have been, and no question were, of great use to him in the stupendous works he had begun or projected at Babylon, and highly serviceable to him in the prosecution of his conquests. And thus ended his second war with the Jews.

No sooner was this over, than Jeremiah [h] began to prophecy the increase of this prince's dominion, and particularly, that he should subdue Elam, a kingdom on the river Ulai, to the eastward of the Tigris (G). This country must have been the Susiana of the Greeks, and lay so opportunely for him, being, as it were, a borderer on him, that he can have been no very great while in the completion of this advantageous prophecy. And accordingly we find, that, in after times, the capital of this country, Shushan, was sometimes honoured with the presence of the Babylonian monarchs.

This mighty prince, the darling of heaven, or the instrument rather of God's wrath to punish the wickedness of the nations round about him, had always his victories and accessions of fortune preceded by prophecies from the mouth of Jeremiah, or some other prophet; nay, plots and seditions contriving against him were blasted, while yet in embryo, by typical remonstrances from men divinely inspired. So, when the kings of the Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, and Zidonians would have tempted Zedekiah, the thoughtless king of Jerusalem, to rise against the Babylonian; Jeremiah [i] sent to each of the embassadors in his court a present of yokes and bonds, to be carried to their masters, with this declaration, That the Lord of hosts, the God of the whole earth, had doomed them all to be servants to Nebuchadnezzar; that they should all serve

(G) By the words of the prophecy Elam must have been a great and potent kingdom; Behold I will break the bow of Elam, the chief of their might. And upon Elam will I bring the four winds from the four quarters of heaven, and will scatter them towards all those winds, and there shall be no nation whither the out-casts of Elam shall not come. For I will cause Elam to be dismayed before their enemies, and before them that seek their life; and I will bring evil upon them, even my fierce anger saith the Lord, and I will send the sword after them till I have consumed them. And I will set my throne in Elam, and I will destroy from thence the king and the princes, saith the Lord (12).

ſerve him, his ſon, and his ſon's ſon; that ſuch as ſhould but offer to reject his yoke, he would puniſh with the ſword, and with famine, and with peſtilence, till they were utterly conſumed by him; but that thoſe who quietly ſubmitted their necks, and faithfully obeyed the king of Babylon, ſhould find mercy, and remain in poſſeſſion of their country [k]; ſuch was abſolutely to be their fate if they reſiſted, and ſuch their reward if they behaved ſubmiſſively under their bondage.

A more ſublime elevation no man can be ſhewn in than this, which exalts him to the height of being, as it were, God's immediate vicegerent here on earth. But how great and terrible ſoever he was repreſented, he was dreaded but for a time, by the weſtern nations eſpecially; who, notwithſtanding the ſevere remonſtrance and declaration of Jeremiah, were contriving how they ſhould free themſelves from the king of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar, underſtanding that the Egyptians, the Jews, and the other nations, were contriving to withdraw themſelves from his obedience; and that Zedekiah, whom he had appointed king of Jeruſalem, had been encouraged by Pharaoh Hophra, or Apries, king of Egypt, to ſet him at defiance, reſolved particularly to puniſh ſuch ingratitude and infidelity [l] in the moſt extraordinary manner; and putting himſelf at the head of his army, he advanced to the frontiers, at the ſame time to chaſtiſe all theſe preſumptuous nations; where being arrived, and conſidering with himſelf, that he had a number of them to deal with, he remained in ſuſpence for a while, dubious where he ſhould firſt open the war; till at laſt he referred this important buſineſs to the ordinary methods of divinatory direction in practice with the Chaldees, who, conſulting entrails, their images, or teraphim, and their arrows (H), delivered it as their own opinion, whereupon he broke up from before the city, and marched to give the Egyptian battle [p], and attack him before he could be poſſibly joined by any of the diſcontented nations mentioned above; but before he left Jeruſalem, he took care to ſend all the captive Jews in his camp, amounting to 832 perſons, under a good guard to Babylon [q]. He then moved againſt the Egyptians, who, not daring to abide the onſet, as ſhould ſeem by the prophet [r], retreated in proportion as Nebuchadnezzar advanced; though others [s] tell us, they ventured on a battle, which ended in their overthrow.

HAVING thus driven the Egyptians back again into their own country, he had leiſure once more to proſecute the vengeance he had reſolved to take on the king at Jeruſalem, which city he beſieged once more, raiſing works about the place from whence he ſo annoyed the inhabitants, that they did not ſo much as dare to ſhew their heads on the walls [t]. And yet this ſiege continued ſo long, and was in a way of continuing ſo much longer, that Nebuchadnezzar ſeems to have loſt all patience, and to have retired to recreate himſelf at Riblah [u]; if it was not buſineſs rather than pleaſure that drew him thither. While he was at Riblah, his generals, Nebuzaradan, Nebuſhaſban, Rabſaris, Nergal-ſharezer, and Rabmag, (I), ſtuck cloſe by Jeruſalem; and at length perceiving the inhabitants to be quite exhauſted of their ſtrength and courage, they aſſaulted the city in the middle of the night [w], and took it after a twelvemonth's ſiege. At firſt they miſſed Zedekiah and his family, but they took him the next morning, as he was attempting to eſcape. Nebuchadnezzar no ſooner ſaw Zedekiah brought before him at Riblah, than, ſeverely upbraiding him for his perfidy and ingratitude, he cauſed his children and all his friends that had been taken with him, to be put to death before his face, and then, depriving him of his eye-ſight, ordered him to be bound with chains of braſs, and in that deplorable condition to be carried away captive to Babylon [x].

(15) Antiq. Jud. l. 10. c. 11.

He then diſpatched Nebuzaradan, the captain of his guard, with orders quite to diſmantle the city of Jeruſalem, to burn the temple there, and the royal palace, and in ſhort the whole place. This was executed with the utmoſt rigor, and to complete the tragedy, every ſoul in the land was led away into captivity, except ſome few of the moſt miſerable of the people, who were left to take care of the ſoil and the fruits as yet ungathered. Thus did the Chaldæans, under Nebuchadnezzar, deal with the Jews; they ſtripped the temple of all its furniture, and deſtroyed the brazen ſea, and the two brazen pillars [y].

Among the priſoners, Nebuzaradan brought with him to Riblah, were Seraiah the high-prieſt, Nephaniah the ſecond prieſt, the three governors of the temple, Zedekiah's chief general, and five of his favourites or counſellors, together with his muſter-maſter, who was alſo his ſecretary; Nebuchadnezzar ordered all theſe to be beheaded. In the midſt of his fury, however, he concluded it was adviſeable not to leave the land without ſomebody to look to the miſerable remnant that was in it, and to this office he appointed one Gedaliah [z]: Nor did he fail to extend his mercy and favour towards the prophet Jeremiah, giving Nebuzaradan a favourable charge with regard to that holy perſon, to leave him to his choice of remaining behind in his own country, under his particular protection, or of going forward with him to Babylon, there to enjoy himſelf in peace and plenty in his palace. And now Nebuchadnezzar returned once more in triumph to the city of his reſidence, adding great ſtrength and glory to it, by an immenſe booty he brought with him, and a numerous acceſſion of new inhabitants.

With the gold he amaſſed in this expedition, it is thought, he erected [a] the monſtrous coloſſus of that metal in honour of his god Bel, in the plain of Dura in the province of Babylon. It was ſixty cubits in height, and ſix cubits in breadth, and all of gold; and having ſummoned together all his princes, governors, captains, judges, treaſurers, counſellors, and all the rulers of provinces, to the dedication of this idol, proclamation was made, That all people, nations, and languages, ſhould no ſooner hear the ſound of various muſical inſtruments, than they ſhould fall down and worſhip the golden image Nebuchadnezzar the king had ſet up; under the fearful fearful penalty of being thrown into the midſt of a burning fiery furnace [b]. They failed not to obey at the ſignal given, all but the Jews, and particularly Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego (K), who being brought before the king, and accuſed of the neglect and contempt, and perſiſting in a refuſal to do as was commanded, he became quite furious againſt them, and ordered, that the furnace ſhould be heated ſeven times more than ever it had been, and that they ſhould be thrown into it [c]. They were then bound with all their apparel about them, and thrown in, but the heat or the fire of the furnace was ſo violent, that it killed the men who had charge of the execution [d]. This was no ſooner over, than Nebuchadnezzar became all aſtoniſhed, and haſtily inquiring, if they had not thrown three men bound into the furnace, and being anſwered accordingly, he cried out, I ſee four men looſe walking in the midſt of the fire, and they have no hurt, and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God [e]. He then drew near to the mouth of the furnace, and conjured the three men, as ſervants of the moſt high God, to come out to him. They did ſo, and all were aſtoniſhed at what they ſaw, when they perceived, they had not received the leaſt hurt or alteration, even in their garments [f]. Nebuchadnezzar bleſſed the God of Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego, and decreed, that whoſoever of any people, nation, or language, ſhould preſume to ſpeak any thing amiſs of the God of Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego, the criminal ſhould be cut in pieces, and his houſe turned into a dunghil [g].

(K) It may be thought ſtrange, that Daniel was not accuſed as well as his friends, it being impoſſible to ſuppoſe, he fell down and worſhipped the image. To this it is anſwered (16), that he muſt have been either abſent, or, if preſent, muſt have been too great a man to be accuſed: It is obſerved (17) to be moſt probable, that he was preſent, it being impoſſible well to conceive, how ſo important an officer could have been abſent upon ſo general a ſummons, and upon ſo ſolemn an occaſion; but that his enemies might think it dangerous to begin with him, and choſe to pave the way to his deſtruction by that of his three friends, who being miraculouſly delivered, Daniel eſcaped all danger of courſe.

Thus ſaith the Lord* God, I will therefore ſpread out my net over thee, with a company of many people, and they ſhall bring thee up in my net . . . . For thus ſaith the Lord God, The ſword of the King of Babylon ſhall come upon thee . . . . There be the princes of the north all of them, and all of the Zidonians, which are gone down with the ſlain, with their terror they are all aſhamed of their might, and they lie uncircumciſed with them that be ſlain by the ſword . . . . Pharaoh ſhall ſee them (that is, Pharaoh ſhall ſee the Zidonians, or Tyrians deſtroyed before him; for Nebuchadnezzar ſubdued Phœnicia before he invaded Egypt), and ſhall be comforted over all his multitude, even Pharaoh and all his army ſlain by the ſword, ſaith the LORD GOD. That this prophecy immediately relates to Nebuchadnezzar, appears by the recapitulation, made in this ſame chapter, of the conqueſts of this monarch, as Aſhur, or Aſſyria, Elam, &c. Jeruſalem may not have been mentioned, as not being yet deſtroyed. The ſame prophet dilates much upon this fearful deſtruction and captivation of Egypt in other places (19). Jeremiah is quite explicit upon this occaſion, and mentions (20) this king by name, Thus ſaith the Lord of hoſts, the God of Iſrael, Behold, I will ſend and take Nebuchadnezzar my ſervant . . . . And when he cometh, he ſhall ſmite the land of Egypt, and deliver ſuch as are for death, to death; and ſuch as are for captivity, to captivity; and ſuch as are for the ſword, to the ſword. And I will kindle a fire in the houſes of the gods of Egypt, and he ſhall burn them, and carry them away captives, and he ſhall array himſelf with the land of Egypt, as a ſhepherd putteth on his garment, and he ſhall go forth from thence in peace. He ſhall alſo break the images of Bethſhemeſh, that is in the land of Egypt, and the houſes of the gods of the Egyptians ſhall he burn with fire. Much more to the ſame purpoſe is to be found in this ſame prophet (21).

not to do [i]. However, during this siege, he from time to time, by detached parties, seems completely to have subjugated all the countries about; and this he certainly did, in pursuance of the several prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Thus, during this siege, he sent Nabuzaradan with a party into Judæa, to take vengeance on them for the murder of their late governor Gedaliah: In consequence of which he brought off with him all the inhabitants he could meet with, and which amounted to no more than 745 persons, and thereby completed the desolation of the land.

WHAT Nebuchadnezzar may probably have done at Tyre, before he departed thence, we have declared already [k]. But to make amends for this disappointment, it was promised by the prophet, that Egypt should pay him for what he had suffered before Tyre [l]. Egypt was at this time as weak as Tyre was apparently strong; for the country was at this time in great distraction, caused by a civil war then raging between Apries and Amasis [m]. But concerning this his expedition against Egypt we have no manner of account, except what we find relating thereto in the prophecies of Ezekiel and Jeremiah; whereby we understand, that Egypt suffered as much by him as any nation had till then done (N). And now it must have been also, that

(N) This, besides what we have cited from the prophets to prove it, is directly said by Jeremiah (24), addressing himself to such of the remnants of the captivity as thought to have found a sure place of refuge in Egypt; Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, If you wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt, and go to sojourn there, then it shall come to pass, that the sword, which ye feared, shall overtake you there in the land of Egypt, and the famine, whereof ye were afraid, shall follow close after you, there in Egypt, and there ye shall die. So shall it be with all the men that set their faces to go into Egypt, to sojourn there, they shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: and none of them shall remain, or escape from the evil that I will bring upon them. For thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, As mine anger and my fury hath been poured forth upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, so shall my fury be poured forth upon you, when ye shall enter into Egypt: and ye shall be an execration, and an astonishment, and a curse, and a reproach, and ye shall see this place no more (25).

that he conquered the Lybians, and Ethiopians, and other adjacent nations, according to the prophecies concerning him (O). As for Egypt, it is quite uncertain in what ſtate, or upon what conditions, he left that country, or whether or no he did not appoint Amaſis, ſo famed among the Egyptians, his lieutenant or viceroy there [n]. The glory and proſperity of the reign of this Egyptian king, as repreſented by the Egyptians themſelves [o], need not prevent us from concluding, he was no better than a ſubſtitute and tributary to the king of Babylon, and the rather, as the prophet foretels of them, that they ſhould be confounded and deſolate for 40 years afterwards [p], which is a ſpace of time nearly equal to the reign of Amaſis [q]; and his defection in the end may have been as good a reaſon as any formerly given for the rage, as it is repreſented, of Cambyſes againſt him [r], when the Perſians had deſtroyed the empire of Babylon.

exceeded even Hercules himself *. Thus far we have seen him a warrior beyond all that had gone before him; we have now done with his martial deeds, and must retire with him to Babylon, and take a view of what he did there, and seeing the magnificence of that city is wholly attributed to him, we cannot do it better, than by a description thereof, which we have particularly reserved for this place; for it was this prince that enlarged and adorned it, and enriched the temples of it with the spoils he had taken, and, in fine, did most of what is attributed to Semiramis, except the immediate foundation; and, indeed, as it is evidently under him, and almost under him only, as monarch of Babylon, that the country flourished, and lorded it over the nations, and divided the empire with the Medes, who upon his death seem to have been upon no very good terms with the Babylonians; so nothing is more natural than to conclude, that the city attained its splendor under him, and that what was done to it after him, was rather to preserve it from assaults of the enemy, than to set it off as the queen of the east.

Babylon described.

TOWARDS the description of Babylon, and what Nebuchadnezzar did there, we have little or nothing to add to what has already been said for us; and therefore we shall have no more to do than to transcribe it, and particularly in the method of a late learned author [s].

Semiramis, as we have seen, by some [t], and Belus [u] by others, is said to have founded this city; but, whether it was originally founded by Belus or Pul, or his son Nabonassar, the first Babylonian king in Ptolemy's canon, it was Nebuchadnezzar that made it one of the wonders of the world. The most famous works in and about it were the walls of the city itself; the temple of Belus; Nebuchadnezzar's palace, and the hanging gardens belonging to it; the banks of the river; and the artificial lake and canals made for the draining of the river; works, which, for magnificence and expence, were exceeded by no one attempt of human labour, excepting the wall of China.

The walls.

The walls that surrounded the city were every way prodigious; for they were in thickness 87 foot, in height 350 foot, and in compass 480 furlongs, or 60 of our miles [w]. These

Theſe are the meaſures according to Herodotus, who was himſelf at Babylon; and though there are thoſe who differ from him in theſe dimenſions, yet moſt, who agree in any meaſures of theſe walls, gives us [x] the ſame, or nearly the ſame he does (P). Theſe walls formed an exact ſquare [y], each ſide of which was 120 ſtades, or 15 miles, in length, and were all built of large bricks, cemented together with bitumen [z], a particular product of the neighbourhood of this city [a], and much more durable and ſtrong than lime. On the outſide of theſe walls was a large ditch full of water, and the earth dug out of it ſerved to make the bricks which built the walls [b], ſo that from the great dimenſions of the walls, thoſe of this ditch or moat may be readily conceived. In each ſide of this ſquare were 25 gates, 100 in all, and all of ſolid braſs: Between every two of theſe gates were three towers, and four more at the four corners of this great ſquare, and three between thoſe corners and the gates next on each ſide, and each of theſe towers was ten foot higher than the walls. But this is to be underſtood only of thoſe parts of the walls where towers were needful for defence [c]. For ſome parts of them being upon a moraſs, and inacceſſible by an enemy, there the labour and coſt was ſpared, which, though it muſt have ſpoiled the ſymmetry of the whole, muſt be allowed lowed to have ſavoured of good œconomy; though that is what one would not have expected from a prince who had been ſo determined, as Nebuchadnezzar muſt have been, to make the city complete both for ſtrength and beauty; and hence it ſhould ſeem, that we ſee a woman in after-ages completing the walls of Babylon; which may have been no more than ſupplying the deficiency of towers in the parts ſo deſtitute of them, which may be better conſidered, when we come to ſpeak of her in particular. The whole number then of theſe towers amounted to no more than 250, whereas a much greater number would have been neceſſary to have made the uniformity complete all round. From the 25 gates in each ſide of this ſquare there was a ſtrait ſtreet, extending to the correſponding gate in the oppoſite wall, whence the whole number of the ſtreets muſt have been but 50; but then they were each about 15 miles long, 25 of them croſſing the other 25 exactly at right angles [d]. Beſides theſe whole ſtreets, we muſt reckon four half ſtreets, which were but rows of houſes facing the four inner ſides of the walls. Theſe four half ſtreets were properly the four ſides of the city within the walls, and were each of them 200 foot broad [e], the whole ſtreets being about 150 of the ſame. By this interſection of the 50 ſtreets, the city was divided into 676 ſquares, each of four furlongs and an half on each ſide, or two miles and a quarter in compaſs. Round theſe ſquares on every ſide towards the ſtreets ſtood the houſes, all of three or four ſtories in height and beautified [f] with all manner of ornaments; and the ſpace within each of theſe ſquares was all void, and taken up by yards, and gardens, and the like, either for pleaſure or convenience.

(P) Diodorus Siculus, as we have ſeen before (27), diminiſhes the circumference of theſe walls very conſiderably, and takes ſomewhat from the height of them, as in Herodotus, though he ſeems to add to the breadth of them, by ſaying, That ſix chariots might drive abreaſt thereon; while the former writes, That one chariot only might turn upon them; but then he places buildings on each ſide of the top of theſe walls, which according to him, were but one ſtory high (28); which may pretty well reconcile them together in this reſpect. It is obſerved (29). that thoſe, who give the height of theſe walls but at 50 cubits, ſpeak of them only as they were after the time of Darius Hyſtaſpis, who had cauſed them to be beaten down to that level. To dwell particularly on the varieties in authors that have ſpoken of this city, would be both endleſs and fruitleſs.

A branch of the Euphrates divided the city into two, running through the midſt of it, from north to ſouth (Q), over which, in the very middle of the city, was a bridge, a furlong in length [g], or rather more, and indeed much more if we hearken to others, who ſay, it was no leſs than five five ſtades or furlongs in length, though but 30 foot broad[h], a difference we ſhall never be able to decide (R); this bridge, however, is ſaid to have been built with wonderful art[i], to ſupply a defect in the bottom of the river, which was all ſandy. At each end of this bridge were two palaces[k]; the old palace on the eaſt ſide, the new one on the weſt ſide of the river; the former of which took up[l] four of the ſquares above-mentioned, and the latter[m] nine of them. The temple of Belus, which ſtood next to the old palace, took up another of the ſame ſquares.

THE whole city ſtood in a large flat or plain, in a very fat and deep ſoil[n]; that part or half of it on the eaſt ſide of the river was the old city[o], and the other on the weſt was added by Nebuchadnezzar[p], both being included within the vaſt ſquare bounded by the walls aforeſaid. The form of the whole was ſeemingly borrowed from Niniveh, which was alſo 480 furlongs; but though it was equal in dimenſions to this city, it was leſs with reſpect to its form, which was a parallelogram[q], whereas that of Babylon was an exact ſquare: It is ſuppoſed, that Nebuchadnezzar, who had deſtroyed that old ſeat of the Aſſyrian empire, propoſed, that this new one ſhould rather exceed it than not[r], and that it was to fill this great intended city with inhabitants,

(R) By the former of the dimenſions of this bridge, it is plain, the city was not immediately upon the great river of Euphrates, but rather upon ſome artificial canal, or inferior branch of the main ſtream. By the latter indeed it may ſeem, that it ſtood upon the main ſtream itſelf; however, as they both agree ſo well in the breadth of the bridge, we may be inclined to think the former was the trueſt length thereof, the latter being quite diſproportionate thereto; and hence we may be brought to conclude, that the city of Babylon was not immediately upon the great river Euphrates. Other arguments, this way tending, may be alledged; but, as it is a point of ſuch obſcurity, we wave them.

habitants, that he tranſported ſuch numbers of the captives from countries hither [s]; though that is what may be diſputed, ſeeing he therein only followed the conſtant practice of the kings of Aſſyria, who muſt have recurred thereto, as the moſt certain means of aſſuring their conqueſts either to themſelves or their poſterity.

THUS far, however, appears; this city was never near inhabited, and, with reſpect to the very meridian of its glory, may be compared with the flower of the field, which flouriſhes to-day, and to morrow is no more; for, as we ſhall ſee in the courſe of this work, it never had the time to grow up to what Nebuchadnezzar viſibly intended to have made it; for Cyrus removing the ſeat of the empire ſoon after to Shuſhan, Babylon fell to decay, and never flouriſhed to the degree of any thing like what Nebuchadnezzar had certainly propoſed to himſelf. Thus far is allowed, no country could have been better able to ſupport ſo vaſt and populous a city as this was intended to have been, had it been the will of fate that it ſhould have been completed up to the firſt deſign (S). But neither did Ne-

(S) This it is thought never to have been; for "when Alexander (31) came to Babylon, Curtius tells us, no more than "90 furlongs of it was then built, which can no otherwiſe be "underſtood than of ſo much in length, and if we allow the "breadth to be as much as the length, (which is the utmoſt that "can be allowed) it will follow, that no more than 8100 ſquare "furlongs were then built upon, but the whole ſpace within the "walls contained 14400 ſquare furlongs, and therefore there "muſt have been 6300 ſquare furlongs that were unbuilt, which, "Curtius tells us, were plowed and ſown. And beſides this, the "houſes were not contiguous, but all built with a void ſpace, on "each ſide, between houſe and houſe. And the ſame hiſtorian "tells us this was done, becauſe this way of building ſeemed to "them ſafeſt. " better preſerving of health ; for hereby, in cities ſituated in ſuch " hot countries, thoſe ſuffocations and other inconveniences are " avoided, which muſt neceſſarily attend ſuch as there dwell in " houſes cloſely built together. For which reaſon Delhi, the " capital of India, and ſeveral other cities in thoſe warmer parts " of the world, are thus built ; the uſage in thoſe places being, " that ſuch a ſtated ſpace of ground be left void between every " houſe and houſe that is built in them ; and old Rome was built " after the ſame manner. So that, putting all this together, it " will appear, that Babylon was ſo large a city in ſcheme ra- " ther than reality : for, according to this account, it muſt be by " much the larger part that was never built, and therefore, in " this reſpect, it muſt give place to Niniveh, which was as ma- " ny furlongs in circuit as the other, and without any void " ground in it that we are told of. And the number of its in- " fants, at the ſame time, which could not diſcern between their " right hand and their left, which the ſcripture tells us, were " 120,000 in the time of Jonah, doth ſufficiently prove it was " fully inhabited."

Upon this we have to remark, that nothing can be concluded from what is cited by Curtius, at a time when the city muſt have ſuffered a very great decay, and when the houſes and private buildings in particular muſt have been deſerted and gone to ruin, and leveled with the ground, the ground that became void, a- mounting to a conſiderable ſpace, may have been converted to the uſe of tillage and paſture. For when Alexander came to Babylon, it muſt have been little better than the ſkeleton of the old city ; ſo that let what Curtius reports concerning it be ever ſo true, it proves no more, than that ſuch was the ſtate of Babylon when Alexander came there, not what it had been, and doubtleſs was, when the ſeat of the Babylonian, or latter Aſſyrian, empire. Again, as to what is alledged in the citation above, to confirm what is aſſerted by Curtius, as to the diſtance left between houſe and houſe, and the example produced in Delhi, and other cities in hot countries, which are built in that ſtraggling manner, it may be needleſs to animadvert thereon, when at the ſame time it is granted, that in the length or breadth of 15 miles there was no more than 25 ſtreets, or 26, including the two half ſtreets, or rows, at the ends and at the ſides. A city built in this propor- tion muſt have been full airy enough, and by the proportions it muſt appear, that there were ſuch void ſpaces behind all the houſes, as muſt have anſwered all the purpoſes of preventing ſuf- focations, and other inconveniencies the inhabitants may have been in in danger of. And besides, if Delhi and other cities in the east are built in the extensive and incoherent manner above suggested; other cities there are, in climates to the full as warm, and under much better regulation, which are not only built without this discontinuity, but as close as possible, and with streets so narrow, that there would not be much more than room for one of our coaches to pass through them; as Canton in China (32), and other cities in the same country, and others.

Lastly, it is almost certain, that Niniveh was never so big as Babylon, notwithstanding what is inferred from the 120,000 souls there, who could not distinguish their right hand from their left; which, as we have suggested formerly (33), may be as justly understood of a religious blindness, as a natural incapacity; and is a figurative expression, which may be very aptly used on the occasion, when Jonah was to open their eyes, that they might see the dangers their sins were like to bring upon them. Niniveh was in the time of Jonah in its infancy (34); there was as yet no king of Assyria, distinguished as such (35), and therefore to suppose that city, in the days of Jonah, to have been more considerable than Babylon was, at the height of her meridian, is a little out of the way. Nor will it be much more just to imagine it to have exceeded this city, even when it was at the greatest; for it is plain, by the history of all the Assyrian kings at Niniveh, that they never established a settled dominion over the parts of their empire, as it is called, but were for ever diverted by foreign wars; so that they lived rather upon the spoil, from time to time, as they made their incursions upon this kingdom or that, than upon any regular or continued revenue or tribute from the several people they over-ran, who never rested quietly, for any space of time, under their yoke. Esar-hadon was the most powerful of them all, and extended his dominion even over Egypt, which none of his predecessors ever did, and was in a fair way of effecting the monarchy his fore-fathers had in vain aspired at; but he dying soon after he had thus established himself, and being, as it seems, succeeded by a prince of no active genius, the empire mouldered away by degrees till it became no more. Nebuchadnezzar, of all the Assyrian race, seems to have raised the family to the utmost it ever was. His great successes, and the length of his reign, in comparison of what was enjoyed by any As-

as to its form and dimensions, we have sufficiently described already [u], where we have also declared our thoughts concerning the first foundation and completion of it [w]; but some particulars we must, however, add, to give a more distinct idea of what it was. The ascent to it was by steps on the outside, by the slope lines which formed the eight retractions or benchings in, which shaped it, as it were, into eight distinct towers, as may be observed in the representation we have copied of it. What the uppermost of these towers was set apart for, we have seen already; but on the top of this there was, it seems, an observatory [x], by the means of which the Babylonians are pretended to have advanced themselves to their great pretended knowledge in the sidereal sciences. Till the times of Nebuchadnezzar, it is thought this tower was all the temple of Belus, but as he did by the other antient buildings of the city [y], so he did by this [z], making great additions thereto, by vast edifices erected round it [a], in a square of two furlongs on every side, and just a mile in circumference, which exceeded the square at the temple of Jerusalem by 1800 foot [b]. On the outside of these buildings was a wall, which inclosed the whole, and, in consideration of the regularity wherewith this city was to all appearance marked out, it is supposed [c], that this wall was equal to the square of the city wherein it stood, and is so concluded to have been two miles and an half in circumference. In this wall were several gates leading into the temple, and all of solid brass [d], which, it is thought [e], may have been made out of the brazen sea, and brazen pillars, and other vessels and ornaments of the kind which Nebuchadnezzar had transf-

Assyrian king before him, may abundantly convince us, that he raised Babylon to a pitch of magnificence and grandeur, which had never been seen at Niniveh; and if thereto we add his passion to aggrandise and imbellish this city, which plainly eclipsed her sister in Assyria, we cannot so much as doubt of it; though, after all, we are very ready to think, Babylon never was so very enormous as represented.

transported from Jerusalem; for in this temple he is said to have dedicated his spoils brought from that of Jerusalem [f].

In this temple were several images or idols of massy gold, and one of them, as we have seen [g], 40 foot in height, the same, as supposed [h], with that which Nebuchadnezzar consecrated in the plains of Dura [i]. This last is said to have been 60 cubits, or 90 foot high, which, though it vastly exceeds the dimensions of the former of 40, yet this last is thought to have been so extraordinary for size, that it has been attempted to reconcile them into one [k], by supposing, that in the 90 foot the height of the pedestal is concluded, and that the 40 foot are for the height of the statue without the pedestal (T); and being said to have weighed 1000 talents of Babylon [l], it is thence

(T) With the pedestal or without, this golden colossus must be allowed to be a wonder, and especially if it was all of gold. We will forbear to talk of the proportions of this statue, as a late learned author (36) has done; they may have been just, for ought we know, though that is what we are apt to suspect; as well as that Diodorus, by the statue he mentions (37), means that which Nebuchadnezzar raised in the plain of Dura. It shall suffice, that we take notice, that the same late learned author (38) imagines this statue, vast as it was, weighed but 1000 talents of Babylon, and consequently, that, according to the value of the Babylonish talent in Pollux's Onomasticon, it amounted to three millions and a half of our money. The golden statue in Diodorus is placed in the temple of Belus (39), where Herodotus has also seemingly two golden statues of solid gold, the one, which he represents as large, of Jupiter or Belus (40), in a sitting posture, on a throne of gold, and with a table of the same metal before it, the whole together weighing 800 talents of Babylon; and another of 12 cubits high, all of solid gold, which if it weighed so much as 800 talents, must have been much larger than the former; which, with its throne and all its furniture, weighed no thence computed, that it is worth three millions and an half of our money [m]. In a word, the whole weight of the ſtatues and decorations in Diodorus Siculus amounting to 5000 and odd talents in gold, the whole is eſtimated at above [n] one and twenty millions of our money; and a ſum about equal to the ſame in treaſure, utenſils, and ornaments, not mentioned [o], is allowed for; which we leave to the reader, with this one obſervation, that our author ſuppoſes this immenſe treaſure to have been about 2000 years in collecting, and that, as he is moſt apparently miſtaken in that, he may as likely be out in his computation, which, if it was curtailed conſiderably, might have been, together with other plunder of the ſort, a ſufficient indemnity to Xerxes for his Grecian expedition.

no more; and that to Herodotus (41) ſeems ſo much, that he cautiouſly reports it on the credit of the Chaldæans themſelves. Whatever was the difference in weight between theſe two ſtatues, it may thence appear, that Diodorus, in allowing but 1000 talents for his ſtatue of forty foot high, is egregiouſly miſtaken, and conſequently, that our author (42) was a little inattentive to this ſeeming abſurdity, except he concluded his ſtatue to have been hollow, or plated over with a thick ſheet of gold; that indeed might alter the caſe, and he would have done well to have made this diſtinction; but he plainly concludes it to have been of maſſy gold (43).

We formerly declared (44), we were not ſure, that Herodotus, by the height he gives of the one and the weight of the other, does not mean the ſame ſtatue; our reaſon for this, among others, is his omitting to name whom the laſt ſtatue repreſented, which being ſo remarkable a piece of furniture in this Babylonian temple, we wonder how ſo exact a writer ſhould have been guilty of the omiſſion; and this inclines us to think they were both Jupiters, and conſequently the ſame god, and perhaps the ſame image. If ſo, he may have thought it needleſs to repeat the name, which would have been quite neceſſary if they had been diſtinct deities; but as we formerly made it a doubt (45), ſo now we are far from pretending to decide the matter.

The two palaces.

NEXT to this temple [p], on the ſame eaſt ſide of the river, ſtood the old palace of the kings of Babylon, being four miles in circumference. Exactly oppoſite to it, on the other ſide of the river [q], was the new palace built by Nebuchadnezzar; it was eight miles in circumference, and conſequently four times as big as the old one. Both theſe palaces we have already deſcribed according to ſuch accounts as we have remaining of them [r], but muſt add, that as vaſt as this palace muſt have been, it was the work of no more than 15 days [f].

The hanging gardens.

BUT nothing in the city of Babylon has obtained a greater degree of admiration, than what we call the penſile or hanging-gardens, built by Nebuchadnezzar, to gratify his wife Amyite [t], who was a Mede [u], and deſirous to have ſomething of a proſpect that might look like her own country, which was as woody and mountainous as Babylonia was otherwiſe. They are ſaid to have contained a ſquare of four plethra [w] on each ſide, and deſcribed to have conſiſted of terraſſes one above another, and carried up to the height of the wall of the city, the aſcent from terraſs to terraſs being by ſteps ten foot wide. The whole pile conſiſted of ſubſtantial arches upon arches, and was ſtrengthened by a wall ſurrounding it on every ſide of 22 foot thick, and the floors on each of them were laid in this order: Firſt, on the tops of the arches was laid a bed or pavement of ſtones, 16 foot long and four foot broad; over this was a layer of bitumen, and over this two courſes of brick, cloſely cemented together with plaſter; and over all theſe were thick ſheets of lead, and on theſe the earth or mould of the garden. This ſtorage was deſigned to retain the moiſture of the mould. which was ſo deep as to give root to the greateſt trees which were planted upon every terraſs, together with great variety of other vegetables pleaſing to the eye. Upon the uppermoſt of theſe terraſſes was a reſervoir, ſupplied by a certain engine with water from the river, from whence the gardens on the other terraſſes were ſupplied.

THE other works attributed to Nebuchadnezzar by Beroſus [x] and Megaſthenes, or Abydenus [y], were the banks of the river, the artificial canals, and the great artificial lake, ſaid to have been ſunk by Semiramis [z]. The chief of theſe canals was the Naharmalcha, or Baſilicos Potamos of the Greeks [a]; the lake was to abate the inundations of the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, juſt as the lake Mœris in Egypt was deſigned to correct the irregularities of the Nile [b]; their uſes were exactly alike, viz. to fecundate the country in times of drought, and to reſcue it from the dangers of inundation [c]. This lake, however, if we are to credit our hiſtorians, was vaſtly more in circumference than that in Egypt, it being on the one hand [d] ſaid to have been 210 miles in circuit, and on the other [e], which is much leſs, 160, either of which gave it a ſquare, for that was the form of it, far exceeding that of the Egyptian lake, which has been thought a work too ſtupendous to have been effected by the labour of men; but indeed what this wanted in length and breadth, it ſeems to have more than made good in depth, which was in ſome places no leſs than 50 fathom [f], whereas the depth of this Babylonian lake is given but at 35 foot [g], or 75 at the utmoſt [h]; a difference which is attempted to be reconciled by a ſuppoſition, that the one meaſures only the ſurface of the ſides, while the other includes the banks thrown up upon them [i].

The banks, artificial canals, and lake.

THIS lake is ſaid to have been dug to receive the river, which was diverted while Nebuchadnezzar built the banks to each ſide of the city of Babylon [k], and to have been to the weſtward of that place. Theſe banks were built for the ſecurity, convenience, and decoration of the city particularly, and were made all of brick and bitumen [l], and extended on each ſide throughout the whole length of the city [m], and even farther according to ſome [n], who reckon they extended 160 furlongs, or 20 miles; whence it is concluded °, they muſt have begun two miles and a half above the city, and have been continued an equal diſtance below it, the length of the city being no more than 15 miles. Theſe banks were built from the bottom, and were rather walls of the ſame thickneſs with thoſe that ſurrounded the city; and oppoſite to each ſtreet on each ſide he had a brazen gate in the ſaid wall [p], with ſtairs leading down from it to the river; theſe gates were open by day, and ſhut by night. Beroſus, Megaſthenes, and Abydenus, attribute all theſe works to Nebuchadnezzar; but Herodotus tells us, the bridge, the banks, and the lake, were the work of a queen after him, called Nitocris, who may have finiſhed what Nebuchadnezzar left imperfect, and thence have had the honour this hiſtorian gives her of the whole [q]. If theſe works fell even much ſhort of what we have here ſeen them to have been, it muſt be granted, we have not ſaid too much of the Babylonians where we have repreſented them to have been ingenious, induſtrious, and laborious [r], and if Nebuchadnezzar did but attempt them, it muſt be allowed, that he deſerves the firſt place among thoſe who have endeavoured to ſignalize themſelves by ſuch ſtupendous monuments of art and labour; but if he did really conduct them towards a ſtate of perfection, nothing can be ſaid too much of him conſidered in this view.

WE have now ſeen this firſt Babylonian monarch, properly ſo called, in all his majeſty, both at home and abroad; what we have remaining to ſay of him will be of a different nature: for we ſhall ſee him under great trouble and anxiety of mind, and even, as the text is commonly underſtood, degraded beneath the meaneſt of the race of mankind, and ſeemingly exhibited as an example of terror to princes, who, ſwoln with vanity, and drunk with power, would arrogate to themſelves what they ought not.

"One came down from heaven. He cried aloud, and ſaid
"thus, Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches, ſhake
"off his leaves, and ſcatter his fruit; let the beaſts get "away from under him, and the fowls from his branches.
"Nevertheleſs leave the ſtump of his roots in the earth,
"even with a band of iron and braſs, in the tender
"graſs of the field, and let it be wet with the dew of "heaven, and let his portion be with the beaſts in the "graſs of the earth. Let his heart be changed from man's,
"and let a beaſt's heart be given unto him, and let ſeven
"times paſs over him. This matter is by the decree of "the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy "ones: to the intent, that the living may know, that "the moſt High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth
"it to whomſoever he will, and ſetteth up over it the
"baſeſt of men [t]."

zar [u], which, how he ſhould have neglected to do at firſt, after the proofs he had had of his ſuperiority and the omnipotence of his God, may be hard to account for, if we do not ſuppoſe him to have laboured under ſome ſort of diſtraction. To wave this, he is repreſented as revealing his dream to Daniel, in words to the effect above; and Daniel no ſooner heard it, than he was aſtoniſhed for one hour, and his thoughts troubled him [w]. At length, after he had recovered vered himſelf, and deprecated the evil omen, and excuſed himſelf to the king, who was very ſollicitous with him to tell him the truth without fear or diſguiſe, he told him, the tree he ſaw was meant of himſelf; that by the order of the watcher and the holy One concerning the tree it was ſignified, that he ſhould be driven out from the ſociety of men, and become as a beaſt, and that, in fine, he ſhould ſo continue to be, till he had been brought to a due ſenſe of the ſupremacy and omnipotence of God; that the ſtump of the tree which was to be left ſignified, that the kingdom ſhould nevertheleſs revert to him once more [x]. Such was Daniel's interpretation, which he cloſed with an exhortation to him to abſtain from ſin, and to ſhew mercy to the poor, that ſo he might procure to himſelf a prolongation of peace and tranquillity [y].

THIS extraordinary ſentence thus pronounced on him, and by the lips of a man whom he muſt entirely have relied on, ſeems to have made no laſting impreſſion upon him; for not being immediately executed upon him, he might have worn off the terrors of it, before the time was quite come. So that about twelve months afterwards, as he was walking in his palace, or, as ſome think [z] the fact may have been, on the uppermoſt of the terraſſes of his hanging-garden, and contemplating the glories of the city he had adorned; unable to contain the pride of his heart, he cried out, "Is "not this great Babylon, that I have built for the houſe of "the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the "honour of my majeſty [a]?" He had no ſooner vented himſelf in this inſolent manner, than there fell a voice from heaven, ſaying, "O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is "ſpoken, The kingdom is departed from thee [b]." And ſtraight he was driven from the ſociety of men, and dwelt with the beaſts of the field, and he ate graſs as an ox, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles feathers, and his nails like birds claws [c]. Thus runs the letter of the text, which is ſometimes taken in all the ſtrictneſs of it; it being ſuppoſed, that loſing his ſenſes, he wandered about in the fields, and there

(U) Concerning the nature and degree of this change, "Origen "(46) believed the thing to be impoſſible, and turned it into alle- "gory. Bodin (47) thought he was really changed into a bull, "and that he loſt even the ſoul of a man; while others (48) "maintain, he was changed as to the body only, retaining his rea- "ſon as Apuleius did while an aſs, and like the Italians, men- "tioned by St. Auſtin (49), who having taſted of cheeſe, pre- "ſented to them by certain magicians of the country, were im- "diately turned into beaſts of burthen, but at laſt recovered their "firſt form and condition of life. Some Rabbins have pretended, "that the ſoul of Nebuchadnezzar deſerted his body, and, "for a time, gave place to the ſoul of an ox, which degraded "him into all the inclinations and ſenſations of that animal; while "others (50) admit no more to have been the caſe than a vitiated "imagination in the prince, and a kind of faſcination in the eyes "of his ſubjects, which made them fancy, as well as himſelf, "that he was for certain become an ox, though there was no "ſuch thing. The moſt received opinion is, that, by the power "of God, Nebuchadnezzar fell into a black melancholy, and, "under this oppreſſion of mind, fancied himſelf an ox; as in a "lycanthropy a man perſuades himſelf he is a wolf, a dog, a cat; "a change which exiſts no where but in the diſtempered brain, "nor to be diſcovered but by his motions and behaviour, which "tend to the imitation of a wolf in his rapacity, howling, and "deſire to range the country, and fly from men. His death. DURING this his disorder, it is said, his son Evil-merodach administered the government for him [e], and that he did it so ill, as to draw his father's most heavy displeasure on him, when he came to understand what he had done; for when his seven years were expired, he threw him into the prison where Jehoiachin, the captive king of Judah, had lain 37 years. Having thus satisfied his injured subjects by this exemplary justice on his son, and given the honour and praise due to God, and acknowledged him to be above all, and all this by a public decree, he continued in the possession of his kingdom about a twelve-month afterwards, and then departed this life, after a reign of 43 years.

THE circumstances of his death are omitted in scripture, but may be fabulously supplied from those [f] who tell us, that, after all the great things they report him to have done, he ascended to the top of his palace, and that, being there suddenly seized by a spirit from heaven, he prophesied to this effect

HE was ſucceeded by his ſon Evil-merodach [h], Ilvoradam [i], Ebidan-merodach [k], Evil-maluruch [l], and, as is moſt likely, Belſhazzar. That he was this ſeemingly laſt king of Babylon, according to Daniel, we ſhall endeavour to make out before we cloſe up his reign. In the mean time, we muſt look back to what he ſeems to have done while regent for his father, when under diſtraction of mind, which, among other falſe ſteps he may have committed, may particularly have drawn on him his father's moſt heavy diſpleaſure, and which, if ſtrictly true, muſt have laid the foundation of that animoſity in the Medes and Perſians, which hurried on the diſſolution of the Babylonian empire. While his father was deprived of his ſenſes, this prince his ſon, who was upon the point of marrying the Nitocris [m] ſo celebrated by Herodotus, took it into his head to divert himſelf with a hunting-match, upon the borders of Media, where he underſtood there was great plenty of game by reaſon of the pacific ſtate the Aſſyrians and Medes had been in for ſome years. He went attended by a ſmall force, light armed, conſiſting both of horſe and foot, and ſeemingly equipt for the chaſe only. Being arrived on the frontiers, he halted near ſome gariſon'd places, where he ſtaid all night, intending to enter upon his diverſion the next morning: But it happening, that certain troops appeared for the the relief of thoſe in gariſon in theſe parts, he took a fancy that theſe men, added to thoſe he had brought with him, might form ſuch a body as might be able to make ſome notable impreſſion upon the Medes, which he judged would redound more to his

" horted by Daniel, he remained ſeven years in the exerciſe of " repentance, abſtaining from ought but herbs and pulſe, to atone " for his pride and folly." But our author (56) concludes, with the bulk of commentators, that we need no interpreter but Daniel himſelf, who plainly means whole years.

his honour, than the diverſion he at firſt propoſed. He obeyed this irregular impulſe, and the next morning, by by break of day he moved towards the neareſt places that belonged to the Medes, leaving his foot behind him to guard his own frontiers, while he proceeded with the horſe. Being advanced as far as he thought convenient, he made halt,-and encamped with the beſt of his troops about him, that ſo he might the better keep the gariſons of the Medes in awe, and prevent their ſallies; the reſt he ſent out in detached parties to pillage the country. The king of the Medes, underſtanding the violences Evil-merodach, the ſon of the Aſſyrian, was committing in his country, marched towards him with ſuch troops as he had uſually attending him, and ſuch as his ſon could raiſe upon ſo ſudden an emergency; but on his march he was joined by others who came in to his aſſiſtance, and among theſe was Cyrus, now about 16 years of age, and who now firſt ſignalized himſelf in battle. The parties Evil-merodach had ſent out were firſt attacked by the Medes, who, at length falling upon his main body, routed and purſued him with a great ſlaughter, quite home to his own borders [n]. Such was the event of this raſh, and ſeemingly unjuſt, enterpriſe (W); and this action may not only have exaſperated his father in a particular manner againſt him, but may alſo have been the firſt cauſe of that enmity of the Medes and Perſians, which ended in the ruin of Babylon, as we have already obſerved. And this ſpirit thus rouſed in the Medes may have been ſo dreaded, and the conſequences of it ſo naturally foreſeen by his father, the great Nebuchadnezzar, as to have cauſed him to impriſon this his ſon, and to utter the predictive exclamation we have ſeen above.

THIS prince, who, if this action be founded upon truth, was juſtly called, as his name is interpreted, Fooliſh Merodach, Evil-merodach.

[n] Xenoph. Κυρε Παιδεία.

(W) If it was really Nitocris this prince was now about to marry, and if ſhe was really a Mede, as is moſt generally underſtood, it is impoſſible to account for theſe his hoſtilities upon that nation, and eſpecially at the time our author here ſeems to mean; but this is what may be conſidered hereafter.

rodach, having adminiſtered very ill during his father's diſorder, was thrown into priſon upon his recovery: And in this confinement he contracted ſuch a kindneſs for the captive king of Judah, that, ſucceding to the throne upon the death of his father, he took Jehoiachin out of priſon, and entertained him like a king ever afterwards *. ther concerning him is uncertain, except that, indulging himſelf in ſloth and wickedneſs, he became intolerable to his ſubjects, and that, after a ſhort reign, he was treacherouſly murdered by his ſiſter's huſband Nerigliſſar; who that he was a Mede, and particularly Darius the Mede, we ſhall endeavour to make out in his reign; and if ſo, his murder of Evil-merodach his brother-in-law may be accounted for by the averſion he may have contracted in common with his countrymen againſt this unwiſe prince, who had ſo behaved to them as we have ſeen.

Evil-merodach moſt likely to have been Belſhazzar.

WHAT we have material to add concerning this king is, that, by all circumſtances, he is more likely to have been the Belſhazzar of Daniel, than any other king in Ptolemy's canon. This we gather from the concurrence of ſcripture with profane hiſtory. Beroſus [o] repreſents Evil-merodach as a lewd and wicked prince; Belſhazzar is in ſcripture [p] repreſented as the ſame. Beroſus [q] relates, that Evil-merodach was killed at a banquet by ſome of his lords; the ſcripture [r] ſays Belſhazzar was murdered at a great feaſt he gave to a 1000 of his lords, but mentions not by whom. They both ſay he was the ſon of Nebuchadnezzar, by the name of Evil-merodach [s], and ſcripture ſays the ſame of Belſhazzar, which is not ſaid of any other of the Babyloniſh kings. If to this it ſhould be objected, that both Evil-merodach and Belſhazzar are mentioned in ſcripture [t], as ſons of Nebuchadnezzar, and that therefore they cannot be the ſame perſon; we anſwer that they are not mentioned anywhere in ſcripture, either together, or in a courſe of ſucceſſion, but in different books, and not at all in reference to each other. That in ſcripture it is not unuſual to call the ſame prince by different names in different places. Thus Nebuchadnezzar himſelf is in ſome places, and particularly ly in the Prophets, called Nebuchadrezzar. Thus the king, who in one place is called Ahaſuerus [u], is in another called Artaxerxes [w]: and in one and the ſame chapter [x] is Eſarhaddon, the great Aſſyrian, called Aſnappar; and this authority is ſo much the more valid, as it occurs in a part of ſcripture indiſputably genuine. If again it be objected, that in ſcripture mention is made of the third year of Belſhazzar's reign [y], whereas Evil-merodach is allowed on all hands to have reigned but two years [z]; we anſwer again, that parts of years are never reckoned as whole years by chronologers; ſo that though he was in the beginning of his third year, they reckoned but two to his reign; an inſtance of which we have in Ptolemy's canon, where Laboroſoarchod, the ſucceſſor of Nerigliſſar, is left out, becauſe he did not reign a complete year, though he reigned nine months of a year. This ſhall ſuffice for this ſubject for the preſent; we may reſume it hereafter ſtill farther to the reader's ſatisfaction.

Neriglissar. Year of the Flood, 3439. Year before Chriſt, 560.

NERIGLISSAR, Nirigliſſoroor, Niricaſſolaſſurus [a], or, as we think, Darius the Mede, who is repreſented as the chief of the conſpirators againſt Evil-merodach [b], uſurped the throne. Of him it is ſeemingly recorded, for he is not mentioned by name, that, dreading the Medes who began to threaten Babylon, he endeavoured to ſtrengthen himſelf by foreign alliances. The ſtory, as it is told [c], repreſents this king as a great conqueror, and one who had made himſelf maſter of all Syria, Hyrcania, and Arabia, and to have been buſied in a war with the Bactrians, when Aſtyages the Mede departed this life, and thereby to have given a violent alarm to the Medes and the Perſians, who began to fear it would be their turn next. This king then concluding, that if he could but reduce the Medes, the reſt would bow to him of courſe, diſpatched ambaſſadors to Crœſus king of Lydia, to Cappadocia, Phrygia, Caria, Paphlagonia, the Indies, and Cilicia, to inſtil jealouſies into the ſeveral princes of theſe countries, and to ſtir them up againſt the Medes and Perſians, as if they were about to make themſelves maſters of all, particularly ly insisting on the strict union between them by the mutual ties of marriage. The success of these several embassies was, that some yielded to his reasons, and others [d] to his present largesses and future promises. Now, by what our author here says of this king, and particularly of his conquests, one would be rather apt to imagine he meant Nabocolassar, or Nebuchadnezzar, than any king of Babylon that succeeded him, and particularly as he makes him contemporary with Astyages the Mede. As for the pretence of union between the Persians and the Medes, the same was as strongly cemented between the Babylonians and the Medes; for Nebuchadnezzar was married to a Mede [e], and it is very likely, that Neriglissar was a Mede, by his being husband to a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar's [f]. In short, the Medes and the Babylonians seem to have been as closely united by marriages as any other nations of the time.

But we must allow our author [g] to be a little inaccurate, and especially as it is made a doubt, whether it was a history he meant to write, or a romance. However, that it is built upon some sort of truth, may be gathered from what he is here supposed to write concerning our Neriglissar; for as an usurper it is but natural he should have made such strong and earnest applications to the nations round about, as he is said to have done; a method of procedure which can never be reconciled with a conqueror in the full stream of his good fortune, as this prince is by our author [h], at the same time, represented to have been. We must therefore tax him with a little inattentiveness to what he was writing. Neriglissar, though he may have been of the royal blood of the Medes, may have been dubious, whether or no they and the Persians would suffer him to sit in quiet possession of the Babylonian empire, and may have had sufficient reasons to dread they would not; and that in such case he should so bestir himself in his own defence is no wonder.

Let this have been as it will, it is apparently certain, that when this king seized on the sovereignty, the empire was in its decline, and in great danger from both the Medes and Persians, and it is not unlikely, but he may have actually stood in need of foreign aid. Thus when Nabuchadonosor buchadonoſor was threatened with an invaſion by the Medes, he iſſued out his commands to all nations to come in to his aſſiſtance [i], a conduct Cteſias [k] has aſcribed to his Sardanapalus; and which may ſerve to illuſtrate what we advance concerning the diſtreſs Nerigliſſar muſt have been in upon his uſurpation; but he does not command as he did, he claims no obedience, but petitions rather, and begs and bribes for aid.

To have done with this obſcurity, the army, which ranged itſelf under the Babylonian ſtandard, is ſaid to have conſiſted of a mixed multitude as follows. Crœſus, king of Lydia, came with 10,000 horſe, and upwards of 40,000 light-armed foot; Artamas, king of the greater Phrygia, brought 40,000 foot, moſtly pike men, and 8000 horſe; Aribæus, king of Cappadocia, led with him 6000 horſe, and 30,000 foot, moſtly armed with miſſive weapons; Maragdas, the Arabian, conducted 10,000 horſe, 100 chariots, and a great number of ſlingers *. Theſe were the confederates of Nerigliſſar, and ſuch the quotas they reſpectively furniſhed; but we are not quite to depend upon the exactneſs of them, they being given as upon hear-ſay only, and in a converſation between Cyaxares and Cyrus. The confederate army under him.

As for Nerigliſſar himſelf, this potent Babylonian and fortunate conqueror, as our author has repreſented him, the numbers he himſelf brought into the field ſeem to be very ſhort, conſidering him in that view; for as much as he may have been a principal in this war, he headed no more than 20,000 horſe, 200 chariots, and foot proportionable [l]. Whether or no this confederate army received any farther addition, is not certain; but the Carians, Cilicians, Paphlagonians, and ſome others, ſeem to have receded from their firſt engagements. So that the caſe is pretty much alike between Chyniladan [m], the Aſſyrian, and this Babylonian, in regard of the many nations they called in, and the many that diſappointed them, and left them to their fate. The army of the Medes and the Perſians did not amount to above a third of that under the Babylonian king, till they were joined by a conſiderable re-inforcement under Tigranes the Armenian. In the midſt of theſe great and induſtrious preparations for war, ambaſſadors arrived from India to inquire into the grounds and cauſes of it, with with an offer of mediation, if it might be accepted, and with a threat, in case it was rejected, of joining with those who should appear to have the most justice on their side [n].

War between him and the Medes and Persians.

How this embassy concluded is uncertain, but the war begins very much to the disadvantage of Nerigliſſar; for Cyrus subdued the Chaldeans in the mountainous country, from whence they were wont to make their inroads upon the country of Armenia [o]. These Chaldeans, as they are called, can have been no other than the proper Assyrians, who, for ought we know, may have been formerly so called; but the proper Chaldeans, and their mountains, were far away from any part of Armenia [p]. Whether or no our author is here guilty of an error in geography, we cannot positively say; but to us it seems that he is. These Chaldeans, however, according to our author's description, were the most valiant race of men in all these parts, and carried no other arms than a wicker-shield and two javelins, and entered willingly into foreign pay, as being naturally addicted to war, and very poor; but they were subdued by Cyrus, and obliged to make a peace with their next neighbours the Armenians, and, in a manner, to become the same people with them [q].

Chaldeans next to Armenia.

Battle between the Babylonians and the Medes.

THE two armies now appeared in sight of each other, and the Assyrians, or Babylonians, under Nerigliſſar, incamped and fortified themselves with strong retrenchments, while the Medes and the Persians covered themselves only with the villages and hills in the neighbourhood. In this posture they continued for some days, till at length the Assyrians, leaving their retrenchments, and drawing themselves up in battle-array, and being exhorted by Nerigliſſar to behave as became them in the approaching conflict, and particularly as their all was at stake; were attacked by the enemy, who shamefully routed them in the field, and pursued them with a prodigious slaughter close to their retrenchments, where those within did not dare to shoot an arrow against the insulting Medes and Persians, under the conduct of Cyrus; and no sooner understood, that he intended to force their camp, than they betook them to the most precipitate flight, and left their wives and children to lament their loss, in the most woeful and sensible manner. This

This when the confederate kings perceived, they haſtened, with the choiceſt of their men that were left them, to repulſe the Perſians, and they ſucceeded in their endeavours, and Cyrus retreated and encamped at ſome diſtance. But Nerigliſſar lived to ſee no more of the war now kindled. He was ſlain in battle, his ſubjects were in the utmoſt conſternation, and Crœſus and his allies, quite at a loſs, and amazed at the intrepidity of the enemy, reſolved to ſave themſelves as they could, and left their camp a prey to Cyrus and his Perſians [r].

Nerigliſſar ſlain.

SUCH was the unfortunate end of Nerigliſſar, who that he was Darius the Mede, appears by theſe arguments. If, as king of Babylon, he is in the canon of Ptolemy, Darius the Mede can have been no other than Nerigliſſar. Secondly, Darius the Mede is ſaid to have commenced king of Babylon at the age of 62 years; which, if we do not ſuppoſe him to have been ſlain by Cyrus as above, may be thought to ſuit better with Nerigliſſar's ſhort reign of four years, than Nabonad's longer reign of 17 years, which would make him 79 years old at his death; and, by the way, as Nabonad did not end his days with his reign, Darius the Mede muſt, in this caſe, have been ſtill much older, which is not very likely. Thirdly, Nerigliſſar is repreſented as a wiſe, a worthy, and a brave prince, which neither of his ſucceſſors were, and juſt ſuch an one does Darius the Mede ſeem to have been. Fourthly, Though Nerigliſſar is not ſaid to have been a Mede, yet he very probably may have been ſo, and nothing is ſaid to the contrary. He is allowed not to have been of the line of Babylon, though he married the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, and ſiſter of Evil-merodach; and theſe marriages, as we have ſuggeſted above, may have been frequent between the two kings of the Medes and Babylonians, till Evil-merodach behaved ſo impoliticly as he is repreſented to have done, in breach of the faith and good intelligence between the two kingdoms. Fifthly, Nerigliſſar is on all hands allowed to have ſucceeded Evil-merodach, whom he ſlew, and ſo Darius the Mede is ſaid to have ſlain Belſhazzar, and to have aſſumed his kingdom. And though the ſcripture expreſſion in this caſe, does not always imply an immediate ſucceſſion, it may be fairly enough admitted in ſuch a ſenſe, in the circumſtance before us, till ſomething to deſtroy it be exhibited againſt it. Sixthly, That Nerigliſſar was a Mede, may be gathered from the inveteracy he ſeems to have born againſt Evil-merodach, whom we take to have been Belſhazzar; and it may be very naturally accounted for, if what we have related from Xenophon has any truth in it. Seventhly, The ſcripture does not ſay, that Darius was king of the Medes, but only that he governed by their laws, which he may have introduced with the good liking of the Babylonians, who may thereby have had a limited monarch for an unlimited one. And laſtly, He may have been a Mede, and yet Cyrus may have made war upon him, and ſlain him in battle; for Cyrus, it is ſaid, made no ſcruple to dethrone even his own grandfather; whence Darius may not only have been a Mede, but may alſo have been very nearly related to Cyrus, and yet have periſhed in battle againſt him; for nothing is to ſtand in the way of thoſe who are fired by the waſteful ambition of conqueſt and univerſal monarchy. This is what we have thought neceſſary to ſay in this place.

Laboroſoarchod.

THIS laſt king was ſucceeded by his ſon Laboroſoarchod [s], Labaſſoaraſc ‡, or Chabaeſſoarach [t]: ſome ſuppoſe him to have been the ſame with Nabonadius, or Belſhazzar, and to have been the laſt king of Babylon. But they contradict an hiſtorical fact very explicitly related; whereby we underſtand, that he came very young to the throne, and that, betraying a moſt vicious and abominable turn of mind, he was murthered, as not even worthy to live, much leſs to reign, which he did no longer than nine months [u]; ſo that not having completed a year, it is thence he is omitted in the canon.

SOME of this king's evil doings are ſuppoſed * to have been recorded by Xenophon †, according to whom it may have been, that he committed ſuch cruelties on Gadatas and Gobryas, two great Babylonians, as provoked them to the ſhare they are ſaid to have had in the ſubverſion of this empire. The ſon of the former of theſe he is ſaid to have ſlain for no better reaſon than hitting a beaſt, at a hunting he had invited him to, which he himſelf had miſſed; and the latter he is ſaid to have caſtrated, only becauſe one of his concubines had commended him for an handſome perſonage §. By theſe moſt violent acts of tyranny it is ſuppoſed ‖, that he drove them, and the provinces they commanded, manded, over to the enemy. Such is this king ſuppoſed to have been, though there are other ſeeming reaſons why he ſhould have been particularly odious in the eyes of ſome of the Babylonians, and particularly of his ſucceſſor and his aſſociates.

NABONADIUS, who had the chief hand in the murder of Laboroſoarchod, is ſaid to have been a Babylonian [w], ſo that what is ſaid above of the unworthineſs of his ſhort-lived predeceſſor, may have very little of truth or juſtice in it. His greateſt fault may have been, that he was the ſon of a ſtranger and an uſurper; and being perhaps a child, or little able to defend himſelf, he may eaſily have been deſtroyed, and reaſons may as eaſily have been given for the deed. Nor can we wonder greatly at this barbarity, in a man who was confeſſedly the ſon of Evil-merodach, and grandſon to the great Nebuchadnezzar; one, who muſt have thought himſelf injured by an excluſion from the throne, and that it was even a duty on him not to ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of retrieving the luſtre of his family. Nor muſt we forget, that he muſt alſo have been the ſon of the famed Nitocris, who is ſaid even to have outſhone Semiramis herſelf; and who, if the thing were ſo, could not have reſted in a private ſtate, while the ſon of an uſurper poſſeſſed the throne in prejudice of her ſon; and thus was it the ſcepter came again into the hands of a prince of the old Aſſyrian, or Babylonian, race of the male branch, which in him was to ceaſe from empire.

Nabonadius. Year of the Flood, 2444. Year before Chriſt, 555.

THIS king is alſo called Nabonduis [x], Labynetus, Labynitus [y], Nabannidochus [z], Naboandel [b], Belſhazzar, and Darius the Mede [b], and by other names, and rather ſtruggled for the empire than poſſeſſed it; for Cyrus was now in the career of his victories, and a profeſſed enemy to the kingdom of Babylon, and had ſome battles with this king, as ſhould ſeem, and his allies, in the beginning of his reign; but the particulars being no where to be met with, we muſt content ourſelves with the little we know of the matter, and which we ſhall relate hereafter. Nabonadius appears pears, however, to have been the moſt powerful prince of his time, and the kingdom of Babylon to have been ſuch, that Cyrus thought it prudent to ſtrengthen himſelf, the moſt he could, by the conqueſt of all the neighbouring kingdoms, before he undertook to deſtroy this.

WHAT ſort of a man Nabonadius was, is hard to ſay; but his mother, according to ſome [c], has all the glory of his reign; all the honour of preparing for the defence of the falling kingdom is aſcribed to her. Her name was Nitrocis [d], and is ſuppoſed to have been a Mede by birth [e], and to have been wife to Evil-merodach, and being a woman of great ſagacity and reſolution, ſhe not only foreſaw the ſtorm that was gathering, but prepared for ſhelter againſt it, and particularly by fortifying the city itſelf of Babylon, ſo that it ſhould be proof againſt any enemy that might aſſault it. Accordingly it was in this reign, and conſequently by her, that Babylon is ſaid to have been firſt ſurrounded with walls [f] next to the river; and it is pretty plain, as we have obſerved before, that ſhe completed what Nebuchadnezzar had begun. Thus Herodotus repreſents her to have not only fortified the ſides of the river with walls, to prevent the enemy from landing on either ſide of the city, but to have ſunk the lake, and done other works aſcribed to Nebuchadnezzar, and particularly to have built the bridge, which till then had been wanting at Babylon [g]. This heroine, having done all that could be done to ſecure the city from all danger of the enemy, while her ſon Nabonadius wallowed, as ſhould ſeem, in ſloth and luxury, neglectful and careleſs of what threatened him, was commemorated by an extraordinary inſcription on a monument which had been prepared by herſelf, to the following effect, IF ANY KING OF BABYLON AFTER ME SHALL BE IN DISTRESS FOR MONEY, HE MAY OPEN THIS SEPULCHER, AND TAKE OUT AS MUCH AS MAY SERVE HIM; BUT IF HE BE IN NO REAL NECESSITY, LET HIM FORBEAR, OR HE SHALL HAVE CAUSE TO REPENT HIM. This monument and inſcription, ſaid to have been over one of the moſt remarkable able gates of the city, is alſo ſaid to have remained untouched till the reign of Darius, who, conſidering the gate was uſeleſs, no man caring to go under a dead body, and being invited by the hopes of an immenſe treaſure, broke it open; but, inſtead of what he ſought, is ſaid to have found nothing but a dead body, and another inſcription, to the following effect, HADST THOU NOT BEEN MOST INSATIABLY AVARITIOUS AND GREEDY OF THE MOST SORDID GAIN, THOU HADST NEVER VIOLATED THE ABODE OF THE DEAD (X). Thus much for Nitrocris *; we muſt now return to her ſon, and ſee how the Babylonian empire ended under him.

As the circumſtances of the fall of Niniveh are involved in great obſcurity, thoſe of the fall of Babylon, are in many reſpects no leſs ſo; for all we ſeem poſitively to know concerning it is, that it was deſtroyed by Cyrus; and all we can do is, firſt, to relate what profane authors write concerning this laſt king; and, ſecondly, to inquire whether or no he was the Belſhazzar of Daniel.

Herodotus's account of the fall of Babylon.

IF we adhere to Herodotus [h], who calls him Labynitus, we muſt conclude him to have been ſtill a great king, who, as yet, had not been attempted by the Medes and the Perſians;

* Idem, ibid. c. 187. [h] Ibid. c. 188.

(X) Plutarch (57) mentions this monument and inſcription as belonging to Semiramis. Thus the ſepulcher of Bel himſelf is ſaid to have been opened by Xerxes, who found nothing there but a glaſs veſſel almoſt full of oil, with a dead body floating in it, and an inſcription on a ſmall pillar hard by, That the man who ſhould open it ſhould dearly repent him of what he had done, if he did not fill up the veſſel with oil; which Xerxes in vain attempting, he went away heavy and ſad, and experienced the efficacy of the threat in his Grecian expedition. So Darius by others being ſaid to have opened the tomb of Semiramis, a peſtilence is reported to have iſſued thence, and to have deſtroyed one third part of the race of men (58): Strange figments!

sians; but to have been, on the contrary, in such high esteem with the former, as to have beeg chosen their mediator with the Lydians; which apparently destroys what Xenophon represents of the war, which subsisted without any intervention of settled peace, from the reign of Nerigliſſar to the last day of the Babylonian monarchy; and this circumstance being considered, it has been thought, that however Herodotus may seem to give this king, who thus reconciled the Medes and Lydians, for the last of the race, he could certainly mean no other than the great Nebuchadnezzar, who alone, of all the kings at Babylon, seems to have had weight and authority enough to be invested with this mediatory office.

HERODOTUS has a Labynetus, whom in two places he calls the king of the Babylonians, and a Labynitus whom he calls emperor of Assyria, and reports to have derived his name from his father. Under this Labynitus, according to him, it was that Babylon was taken by Cyrus; so that, after all, it may have been some former Labynetus, king of Babylon, that reconciled the Medes and the Lydians; but having thus suggested all we know concerning this matter, we leave it to the reader's decision.

THIS Labynitus, understanding that Cyrus was on his march to besiege the city of Babylon, went out with a great army to meet him; but being vanquished, the Babylonians betook them to their city, which being furnished with great stores of provision to hold out a very long siege, they made a jest of it, and lived within the walls as if no enemy had been near them; but being one day in the midst of a riotous festival, the Persians, who had drained the river by diverting it into the great lake we have described, scaled the works which defended the banks of the city, and the Babylonians were surprised in the midst of all their mirth and jollity, and an end was put to their empire[i].

The fall of Babylon, according to Berosus and Megasthene.

BY other authors[k] we understand, that this last king did not retire in person to Babylon, but chose rather to go to Borsippa, where, being besieged by Cyrus, he surrendered himself to that conqueror, who behaved very kindly to him, and sent him as his lieutenant, as should seem into Carmania, where he spent the remainder of his days. And thus was Babylon taken, and such was the fate of her last king, after a reign of 17 years, according to profane historians; nor is the same inconsistent with scripture so very much as to oblige us quite to reject it.

The fall of Babylon according to Xenophon.

But as much weight as theſe authors may have, Xenophon varies from them, and tells us †, that this king loſt all the conſiderable places in his country by a continued warfare waged on him by Cyrus, notwithſtanding all the leagues he could make, and all the foreign aid he could procure of Egyptians, Greeks, Thracians, and all the nations of the Leſſer Aſia, over whom he conſtituted Crœſus his general, and ſent him even to invade Media. But Crœſus being utterly routed, and the country afterwards as good as all reduced, Babylon was left as it were to herſelf. The city and the little territory about it was all of the eaſt that now held out againſt Cyrus, who, at length drew near to beſiege the Babylonian citizens. The laſt king then marched out to give him battle, but, being overthrown in the field, he was driven back to his city, and blocked up by a cloſe ſiege. The place was thought impregnable, on account of its walls and the great number of people to defend them; not to mention a ſtore of all neceſſaries to laſt them for 20 years. The ſiege continued two years; at the end of which the river was diverted into the lake as above, and a ſtrong party was poſted where the river ran into the city, and another where it ran out. Theſe parties were commanded by the Babylonians, Gobryas and Gadatas, who, about midnight, obſerving the river to be drained, marched into the bed of the river, and finding all the water gates open, which upon ordinary nights, for it was now a feſtival, were uſed to be ſhut, they proceeded to the palace, and ſurprized, and ſlew the guard. The palace being opened to know the cauſe of this confuſion, they ruſhed in and ſlew the king, as he was valiantly fighting with his ſword in his hand *.

The fall of Babylon, as ſeemingly in Daniel.

If he was really Belſhazzar, he certainly came to this unfortunate end; for having made a feaſt for 1000 of his lords, and having profaned the veſſels his fore-father had brought from the temple of Jeruſalem, the fingers of a hand came out, and wrote upon the wall in a character unknown to any perſon then preſent; the king ſaw this, and was quite terrified; he trembled, and his knees ſmote one againſt the other [m]. He cried out for the aſtrologers, Chaldeans, and the reſt, and promiſed, that the man among them who ſhould decypher the writing, and inform him him of what it meant, ſhould be cloathed in ſcarlet, and have a chain of gold, and be third ruler of his kingdom [n]. He addreſſed them in vain (Y), till the queen, who is ſuppoſed to have been Nitocris [o], underſtanding the trouble the king was in, came in and informed him of Daniel, who had been ſo eſteemed by his father; but that he ſhould have been unknown to Belſhazzar, is what it may be to no purpoſe to inquire into. Daniel came, and having reminded him of what his father had been, and what had befallen him, and rebuked him for his inſolent pride, and for profaning the holy veſſels which had ſtood in the houſe of the Lord, he read the words, which were, MENE MENE, TEKEL UPHARSIN [p]. "This is the interpretation of the thing; MENE, God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finiſhed it; TEKEL, thou art weighed in the balance, and found wanting; PERES, thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Perſians [q]." Notwithſtanding the ſeverity of this doom, Belſhazzar performed to Daniel all the promiſe he had made to the man who ſhould thus ſatisfy him; and in that night was Belſhazzar the king of the Chaldeans ſlain: And Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about 62 years old [r].

In the firſt year of the reign of Belſhazzar it was, that Daniel [s] had the viſion of the four beaſts, which we may reſume hereafter, and in the third of the ſame Belſhazzar it was, that he had the viſion of the ram and the he-goat [t]. In the reign of Darius the Mede it was, that the ſame Daniel was thrown into the lion's den [u]; but the particulars of theſe ſeveral occurrences we reſerve for another time time, ſeeing we are at a loſs for the proper place of theſe two reigns.

Nabonad unlikely to have been Belſhazzar, or Darius the Mede.

We are now to conſider, whether or no this Nabonadius was either Belſhazzar or Darius the Mede; in which we ſhall rather propoſe our own doubts, than pretend to decide upon ſo palpable an obſcurity as is the whole hiſtory of Babylon, from the time that Nebuchadnezzar died, to the day that Cyrus made himſelf maſter of this city. Sir Iſaac Newton and Doctor Prideaux are quite clear, that he was Belſhazzar, and ſupport themſelves by many conſiderable arguments, but not ſo very powerful as to admit of no contradiction. To enter into the ſeveral opinions and varieties concerning this ſucceſſion of princes, would lead us into an inextricable labyrinth, and confound rather than inform us; we ſhall therefore chiefly refer to what we have before offered in proof, that Evil-merodach muſt have been the Belſhazzar of Daniel, and Nerigliſſar the Darius the Mede of the ſame, if they be any kings exhibited in Ptolemy's aſtronomical canon; and to ſuppoſe they are not would be a ſeeming reflection on the accuracy of that valuable piece.

It is to be obſerved, that, if any credit is to be given to profane hiſtorians, Nabonadius cannot have been Belſhazzar; for the former muſt have died in a ſtrange land, while the latter was ſlain in his own palace. Again, Belſhazzar's ignorance of Daniel can never be reconciled with ſo long a reign as that of Nabonadius. The utmoſt we can gather that Belſhazzar reigned at Babylon was not above three years; Nabonadius reigned ſeventeen.

This Nabonadius was certainly the laſt king of Babylon, and by Ptolemy's canon, and by the concurrence of the bulk of profane authors, there was no king there between him and Cyrus; nor does the ſcripture itſelf, which makes Darius the Mede, to have preceded Cyrus, ſay, that he reigned after the laſt king of the Babylonian race, or that there was no king of Babylon between Darius the Mede and Cyrus.

Now that this laſt Babylonian cannot have been Darius the Mede, as is ſometimes ſaid [w], may be proved by profane fane authors [x], who agree, that he was a Babylonian, nay, and of the royal race *; and this shall suffice for the present, together with what has been said before, to evince, that he was not Darius the Mede.

NABONADIUS was certainly of the royal race †; there is all the reason in the world to believe he was a descendant, and even a grandson, of Nebuchadnezzar, and especially if the celebrated Nitocris was married to Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, as the common opinion is. It is said, that all nations should serve him and his son's [y] son; Nabonadius may then have been this son's son. It is said, that God would cut off from Babylon the son and the grandson [z], and therefore it is concluded, that this last king must have been killed as well as Evil-merodach; but there is no occasion to suppose this, if profane evidence may be received; and that so it ought to be, when it agrees with the text of scripture, can be no manner of doubt. Now we understand, that this prophecy was amply fulfilled; for we are told, that Evil-merodach, the undoubted son of Nebuchadnezzar, was murdered [a], and that his grandson, by his daughter who was married to Nerigliſſar and whose name was Laborosoarchod, was murdered likewise [b]. Supposing then Nabonadius to have been the grandson likewise of Nebuchadnezzar by Evil-merodach, there is no necessity to suppose he was murdered or slain. The predictions then, that all nations should serve Nebuchadnezzar's son and his son's son, and that God would cut off his son and his grandson, were apparently different, and apparently fulfilled. In a word, Belshazzar, who, to all appearance, was no other than Evil-merodach, seems rather to have been butchered by the hands of assassins, than to have fallen by the sword of the enemy; nor can it be consistent with the character we have of Nitocris to imagine, she could have been so negligent as to suffer the enemy to surprise the city in the manner they did; she then must have been dead, and not alive, as Prideaux would have it. Though it is prophesied, that the enemy should possess the city at the

the time of a feaſt, while her great, and wiſe, and mighty men were in liquor, it does not follow immediately thence, that the king himſelf was ſlain at the ſame time. That it was taken at the time of a great feſtival, we have confirmed to us by an hiſtorian of the firſt credit, and neareſt to the times [c], and that is ſufficient for the honour of the prophecy.

As we are not wholly to reject profane authorities, but on the contrary, very much to rely on them, we would obſerve, that from the prophecy of Nebuchadnezzar [d], which he is ſupppoſed [e] to have owed to no leſs a man than Daniel himſelf, it may be gathered, that what we have here and elſewhere above ſuggeſted, concerning Belſhazzar and Darius the Mede, is not very much out of the way. For he ſpeaks of the deſtruction to befal to Babylon as juſt at hand, and, though he muſt have been then very old, what he might poſſibly be a witneſs to; and thus Belſhazzar, who is in ſcripture expreſly called his ſon, was murdered two or three years after his death. This deſtruction was to be brought on by the means of a Mede, in whom the Aſſyrians, or Babylonians, were wont greatly to pride themſelves; and what Mede can this have been ſo likely as Nerigliſſar, who ſeems by his name to have been even naturalized an Aſſyrian, and who had married Nebuchadnezzar's own daughter [f]? The Perſian mule is plainly Cyrus, who, by warring upon Nerigliſſar to dethrone him, firſt ſtruck at the root of the Babylonian empire, and, by continuing the war, brought it at length to the ground.

Arguments deduced from Nebuchadnezzar's prophecy.

Upon the whole, it may appear rather more evidently than not, that if Darius the Mede and Belſhazzar are any of the kings of Babylon in the canon, and that they are not, cannot well be ſo much as ſuppoſed, they can have been no other than Evil-merodach and Nerigliſſar. The ſon and grandſon of Nebuchadnezzar, againſt whom it was denounced that they ſhould be cut off, cannot well be allowed to have been any but Evil-merodach and Laboroſoarchod; and his ſon and his ſon's ſon, whom all nations, as it is hyperbolically expreſſed, ſhould ſerve, can have been no other than Evil-merodach and this Nabonadius, in whoſe days

(Y) Whether from hence it may be gathered, that this laſt king was within the city or without it, at the time it was taken, we leave to the reader; and conſequently, whether or no the Belſhazzar of Daniel was this laſt king or not.

SUCH was Babylon, and such her end. Upon the whole it appears, that the Assyrian monarchy, whether the first at Niniveh, or the second at Babylon, was never thoroughly settled in a dominion over the nations for any length of time, and that it rather contended for empire than enjoyed it in any settled form, and that, if we except Nebuchadnezzar, no one of these monarchs, from Pul to Nabonadius, could ever boast any thing like the conquests attributed to Semiramis. Esar-haddon may claim the next place after him for conquests and dominion, but his life ended by the time he had exalted himself over the west. The rest of these princes were all unfortunate, one way or other: Some of them, with infinite labour and hazard, attempted to subjugate the nations; but the flame still broke out somewhere or other against them; others of them, by a supine neglect, saw themselves in danger, from those their warlike predecessors had awed, and were some of them, in the end, subdued, and captivated, and destroyed by them. In fine, we see both the Assyrian and the Babylonian submitted to that fate, which must sooner or later dissolve all universal monarchies, which must have almost as many enemies as subjects.

The Hiſtory of the Medes.

SECT. I.

The Deſcription of Media.

THE country before us, once the ſeat of a potent empire, derives its name from Madai the third ſon of Japhet, as is plain from ſcripture, where the Medes are conſtantly called Madai [a] (A). It was bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the north by part of the Caſpian ſea; on the ſouth by Perſis, Suſiana, and Aſſyria; on the eaſt by Parthia and Hyrcania; and on the weſt by Armenia Major. It was in antient times divided into ſeveral provinces, namely Tropatene, Charomithrene, Darites, Marciane, Amariace, and Syro-Media: All theſe were by a later diviſion reduced to two only, the one called Media Magna, the other Media Atropatia, or ſimply Atropatene [b]. Name, ſituation, &c.

ATROPATENE was that part which lay between mount Taurus and the Caſpian ſea, and is ſuppoſed to have been ſo called from one Atropatus, who, being governor of this province in the time of Darius, the laſt Perſian monarch, withſtood Alexander the Great, and, upon the downfal of the Perſian monarchy, ſeized on this part of Media, and tranſmitted it to his poſterity, who held it as ſovereigns to Strabo's time [c]. This was a cold, barren, and unhoſpitable country,

[c] Strab. l. 11. p. 523.

(A) Among profane authors, ſome derive the name of Media from one Medus, the ſon of Medea and Jaſon; others from a city here called Media, whence, ſay they, the whole country borrowed country, and on that very account allotted by Shalmaneſer for the abode of many captive Iſraelites after the conqueſt of that kingdom.

Cities of note in this part of Media were Gaza or Gazæ, the metropolis of the province, and ſituated, according to Pliny, in a ſpecious plain between Ecbatan and Artaxata, and equally diſtant from both. Sanina, ſeated between the Araxes and the Cambyſes; Fazina, between the Cambyſes and the Cyrus; and Cyropolis, between the Cyrus and the Amardus. This tract was inhabited by the Caduſians and Caſpians, a barbarous and inhuman race, originally ſprung from the Scythians.

Media Magna was bounded by Perſia, Parthia, Hyrcania, the Hyrcanian ſea, and Atropatene. The moſt remarkable cities in this part of Media were Ecbatan, Laodicea, Apamea, Rageia, Arſacia, &c. Ecbatan, the metropolis of all Media and the ſeat both of the Median and Perſian monarchs, was built by Dejoces, the firſt that reigned in Media, after the inhabitants had ſhaken off the Aſſyrian yoke [d]. The walls of this city are much celebrated by the antients, and minutely deſcribed by Herodotus [e]: they were ſeven in number, all of a circular from, and gradually riſeing above each other by the height of the battlements of each wall. The ſituation of the ground, riſing by an eaſy aſcent, was very favourable to the deſign of building theſe walls, and perhaps firſt ſuggeſted it. The royal palace and treaſury were within the innermoſt circle of the ſeven. The firſt of theſe walls was equal in circumference to the city of Athens, and had white battlements, the ſecond black, the third of a purple colour, the fourth blue, and the fifth of a deep orange; but the two innermoſt, as ſerving more immediately for a fence to the royal perſon of the king, were embelliſhed above the others, the one being done over with rowed its name (1). Sextus Rufus tells us, that in his time it was known by the name of Medena (2), and from others we learn (3), that it was alſo called Aria; but to enquire into the origin of theſe various appellations, would prove both a laborious and fruitleſs taſk.

with silver, and the other with gold [f]. This description of Herodotus savours, we must own, somewhat of romance; but, nevertheless, that Ecbatan was a great and powerful city, and perhaps no-ways inferior either to Niniveh or Babylon, is confirmed by far better authorities. In the book of Judith [g] we read, that the walls of this stately metropolis were seventy cubits high and fifty cubits broad; that the towers on the gates were a hundred cubits in height, the breadth in the foundation sixty cubits, and the walls built of hewn and polished stone, each stone being six cubits in length and three in breadth. This city is by the antients constantly called Ecbatan of Media, to distinguish it from another in Syria bearing the same name [h], where the unfortunate Cambyses died, as we read in Herodotus [i] (B).

Laodicea, of which appellation there were many towns, so called either from the mother of Nicator, or the wife of Antiochus, is counted by Strabo [k] among the cities of Media, and placed by Pliny * near the confines of Persia. Apamea is by Strabo sometimes adjudged to Media, and sometimes to Parthia [l]. Raga, Rageia, or Ragea is called by Isidorus [m] the greatest city of Media; it was repaired by Nicator, who called it Europus, and by that name it was known to Ptolemy; but in the book of Tobit it retains the former. In process of time it became the seat of the Parthian kings, who gave it the name of Arsacia or Arsace, as we shall see in the history of that people. Other cities of

(B) Pliny (4) tells us, that Ecbatan was built by Seleucus; an unaccountable oversight, since he must have read an account of it not only in Herodotus, but likewise in Demosthenes (5), who calls it the ordinary residence of the Persian monarchs. On the other hand, Diodorus (6) carries the building of this town back to the fabulous times of Semiramis, and speaks of mountains levelled, vallies raised, waters conveyed through rocky mountains, and of Media are mentioned by Pliny, Stephanus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Isidorus, viz. Zombis, Patigran, Gazaca, Margasis, &c. but these were all built in after-ages by the Macedonians, and are therefore called by Strabo [n] Greek cities. This part of Media was inhabited by the Carduchians, Marandæans, Gelians, Syro-Medians, Margasians, &c.

Mountains and rivers.

The mountains of this country, such as may be proper to take notice of, are, according to Ptolemy and Strabo [o], Choatra, parting Media from Assyria, and branching out from the Gordyean mountains on the confines of Assyria and Armenia; Zagrus, dividing it from the same Assyria and other astonishing works performed by his heroine, for the embellishment of the city and convenience of the inhabitants. This great city was situate on a rising ground, according to Ptolemy and Diodorus, about twelve stades distance from mount Orontes, and not at the foot of mount Jasanius on the southern confines of Media and Persia, where Ammianus Marcellinus is pleased to place it (7). Here Daniel is said by Josephus to have built a stately palace, which afterwards served as a mausoleum of the kings of Media; some of the beams, says this author, were of silver, and the rest of cedar, but plated with gold. There are now no monuments remaining, either of this magnificent building, or of the proud palace, where the monarchs of Asia were wont to pass their summer; nay, there is a great disagreement among our modern travellers about the place where that stately metropolis stood. The opinion of Molet, who translated and wrote a commentary upon Ptolemy, seems to Sir John Chardin the most probable, viz. that Tauris is the antient and famous Ecbatan (8); and this opinion is confirmed by Ortelius, Golnits, Teixera, Andrea della valle, &c. Josephus assures us (9), that the palace built by Daniel was entire in his time; but at present not even the ruins of any magnificent building are to be seen either at Tauris or in that neighbourhood; for in all the ruins there the materials, as our traveller judiciously observes (10), are only earth, brick, and pebbles, which in antient times were never used in Media for the building of palaces. Some writers confound Ecbatan with Batana, which is evidently Ptolemy's Batina, and placed by him to the north of mount Orontes near the river Straton.

Aſſyria on the eaſt, a mountain, if Polybius [p] is to be credited, one hundred ſtades high. Parachoatra, placed by Ptolemy on the borders towards Perſia, and by Strabo [q] on the confines of Media, Hyrcania, and Parthia. Theſe are the boundaries betwen Media and the adjacent regions, and therefore may be ſaid as properly to belong to the latter as to the former; but the Orontes, the Jaſanius, and the Coronus are in the ſtricteſt ſenſe mountains of Media, as ariſing in the very heart of the country. The rivers of note are, according to Ptolemy, the Straton, the Amardus, the Cyrus, and the Cambyſes. But theſe rivers, as they are repreſented to diſembogue themſelves into the moſt ſouthern parts of the Caſpian, muſt by their poſition have belonged to the provinces of Ghilan and Mazandaran, as they are now called, and conſequently could not belong to Media Proper, as it is deſcribed to us by the antients.

We cannot help taking notice here of a conſiderable miſtake, which many of the antients have been guilty of, with reſpect to the ſituation of the Caſpian Straits, called by the Latins Portæ Caſpiæ, Clauſtra Caſpia, and Pylæ Caſpiæ. Ptolemy, Strabo, Arrian, Iſidorus, Characenus, and Dionyſius Periegeta [r] place them on the confines of Media and Parthia, or on the eaſtern borders of Media. But Pliny, not liking this ſituation, carries them quite croſs the country, and after having been ſome time at a loſs how to diſpoſe of ſo heavy a load, drops it at laſt on the confines of Media and Armenia, that is, on the moſt weſtern borders of Media [s]. Suetonius [t] and Tacitus [u] confound them with the Iberian ſtraits, which are a narrow paſſage through the mountains dividing Iberia from Sarmatia. Some of our modern geographers place them in Media Atropatia, between the Caſpian mountains and the Caſpian ſea, confounding them with what the preſent inhabitants call Demir-can, or Iron-gate, which is a narrow paſſage out of Tartary into Perſia.

Soil. The northern parts of Media, lying between the Caſpian mountains and the ſea, are very cold and barren; the preſent inhabitants make their bread of dried almonds, and and their drink of the juice of certain herbs. Here the ſnow lies on the mountains for nine months in the year [w]. But the ſouthern parts are productive of all ſorts of grain and neceſſaries for life, and withal ſo pleaſant, that the country adjoining to Tauris, probably the antient Ecbatan, is called the garden of Perſia. There are here large plains, among which that of Nyſa is famous for the numerous ſtuds of horſes that were kept in it for the uſe of the Perſian monarchs, and are often mentioned and celebrated by the antients. Where this plain of Nyſa was ſituated, is no eaſy matter to determine (C).

Climate. The climate is very unequal: that part which lies between the mountains and the ſea is exceeding cold, and the earth ſwampy, and full of marſhes, where innumerable [w] Chardin, voy. en Perſ. vol. i. p. 524.

(C) The antients place the Nyſean plain in the eaſtermoſt parts of what they call Media, and far beyond the limits of what is now ſuppoſed to have been properly this country. We have a traveller, who thinks he has ſeen this fertile paſture; but if he did, we muſt place it quite differently from what the antients ſeem to inſinuate it ought to be, and ſeveral degrees nearer us. His words are, "We continued our way (from "Tauris towards Perſia) upon the moſt beautiful and fertile "plains covered with villages. Theſe plains afforded the moſt "excellent paſture of all Media, and, I dare ſay, of the whole "world, and the beſt horſes of the country were there at graſs. "—I aſked a young nobleman in company with us, If there were "any other plains in Media ſo fine and ſo extenſive? He told "me, He had ſeen ſome as fine about Derbent, but none "more extenſive; ſo that 'tis reaſonable enough to believe, "that theſe plains are the Hippobaton of the antients, and where "they ſay the kings of Media had a ſtud of fifty thouſand "horſes, and that here it is alſo, we muſt look for the Nyſean "plain ſo famous for the horſes of that name. Stephanus the "geographer ſays, that Nyſa was in the country of the Medes. "I told this ſame nobleman ſome particulars which hiſtorians "relate concerning theſe horſes, namely Phavorinus, who ſays, "all the Nyſean horſes were light duns; he anſwered, that he "had never read or heard any thing of the kind. I afterwards "enquired of ſeveral gentlemen of learning, but could never "underſtand, that there was any place, either in Perſia or Me"dia, that produced horſes of that colour (11)".

ble ſwarms of venemous inſects are bred (D), which, together with the vapours riſing from the Caſpian ſea, render that part very unhoſpitable. The provinces that are more remote from the ſea enjoy a very wholeſome air, though liable to heavy rains and violent ſtorms, eſpecially in the ſpring and autumn [x]. Beſides the cattle and game of all ſorts, which the Mediterranean provinces abound with, ſome of them have been for many ages remarkable on account of the various ſorts of excellent wines they produce, eſpecially the neighbourhood of Tauris, where no fewer than ſixty different kinds of grapes, all of an exquiſite flavour, are to be taſted at this day [y]. From its productions in the preſent ſtate we may judge, what it muſt have been in better times.

The Caſpian ſea.

WE cannot diſmiſs this ſubject without ſome obſervations on the Caſpian ſea, which is the northern boundary of Media. This large body of waters was by the antients called indifferently the Caſpian and the Hyrcanian ſea, from the Caſpians and Hyrcanians whoſe ſhores it waſhed [z]. However, Pliny [a] makes ſome difference between thoſe two appellations, telling us, that on the Caſpian coaſts it bears the former denomination, and on thoſe of Hyrcania the latter. The antient, and likewiſe the modern, geographers, had but a very imperfect knowledge of the true ſituation, extent, coaſts, and bays of this ſea, before the diſcoveries made lately by a very able navigator and geographer (E); and therefore what has been ſaid by others

(D) Ælian tells us (12), that theſe parts of Media were greatly infeſted by ſcorpions, and that, while the king of Perſia was on his progreſs into Media, the inhabitants were employed for three days, before his arrival on the confines, in clearing the country of thoſe venemous inſects.

(E) M. Vanverden, who, by orders of the late Czar, formed a very exact chart of the Caſpian from obſervations made by him on the ſpot in 1720, 1721, 1722. Theſe obſervations, together with M. Vanverden's new chart, were by the Czar's orders communicated to the royal academy of ſciences at Paris.

is only to be relied on, so far as it agrees with the accounts he has given us. Ptolemy, and even Herodotus, knew, that the Caspian was surrounded on all sides by land, without any communication with other seas or visible efflux; whence some thought, that it ought to be called a lake rather than a sea. However, Strabo [b], Pliny [c], Pomponius Mela [d], and Arrian [e] wrote, that it was joined either to the Indian or northern ocean; but we are well assured by experience, that they were mistaken. They were perhaps led into this error by such as had made their observations when the Wolga had overflowed its banks, at which time it appears more like a sea than a river, covering with its waters, as a modern traveller informs us [f], the whole country to the extent of sixty miles: This they might easily have mistaken for a strait joining the Caspian to the ocean. Ptolemy, though here in the right, was greatly mistaken as to his extent from east to west, for which he allows twenty three degrees and a half; whereas it does not exceed, where widest, three degrees forty-two minutes, and, where narrowest, one degree twenty-two minues. He likewise places it three degrees more to the north than it really is. These mistakes were observed, and in some degree redressed, by Abu'lfeda, an Arabian prince and able geographer, who in 1320, discovered the situation of the Caspian, and abridged its extent by a third of what Ptolemy had allowed it. By this alteration its length was no more in longitude, as Ptolemy had placed it, but in latitude, as it truly is. Abu'lfeda's observations were greatly improved by Bourrous, Olearius, and Jenkinson; but the true dimensions of this sea were not ascertained till the late observations, by which we are assured, that it lies between the thirty-seventh and forty-eighth degrees of north latitude, and does not exceed three degrees forty-two minutes in its greatest longitude, which gives it a quite different figure from what it is represented to have in the maps of Ptolemy, and in the writings of other antient geographers.

THE Persians called this sea Kulsum, or the sea of Astracan; the Russians the sea of Gaulenskoi; the Georgians Sowa; the Armenians Soof. It receives the river Wolga, ga, which itſelf is like a ſea, and near two hundred others into its boſom, and yet is never increaſed or diminiſhed, nor obſerved to ebb or flow. This conſtant plentitude has given riſe to many ſpeculations, and ſome have imagined, that it muſt neceſſarily have ſome ſubterraneous communication either with the Black ſea, though a hundred leagues diſtant, or with the Perſian gulph, which is near two hundred leagues diſtance from it. Father Avril, a modern traveller, ſeems to favour the latter opinion, and alledges this proof to confirm it, viz. that over-againſt the province of Xilan in Perſia there are two immenſe whirlpools, which with an incredible rapidity and frightful noiſe ſuck in and ſwallow whatever comes near them, and conſequently a cavity in the earth. He adds, that every year, about the latter end of the autumn, a great quantity of willow leaves are obſerved floating on the water by thoſe who inhabit the coaſts of the Perſian gulf. As this tree is no where to be found near the Perſian gulf, and on the other hand the coaſts of the Caſpian towards the province of Xilan are covered with them, there muſt be ſome ſubterraneous intercourſe between theſe two ſeas. This obſervation, if true, is a ſtrong proof of ſome ſecret communication between theſe two bodies of water, the leaves being conveyed through ſubterraneous fiſſures from the one to the other. But ſince the opinion, aſſerting a communication between the Caſpian and other ſeas, has been taken up chiefly on this conſideration, that as ſo many and ſo large rivers diſembogue themſelves into it, and are conſtantly pouring in their waters, in proceſs of time the channel would be filled, and run over, unleſs there were ſubterraneous fiſſures and meatuſes, through which it might evacuate its ſuperfluous waters into the ocean; as the opinion, I ſay, of the Caſpian's being joined, either immediately, or by means of ſome other ſea, to the ocean, is chiefly founded on this, it will be worth while to conſider how the Caſpian or any other ſea comes to loſe ſo much water as it receives, either from rain or rivers flowing into it (F). The water of this

ſea

(F) There are two hypotheſes among philoſophers, one is, that the waters of the ſea are conveyed by ſubterraneous conduits to the ſprings of rivers, and that in draining through the fiſſures they loſe their ſaltneſs: the other is, that it happens by the vapours that are drawn up from its ſurface. The former is now

ſea is ſalt as the waters of other ſeas, notwithſtanding the opinion

now rejected by moſt, it being next to impoſſible to explain how the water of the ocean, being more depreſſed than the very mouths of the rivers, can come up to their ſprings, which are moſtly on high mountains. But in the latter hypotheſis we have no occaſion to explain this, nor to prevent the increaſe of the ſeas, by ſupplying the ſprings with their waters.

The quantity of vapours drawn up from the ſea was tried by Dr. Halley, who made the following computation (13). By an experiment made with great care he found, that water, ſalted to the ſame degree as common ſea-water, and heated to the ſame degree of the air in our hotteſt ſummers, exhales the thickneſs of a ſixtieth part of an inch in two hours. Whence it appears, that a bulk of water a tenth part of an inch high will be exhaled into vapours in twelve hours. So that if the ſuperficies of the whole ocean, or part of it, be known, it may alſo be known, how much water ariſes from it in vapours every day, ſuppoſing the water to be equally hot with the air in ſummer. According to what has been laid down, a ſuperficies of ten ſquare inches emits daily a cubic inch of water; one ſquare foot, half a pint; a ſquare, whoſe ſides are four feet, one gallon; a ſquare mile 6914 tuns; and one degree ſquare (conſiſting, as we may ſuppoſe, of 69 Engliſh miles) 33 millions of tuns. The ſame author ſuppoſes the Mediterranean to be about forty degrees long and four broad, allowances being made for the places where it is broader by thoſe where it is narrower, ſo that its whole ſuperficies may be accounted 160 ſquare degrees; and conſequently the whole Mediterranean muſt loſe in vapours, according to the foreſtated proportion, in a ſummer's day, at leaſt 5280 millions of tuns. What quantity of water is dried off the ſurface by the winds cannot poſſibly be reduced to any rule; but we may venture to ſay, that it ſometimes exceeds even what is evaporated by the heat of the ſun.

Now to compare this quantity of water with that which is carried daily into the ſea, the above-mentioned writer obſerves, that the Mediterranean, for inſtance, receives theſe nine conſiderable rivers, the Iberus, the Rhone, the Tiber, the Po, the Danube, the Neiſter, the Boryſthenes, the Tanais, and the Nile, all the reſt being of no great note. Each of theſe rivers he ſuppoſes to be ten times greater than the Thames, not that any of them is near ſo great, but to comprehend with them all the ſmall rivulets that fall into the ſame ſea.

He likewiſe ſuppoſes the river Thames at Kingſton-bridge, where the tide ſeldom reaches, to be in breadth about a hundred yards, opinion of the antients to the contrary; its freſhneſs in ſome parts near the ſhore is owing to the rivers that diſcharge themſelves into it. It is neither of a different colour from other ſeas, nor without various ſorts of fiſh, as Olearius, an eye-witneſs, aſſures us, and thereby diſproves the opinion of the antients, who believed it to be of a blackiſh colour, and to have but one kind of fiſh and that of a monſtrous form. We ſhall conclude this ſection with obſerving, that the ignorance of the antients with relation to this ſea, or lake, as ſome are pleaſed to call it, may be urged as an argument of the imperfect knowledge they had of theſe northern parts of the Perſian empire, and at the ſame time warn us not to depend on their accounts, unleſs vouched by the teſtimonies of modern travellers, who have, with far greater care and better ſucceſs ſurveyed thoſe remote regions.

(13) Philoſ. Tranſact. No. 189. p. 366.

yards, and in depth three; and the water to run two miles an hour. If therefore the breadth of the water, a hundred yards be multiplied by three, the depth, and the product three hundred ſquare yards by forty eight miles, 84480 yards, which the water runs every day, the product will be 25344000 cubic yards of water, or 20300000 tuns, that are carried every day into the ſea.

Now, if each of the aforeſaid rivers yield ten times as much water as the Thames, it will follow, that each of them carries every day into the ſea 303 millions of tuns, and the whole nine 1827 millions of tuns in a day.

However, this is but little more than one third of what is proved to be raiſed in vapours out of the Mediterranean, in twelve hours time. Hence it appears that the Mediterranean, the Caſpian, or any other ſea, is ſo far from increaſing or overflowing by the rivers it receives, that in a ſhort time it would rather be evaporated and drained, unleſs the vapours that it exhales returned upon it in dew or rain.

Scaliger and others were of opinion, that the Caſpian is joined by ſome ſubterraneous intercourſe with the Euxine, but he alledges no reaſon to prove his opinion; however, this may be urged for it, that the Euxine ſea, as Mr. Dugdale obſerves (14), is continually diſgorging a large quantity of water through the Boſphorus, and ſome think, that it is more than the rivers pour into it; wherefore it may, for ought we know, be ſupplied from the Caſpian.

SECT. II.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, religion, cuſtoms, arts, learning, and trade of the Medes.

WE have already derived the Medes [g] from Madai, the third ſon of Japhet, and thereby put them upon the level with the moſt antient nations (G). In proceſs of time ſeveral

[g] Vide ſupra, p. 445.

(G) Some will have Madai to have been the progenitor of the Macedonians, and not of the Medes, grounding their opinion upon the two following reaſons: 1. That the Madai, or Medes, are not mentioned in ſcripture till the latter ages. 2. That this ſituation removes Madai too far from the reſt of his brethren, and takes him out of his general lot, which was the iſles of the Gentiles, to put him into that of Shem. But to the firſt it may be anſwered, that the Jews always retained the name, and it is plain they made uſe of it as ſoon as they had occaſion: to the ſecond, that, according to our hypotheſis, the plantations of the ſons of Japhet were contiguous; for the weſtern Media was bounded on the north by the river Ros or Aras, to which, as we have elſewhere obſerved (15), the dominion of Magog extended; and perhaps thoſe words, by theſe were the iſles of the Gentiles divided (16), relate only to Javan and his ſons, and not to Gomer and his poſterity, the paſſages in ſcripture where theſe laſt are mentioned requiring a ſenſe which places them on the continent. A modern writer (17) produces ſeveral authorities to ſhew, that there were a people in Macedonia called Medi, or Mœdi, and a tract called the Medic regions in the borders of Pæonia; but this can only prove the Macedonians to be a later colony of Madai. To ſay, that the Macedonians are the offspring of Madai, becauſe the word Macedonia is compounded of Madai and ſeveral colonies from the adjacent countries ſettled among them, being invited thither by the fruitfulneſs of the ſoil, which gave riſe to the various tribes into which the people was antiently divided. The Greek writers will have them to be originally Perſians [h], and Herodotus tells us, that they were called Arians till the time of Medus the ſon of Medea, from whom they took the name of Medians. But our etymology is far more natural, and confirmed by the authority of all the antient interpreters, who by Madai in ſcripture conſtantly underſtand the Medes [i].

THEIR government was originally monarchical, like that of the other primitive nations, and they ſeem to have had kings of their own in the earlieſt times. Some are of opinion, that one of the four kings, who in the days of Abraham invaded the ſouthern coaſts of Canaan, reigned in Media. Lactantius mentions one Hydaſpes, who, according to him, reigned long before the Medes were conquered by the Aſſyrians; and Diodorus tells us, that Pharnus king of the Medes was with his ſeven ſons defeated and taken priſoner by Ninus, in the very beginning of the Aſſyrian empire [k]. But his accounts of thoſe early times are no-ways to be relied on, it being plain, both from ſcripture and from the authority of the moſt judicious among the ancient and modern chronologers, that the Aſſyrian empire did not begin till the days of Pul; whereas Cteſias and his copiſt Diodorus have made this empire as old as the flood, and given us the names of all the Aſſyrian kings from Belus and his feigned ſon Ninus to Sardanapalus. According to the ſucceſſion of Aſſyrian kings, as ſtated by them, that empire continued about 1360 years, whereas Herodotus tells us, that it laſted only five hundred years, and even his numbers are all too long. They were firſt brought under the

and Cettim, is relying too much, as every one muſt allow, on the authoriry of a forced etymology; and we may as well adopt the etymology of thoſe who derive the Tartars from an ancient tribe among the Medes called Tapuri, which they change into Taturi, and that into Tartari (18).

the Assyrian yoke by Pul, according to us the founder of that monarchy, or by his immediate successor Tiglath-Pilaser. Till that time they were probably governed by their own kings, as were, according to holy writ, the neighbouring nations (H). In the reign of Sennacherib they shook off the Assyrian yoke, and fell into an anarchy, which lasted till the reign of Dejoces, as we shall see in the following section. Their kings, after the revolt, were quite absolute, and controuled by no law; nay, they claimed an equal respect with the gods themselves, the custom of adoring kings, which afterwards prevailed in Persia, having first taken rise among the Medes [l].

Manners and customs.

The Medes were once a very warlike race, as will appear from their history; but in process of time became one of the most effeminate nations of Asia, especially after they were reduced by Cyrus. In war they used the same armour as the Persians, whom they are said to have taught the art of war, especially to handle with dexterity the bow, and likewise to have been the first that introduced luxury into Persia, which at last occasioned the downfal of that empire, as it had before been the ruin of the Medes [m]. Polygamy was so far from being disreputable among them, that they were bound by law to maintain at least seven wives, and whose women were looked upon with contempt, who had fewer than five husbands [n]. In war they poisoned their arrows with a bituminous liquor called Naphta, whereof there was plenty in Media, Persia, and Assyria. The arrow being steeped (H) In the time of the judges of Israel, Mesopotamia was under its own king (19); the king of Zobah reigned on both sides the Euphrates till he was conquered by David (20). The kingdoms of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Philistia, Zidon, Damascus, and Hamath the great, were governed by their own princes and so were those of Haran, or Carrhæ, and Sepharvaim in Mesopotamia, and Calneh near Bagdad. As these petty kingdoms were ruled by their own princes, so was Media till the time of Pul, who subdued most of the above-mentiond nations. Media may have been subdued by Nimrod, who was a great warrior; but his empire, if he founded any, was of short continuance, it being the custom in those early times for every father to divide his territories amongst his sons.

ſteeped in it, and ſhot from a ſlack bow (for a ſwift and violent motion took off from its virtue), burnt the fleſh with ſuch violence, that water rather encreaſed than extinguiſhed the malignant flame; duſt alone could put a ſtop to it, and in ſome degree allay the unſpeakable pain it occaſioned. They are likewiſe ſaid to have bred a number of large dogs, to whom they uſed to throw the bodies of their friends, parents, and relations, when at the point of death, looking upon it as diſhonourable to die in their beds, or be laid in the ground [o].

SOME writers charge the Medes with being the firſt authors of making eunuchs [p]; but others impute this execrable practice to the Perſians, and even name the place where it firſt took riſe [q] (I). The cuſtom of confirming alliances with [o] Bardeſan. apud Euſeb. præpar. evan. l. 6. c. 8. [p] Athenæus, l. 12. [q] Stephan. de urbib.

(I) Stephanus tells us, that this cuſtom was firſt introduced in a city of Perſia call Spada, whence he derives the Latin word Spado, ſignifying an eunuch, But both he and thoſe who charge the Medes with introducing ſuch an unnatural practice are certainly miſtaken, ſince we find eunuchs in vogue among the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, long before ſuch a piece of wanton luxury can be ſuppoſed to have been known either to the Medes or Perſians. Joſephus (21) acquaints us, that Nebuchadonoſor commanded the moſt comely youths among the captive Jews to be made eunuchs; and Hierom is of opinion, that the prophet Daniel and his three companions were eunuchs (22). Ammianus Marcellinus will have Simeramis to be the firſt contriver of eunuchiſm (23). What prompted them thus to maim and deform nature, Petronius Arbiter will tell us:

> Perſarum ritu male pubeſcentibus annis
> Subripuere viros; exſectaque viſcera ferro
> In venerem fregere: atque ut fuga mobilis ævi, > Circumſcripta mora, properantes differat annos (24).

And Claudian,

> Seu Perſica ferro
> Luxuries vetuit naſci lanuginis umbram (25).

Eunuchs have always been in great repute among the eaſtern princes, and were anciently employed in the moſt momentous affairs;

with the blood of the contracting parties, which obtained among all the eastern nations, even in the Roman times, was originally peculiar to the Medes [r]. When they were to strike alliances they used to tie together with a hard bandage the thumbs of their right hands, till the blood, starting to the extremities, was by a slight cut discharged. This they mutually sucked, and a league thus confirmed was esteemed most awful, as mysteriously solemnized with the blood of the parties [s].

Laws, religion, &c.

THE laws and religion of the Medes were much the same with those of the Persians: wherefore, we shall defer what may be said of them, till we come to the history of the Persians from the oriental writers. We shall only observe here, that when a law was once enacted, it was not in the kings power to repeal it, or to reverse a decree he had once made; whence the laws of the Medes are in holy writ called unchangeable [t]. A modern writer tells us, that those only were admitted to the crown who were remarkable above others for their strength or stature [u]. But that there was no such law is plain from the regular succession of father and son, without regard to any personal quality whatsoever. Some law of this nature may perhaps have obtained among them before they were conquered by the Assyrians; but we are quite in the dark as to the state of Media in those early times.

THEY paid their kings the greatest respect imaginable, putting them upon the level even with their gods. They thought it an high offence either to spit or laugh in their presence [w]. They honoured their sovereign with the haughty title of great king, or king of kings, which stile was afterwards adopted by the Persian monarchs and their proud succeſſors the Parthians, whose king, even in the time of the emperor Constantius, retained that title, writing himself in a letter to affairs; all the places of the greatest trust being filled by men, if men we may call them, of their species. To them the Persian kings commited, not only the guard of their own persons (26), but likewise the education of their children, it being a custom among them to put the heir apparent of the crown, so soon as he was born, into the hands of eunuchs, under whose tuition he remained till he attained the seventh year of his age (27).

to that prince, Sapor king of kings, allied to the ſtars, brother to the ſun and moon, &c. [x]. When they appeared in public, which ſeldom happened, they were always attended by muſic, and numerous guards conſiſting of the prime nobility, their wives, children, and concubines being part of their retinue, even when they headed their armies in the field.

As to their arts, learning, and trade, we are quite in the dark; their country abounded with many excellent productions, as well for the uſe of the inhabitants themſelves, as for foreign exportation; but whether they ever applied themſelves to trade, is what we find no-where recorded: neither do we find any mention made by the antients of their arts or ſciences. During the ſhort time of their monarchy, they ſeem to have applied their thoughts only to warlike exerciſes, namely to the arts of managing a horſe and handling the bow, in which they ſurpaſſed all other nations, the Median horſe being no leſs celebrated by the antients, than were in after ages the Perſian foot [y]. Thus much have we thought neceſſary to ſay apart of the Medes and their country: what elſe may be added thereto we defer to the ſections of the following chapter, which will be no more than a continuation of this.

SECT. III.

The Chronology of the Medes to the tranſlation of their empire to the Perſians.

CTESIAS and his followers have darkened the chronology of the Aſſyrians, Babylonians, and Medes with ſuch enormous anachroniſms, that 'tis no eaſy matter to aſcertain the riſe or fall of thoſe potent monarchies. To proceed with all the clearneſs and perſpicuity ſo perplexed a ſubject will allow, we ſhall diſtinguiſh in the chronology of the Medes three remarkable occurrences, which will give birth to as many different æras, namely, the recovery of their liberty after they had been ſubdued by the Aſſyrians, the riſe of their kingdom after ſome years of anarchy, and the

the beginning of their empire, which, as it is agreed on all hands, roſe on the ruins of the Aſſyrian monarchy. The firſt king of the Aſſyrians, who brought the Medes under ſubjection, was either Pul, according to us the founder of the Aſſyrian empire [z], or his immediate ſucceſſor Tiglath-pileſer. For this prince having, at the prayers of Ahaz king of Judah, made war upon Rezin king of Damaſcus, and reduced that city, tranſplanted the inhabitants to Kir in Media [a]. Whence it is plain, that the Medes were then ſubject to the Aſſyrians; and conſequently, that they muſt have been ſubdued either in the reign of Pul, or ſoon after the acceſſion of Tiglath-pileſer to the crown; for the empire of the Aſſyrians was already grown great, and the God of Iſrael ſtirred up the ſpirit of Pul king of Aſſyria, and the ſpirit of Tiglath-pileſer king of Aſſyria [b] to make war. Pul makes his firſt appearance in ſcripture during the reign of Menahem king of Iſrael, in the year of the flood 2228, before Chriſt 771. Tiglath-pileſer, who is ſuppoſed to have been his ſon, ſucceeded him in the year of the flood 2259, before Chriſt 740. That there was no Aſſyrian empire before the days of Pul, is plain, both from ſcripture (K) and from

[b] 2 Chron. xxviii.

(K) None of the prophets, who preceeded Pul, and foretold the calamities which the people of Iſrael afterwards ſuffered from the Aſſyrians, ever name that nation, but only ſpeak of a people that is to be raiſed up againſt Iſrael. Thus Jonah, who propheſied about ſixty years before the reign of Pul, mentions indeed the king of Niniveh, but no where that of Aſſyria. The city of Niniveh had ſome time before ſhaken off the Egyptian yoke, and was governed by a king of its own; but his territories were of (28) no great extent, as is plain from the ſaid prophecies; neither was he called king of Aſſyria, but only of Niniveh. Amos propheſied about ten or twenty years before Pul began his conqueſts, and foretold, that God would raiſe up a nation that ſhould humble the houſe of Iſrael, at that time elated with their ſucceſs againſt Damaſcus and Hamath; but what nation he names not. In the prophecies of Iſaiah, Ezekiel, Hoſea, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, and Zachariah, which were written after the Aſſyrian monarchy was grown powerful, it is openly from the particular hiſtories of each kingdom, ſo that the Medes could not be ſubdued by them before the time we have mentioned. From the time of Pul or Tiglath-pileſer they continued in ſubjection to the Aſſyrians till the reign of Sennacherib, which began about the year of the flood 2286, before Chriſt 713, while Hezekiah was king of Judah (L). They took advantage, it is likely, of his long and diſtant abſence, or of the ſudden ſlaughter of his army near Egypt, and ſhaking off the yoke, defended their liberty by dint of arms againſt the power of the Aſſyrians, which was now in its decline. Theſe are the troubles which prevented openly named on all occaſions. Therefore, as Jonah and Amos, who propheſied before the reign of Pul, never mention the Aſſyrians, and thoſe who flouriſhed after his reign, frequently do; it is pretty plain, that in the days of the former the Aſſyrians made no great figure in the world, but were to be raiſed up againſt Iſrael; and by conſequence roſe in the days of Pul, who is the firſt upon record that fulfilled the prophecy of Amos, threatening Syria and Iſrael with captivity. Beſides, we know from ſcripture, that till Pul made his appearance on this ſide of the Euphrates, not only Syria and Egypt, but many other neighbouring nations were governed by their own kings. Seſac and Memnon were great conquerors, and ſubdued Chaldea, Aſſyria, Media, Perſia, Bactria, &c. but in their hiſtories no mention is made of any oppoſition made to them by an Aſſyrian empire then ſtanding. Homer mentions Bacchus and Memnon kings of Egypt and Perſia, but knew nothing of an Aſſyrian empire (29). Whence it is manifeſt, that the Aſſyrian empire, which Cteſias makes as antient as the flood, did not begin till the reign of Pul, who reduced all the abovementioned nations.

(L) That in the time of Shalmaneſer they were ſubject to the Aſſyrians, is plain, from ſcripture, where that prince is ſaid to have tranſplanted the inhabitants of Samaria to Halah and Habor, and the other cities of the Medes (30). In this captivity Tobit was carried from his native country, the city of Thiſbe, in the tribe of Nepthali, with Anna his wife and Tobias his ſon, into Aſſyria; but the reſt of his brethren were carried into Media, and planted there, particularly Gabael in Rages, and Raguel in Ecbatan (31), which proves Media to have been in the time of Shalmaneſer ſubject to the king of Aſſyria.

(29) See Sir Iſaac Newton's Chronol. of ancient kingdoms, p. 365. & ſeq. (30) 2 Kings xvii. (31) Tobit, c. 1.

prevented Tobit from going into Media, according to his custom [c]; and they must have happened about the latter end of Sennacherib's reign, that is, about the year of the flood 2289, before Christ 710. The Medes, having thus rescued their country from the Assyrian bondage, fell into a kind of anarchy, as Herodotus informs us [d], which gave Esar-haddon or Assar-hadon, who succeeded Sennacherib, and was both a valorous and fortunate prince, an opportunity of bringing great part of Media, if not the whole country, anew under subjection. How long the anarchy may have lasted is hard to determine. Some include the years of the anarchy in the fifty-three which Dejoces, their first king, is said to have reigned. It cannot have lasted above twenty or thirty years; for Phraortes, who succeeded Dejoces, and reigned, according to Herodotus [e], twenty-two years, was slain by Chyniladan, or Nabuchodonosor, in the twelfth year of his reign. Nabuchodonosor came to the crown in the year of the flood 2351, before Christ 648; so that Phraortes was killed eighty-six years after the Medes had revolted from the Assyrians; from which number, if we subtract the fifty-three of Dejoces and twenty-two of Phraortes, eleven years will remain for the anarchy. But the reign of Dejoces, who, as we read in Herodotus [f], had some time exercised the office of judge before he was chosen king, is evidently too long, and we may safely abridge it of fifteen or twenty years, adding them to the anarchy. From the beginning of the reign of Dejoces to the destruction of Niniveh, which happened in the second year of the reign of Jehoiakim (M), that is in the year of the flood 2390, before

(M) In the reign of Josiah, when Zephaniah prophesied, Niniveh and the kingdom of Assyria were standing, for that prophet foretells their fall (32). Not long after Pharaoh Necho led his army to the Euphrates against the king of Assyria, and on his march slew Josiah (33); whence it is manifest, that the last king of Assyria was still alive. But in the third and fourth year of Jehoiakim, the successor of Josiah, we find Assuerus king of the Medes and Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, leading their armies before Chriſt 609, Media may be properly ſtiled a kingdom. From the deſtruction of Niniveh, we may date the riſe of the empire of the Medes; for the conquerors, that is, Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares, having ſhared the Aſſyrian empire, they both became very powerful, and reduced moſt of the neighbouring nations, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory. Their empire laſted till the taking of Babylon; for Xenophon [g] tells us, that, after the reduction of that city, Cyrus went to the king of the Medes at Ecbatan, and ſucceeded him in the kingdom, which is entirely agreeable to ſcripture. Babylon was taken ſeventy-three years after the deſtruction of Niniveh, to which we may add the two years that Darius the Mede reigned over that city, ſo that the empire of the Medes laſted ſeventy-five years, at the period of which the Perſian empire took riſe in Cyrus. That Darius the Mede reigned over Babylon, is unqueſtionable; for he is ſaid in ſcripture [h], to have introduced there the immutable laws of the Medes and Perſians. In his reign the Medes are ever placed before the Perſians [i]; as the Perſians in the reign of Cyrus and his ſucceſſors are always ſet before the Medes [k].

BEFORE we proceed to the hiſtory of the Medes, we ſhall exhibit the ſeries of their kings according to ſeveral authors.

armies againſt the king of Egypt, and taking from him what he had newly taken from the Aſſyrians. Whence we may conclude, that Niniveh was already reduced, and the conqueſt of Aſſyria completed. We cannot therefore err above a year or two, if we place the deſtruction of Niniveh and fall of the Aſſyrian empire, in the ſecond year of Jehoiakim.

THIS table contains what may be called two original catalogues, thoſe of Herodotus and Diodorus, as he has borrowed it from Cteſias. The other two are compounded of both, with an equal deference to each, as far as they go. By what we have laid down above, and confirmed with the authority of holy writ, it appears, that Herodotus is not greatly miſtaken in his numbers. Cteſias enumerates ten kings of Media, whoſe names are different from thoſe mentioned by Herodotus, except the laſt whom he calls Aſtyages, and Diodorus names Apandas. The reigns of the eight firſt amount to 282 years, and thoſe of the two laſt are omitted; but if they be ſupplied from Herodotus, they will come very near Juſtin's account, who ſuppoſes the kings of Media to have reigned 350 years. Euſebius and Syncellus differ as widely from Cteſias as from each other, except in the name and reign of the firſt king Arbaces, and beſides omit two of his ten. They pay a greater deference to Herodotus, whom they copy more exactly, at leaſt with regard to his names, tho' they vary ſometimes very materially from him in the lengths of the reigns. As for the variations between them, it would be a fruitleſs taſk to enquire into them, eſpecially, as it muſt appear, from what we have ſaid already, that they are both groſly miſtaken (N).

(N) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus and Appian have followed Herodotus, with regard to the duration of the empires of the Aſſyrians and Medes. The former acquaints us (34), that the empire of the Medes was ruined in the fourth generation; and the latter (35), that the three great empires of the Aſſyrians, Medes, and Perſians, to the time of Alexander, did not laſt 900 years. The Perſian empire continued 230 years, from the firſt year of the fifty-fifth Olympiad to the ſecond of the hundred and twelfth. To this number if we add 670 years, which the empires of the Aſſyrians and Medes laſted according to Herodotus, the ſum will be but 900 years. Theſe are the ſentiments of the moſt judicious among the profane hiſtorians, concerning the duration of the empires of the Aſſyrians and Medes. But on the other ſide, Cephaleon, Alexander Polyhiſtor, Diodorus Siculus, Caſtor, Trogus Pompeius, and his abbreviator Juſtin, with Velleius Paterculus, have followed Cteſias in his catalogue of the Aſſyrian kings. Among chriſtian chronologers Africanus, Euſebius, and Syncellus have inſerted in their catalogues the kings of the Aſſyrians and Medes mentioned by Cteſias; though, in order to adjuſt their chronologies,

SECT. IV.

The History of the Medes.

WE ſhall begin with what we may call the fabulous hiſtory of the Medes, being extracted from Cteſias, his ogies, they have ſometimes abridged, and ſometimes encreaſed, heir number.

If the empire of the Medes continued 352 years, as it muſt have done according to Cteſias, if we ſupply the reigns of the two laſt kings in his catalogue from Euſebius or Syncellus, it muſt be ſuppoſed, that after the empire of the Aſſyrians was deſtroyed by Arbaces, there were no Aſſyrian kings either at Niniveh or Babylon, and that the Medes were ſole maſters of Aſia. But this ſuppoſition is evidently repugnant both to ſacred and profane hiſtory. If we conſult the ſcripture, we ſhall find that the Aſſyrian empire was never more potent than after this pretended deſtruction of Niniveh. The prophet Jonah, who flouriſhed in the reigns of Azariah king of Judah and Jeroboam king of Iſrael, was ſent to preach repentance to Niniveh, about eighty years after the ſuppoſed reign of Arbaces, and Niniveh was then a great city, three days journey long; it had a king of its own, and was ſo populous as to contain above 120,000 children, not yet come to the reaſon (36). Could a city, which had been reduced to a heap of rubbiſh but eighty years before, grow to ſuch a pitch of grandeur in ſo ſhort a time? For according to the prophet's account, it was then in the meridian of its ſplendor. Thoſe who follow Cteſias have been forced to own, that Niniveh was twice taken and deſtroyed, viz. in the time of king Jehoſaphat by Arbaces, and three hundred years after in the reign of Joſiah. But the ſcripture, Joſephus, and all profane writers, allow only one deſolation of that great city. The latter differ only in the time when it happened. Herodotus places it at the end of the reign of Cyaxares, and Polyhiſtor does not much differ from him. Cteſias and his followers refer it to the reign of Arbaces three hundred years earlier. That the latter are miſtaken is manifeſt from holy writ, as we have already ſhewn. We may add, that this powerful empire, which Arbaces founded, muſt ſoon have decayed, which is inconſiſtent with the ſyſtem of Cteſias and the authors that follow him. The Aſſyrian empire muſt have raiſed itſelf his tranſcriber Diodorus, and their followers. According to theſe, the Medes were governed by kings of their own before the early days of Ninus, the pretended founder of the Aſſyrian monarchy. For when Ninus invaded this country, it was ruled by one Pharnus, who, being worſted by that mighty warrior, was taken priſoner, and crucified with his wife and ſeven childern [1]. Thus Media was reduced to a province of the Aſſyrian empire, and remained ſubject to the ſucceſſors of Ninus till the time of Sardanapalus. However, they made ſome attempts towards the recovery of their liberty, during the regency of Semiramis and minority of her ſon Ninyas; for ſhe is ſaid to have invaded Media with a mighty army, and encamping near a mountain called Bagiſtan, to have made a pleaſant garden twelve furlongs in compaſs. The mountain was dedicated to Jupiter, and had on one ſide craggy rocks ſeventeen furlongs high, which ſhe aſcended on the packs and loads carried by the beaſts of burthen that followed her army. In the lower part of this rock ſhe cauſed her ſtatue to be hewn out, and a hundred of her guards attending her. From hence ſhe marched to Chaon a city of Media, where, on the top of a very lofty rock, ſhe formed another pleaſant garden, with ſtately edifices, whence ſhe might behold the beauties of the ſpot, and her whole army encamped in the plain. From Chaon ſhe advanced towards Ecbatan, and on her march itſelf again, Niniveh muſt have been rebuilt, and have paſt from an heap of rubbiſh to an extraordinary pitch of grandeur, and all this in the ſpace of 70 or 80 years. For after this pretended deſtruction of Niniveh and the Aſſyrian empire, we find in ſcripture a ſeries of Aſſyrian kings and a potent empire not ſubject to the Medes. Beſides, if we compare the deſtruction of Niniveh deſcribed by Cteſias with that we read in ſcripture and Polyhiſtor, they will plainly appear to be the ſame. Cteſias ſays, that Sardanapalus burnt himſelf, his concubines, and treaſures; Polyhiſtor writes the ſame of Sarac. Cteſias tells us, that the Medes in conjunction with the Babylonians deſtroyed Niniveh; and the ſame is confirmed by Polyhiſtor and the ſacred penmen. Cteſias writes, that the city was laid in aſhes, and the citizens diſperſed; and this is what we read in the prophets. Such a conformity of facts, joined to the former evidences, amount to a full conviction, that there was but one deſtruction of the Aſſyrian empire, and one deſolation of Niniveh.

march levelled mount Zarcæum, which was many furlongs in extent, filled up vallies, and in ſpite of nature opened a plain and eaſy way to Ecbatan, which to our author's time was called Semiramis's road [m]. Theſe extraordinary works, as they were laſting monuments of her conqueſts, not only over the rebellious Medes, but nature itſelf, kept that nation in a ſervile ſubjection and dependency to the reign of Sardanapalus, that is, for the ſpace of near 1400 years (O), when Arbaces governor of Media and Beleſis governor of Babylon put an end to the Aſſyrian empire, in the manner we have related in the hiſtory of Aſſyria [n].

Arbaces. ARBACES, the firſt king of the Medes after their revolt, is repreſented as a prince of great generoſity and gratitude, as appears from his behaviour towards the mean-ſpirited Babylonian Beleſis, who by a pious fraud bereaved him of the immenſe treaures, that were concealed in the aſhes and ruins of the Aſſyrian palace, as we have elſewhere related at length [o]. He is ſaid to have ſubdued all Aſia, and to have reigned twenty-eight years.

Mandauces. HE was ſucceeded by his ſon Mandauces, who reigned fifty years, but did nothing worthy of notice, being himſelf, as he is repreſented, a prince of a peaceable diſpoſition, and his ſubjects deſirous of ſome reſpite, after the violent ſtruggles for liberty and empire in the laſt reign.

Soſarmus. SOSARMUS appears next, by ſome called Medidus; he reigned thirty years, and this is all we find of him upon record.

Artias. ARTIAS, by ſome called Artycas, by others Cardiccas, reigned next. From his name ſome, who indulge conjectures, argue him to have been a great and glorious prince, the word Arti or Arta in the compoſition of his name denoting greatneſs, as it does, according to the interpretation of

[m] Diodor. Sicul. l. 2. c. 1. &ſeq.
[n] Vol. iv. p. 255.
[o] Vol. iv. p. 366.

(O) Theſe ſtories are of a piece with what the ſame author relates elſewhere, viz. that the army of Ninus conſiſted of two millions of men, at a time when the earth was not yet well peopled; that Semiramis employed two millions of workmen in the building of Babylon; that ſhe diſpoſed in the ſhape of elephants the hides of three hundred thouſand black oxen, and other fables of the like nature, forged by Cteſias, and gravely related by Diodorus.

of Herodotus, in that of the Persian Artaxerxes. All we can say is, that if he performed great things, his exploits have been long since buried in oblivion. There is a great disagreement among authors concerning the length of his reign, some allowing him fifty years, others thirty, and some only thirteen.

Arbianes. AFTER him came Arbianes, in whose reign a war broke out between the Medes and Cadusians, who, at the instigation of one Parsodes rising up in arms, shook off the yoke which they had for some time groaned under. Parsodes was by birth a Persian, but the chief favourite and prime minister of Arbianes king of the Medes, whom he served with great fidelity, till being highly provoked at a sentence pronounced against him by that prince, he fled with three thousand foot and a thousand horse to the Cadusians, where he not only withdrew his obedience to Arbianes, but stirred up the whole nation to a revolt. The Cadusians, being thus encouraged to stand up for their liberties, committed the whole management of the war to Parsodes, as the most proper person on all accounts to appear at the head of their army. But before he took the field Arbianes died after a reign of twenty years. If this Parsodes be the Persondas mentioned by Nicolas of Damascus, we have already related what induced him to revolt [p].

Artæus. ARTÆUS came to the crown, while the Cadusians were making vast preparations to invade his kingdom, and understanding, that Parsodes was advancing towards the frontiers at the head of 200,000 men, he thought it high time to curb the insolence of the rebels. And accordingly having raised an army of 800,000 men, marched out with this mighty host, and engaged the rebels; but was most shamefully routed and forced to save himself by flight, leaving 50,000 of his men dead in the field of battle. Upon this victory the Cadusians proclaimed Parsodes their king, who accepting the crown inspired his new subjects with that irreconcileable hatred which he had conceived against the Medes, and laid the foundations of a perpetual enmity between the two nations. He is said to have solemnly conjured the Cadusians, even on his death-bed, to wage an eternal war with the Medes, and never lay down their arms till that odious nation was utterly abolished, loading at the same time with curses and imprecations such of

of his ſucceſſors, as ever ſhould upon any terms whatſoever be reconciled with them. In purſuance of this, as we may call it, his laſt will, the Caduſians watched all opportunities of haraſſing the Medes with inroads, and doing them what miſchief they could, till the empire was tranſferred from them to the Perſians [q].

Artynes. Artibarnas.

After Artæus reigned Artynes twenty two years, but did nothing worth mentioning. He was ſucceeded by Artibarnas or Artabanus, in whoſe reign the Parthians revolting put themſelves under the protection of the Sacæ, a people inhabiting mount Hæmodus, which ſeparates India from Scythia. This occaſioned a war of many years between the Medes and the Sacæ, who were then governed by queen Zanara, a heroin of great proweſs. That princeſs is no leſs celebrated by our author for her courage and conduct in war, than for her beauty. She had, according to him, reſcued her country from the tyranny of the neighbouring princes, civilized her ſubjects, and inured them to military diſcipline and the toils of war. After ſhe had for many years haraſſed the Medes, a peace was at laſt concluded between her and Artynes on the following conditions; that the Parthians ſhould ſubmit to the Medes, and the Sacæ and Medes quietly enjoy what they poſſeſſed at the beginning of the war [r] (P).

Hitherto we have dwelt on what we may ſafely call the fabulous hiſtory of the Medes, theſe kings, or moſt of them, being no where found but in the books, or rather in

[r] Diodor. Sicul. l. 2. c. 3.

(P) This queen was, according to our author, another Semiramis. She excelled all of her own ſex in beauty, and was inferior to none of the other in courage and wiſdom; ſhe built many cities, made conſiderable conqueſts, and raiſed the obſcure nation of the Sacæ to a great pitch of glory. Whence her ſubjects, in gratitude for the many advantages they enjoyed by her means, erected her a monument after her death of vaſt dimenſions, being three furlongs in breadth, and on the top of which was built a pyramid of a furlong in height. Upon this pyramid ſhe was repreſented by a golden coloſſus, and adored by her ſubjects as a goddeſs (37).

(37) Diodor. Sicul. l. 2. c. 3.

in the imagination, of Cteſias, which was very fertile in the production of monſters. We now come to the genuine hiſtory of Media, as it has been tranſmitted to us by authors of a quite different character.

The genuine hiſtory of the Medes.

THE Medes, having thrown off the Aſſyrian yoke in the reign of Sennacherib, lived ſome time without a king, but were again brought under ſubjection by one of their own country, whoſe name was Dejoces. He is repreſented as a ſubtle, crafty man, and aiming at abſolute power, and is ſaid to have compaſſed his deſign in the following manner. The Medes were at that time divided into ſeveral diſtricts, in one of which lived Dejoces, who, ſeeing all kind of licentiouſneſs prevail over the whole country, applied himſelf to the adminiſtration of juſtice with great zeal and diligence. The Medes of the ſame diſtrict, obſerving the equity of his conduct, choſe him for their judge; and he, aſpiring to the ſovereign power, performed that office with all poſſible regard to juſtice. By this means he not only acquired a great reputation in his own diſtrict, but among thoſe alſo of the other diviſions, who looked upon him as the only impartial judge in the whole nation. Whence ſuch as thought themſelves injured by unjuſt ſentences reſorted from all parts to him in order to obtain juſtice; till at laſt no one would commit the deciſion of a difference to any other perſon. At laſt the numbers of thoſe, who applied to him for redreſs, increaſing in proportion to the great fame of his equity, and the whole care of adminiſtering juſtice being devolved upon him, he unexpectedly abſented himſelf from the place where he uſed to determine differences, declaring, he would no longer perform that office, and ſubmitting it to the judgment of his countrymen, whether it was reaſonable, that he ſhould neglect his private affairs to attend thoſe of the public. Hereupon rapine and all manner of wickedneſs prevailing to ſuch a degree, that it was not ſafe to live in the country, the Medes called a general aſſembly of the whole nation, to deliberate on the means of reforming the abuſes that were daily becoming more frequent. Upon this occaſion thoſe who were in the intereſt of Dejoces obſerved, that if a ſtop was not put to the growth of the diſorders that had already overſpread the whole land, they ſhould ſoon be obliged to abandon their country to a foreign enemy. They adviſed therefore their countrymen to appoint a king of their own nation, as the only expedient that could reſcue

their

their country from impending ruin. Their discourse was received with general approbation, and a king was resolved on. Their next deliberation was concerning the person whom they should prefer to the crown, when Dejoces was named to the sovereignty, and with universal applause placed on the throne [s].

The Medes resolve to create a king.

Year of the flood 2300. Before Christ 699.

THUS was Dejoces created king; and being vested with supreme power he threw off the mask, and commenced tyrant; though the rigor he practised may perhaps have been absolutely necessary to bring the nation, after some years of anarchy, into any order or discipline.

THE first thing he did after his promotion was to command his new subjects to build him a palace suitable to his dignity, and to appoint him guards for the safety of his person. He was obeyed, and on the ground which he chose a strong and stately fabric was erected for his ordinary residence. At the same time he was allowed to chuse for his guard out of the whole nation such as he thought most proper for that trust. Thus settled on the throne, he united the several districts, into which the Medes had been divided during the anarchy, and turned his thoughts towards building a strong city, which might be the metropolis of his new kingdom. To this also his subjects submitted, and the famous city of Ecbatan was built, pursuant to his orders and directions, a city, which in process of time became very famous in those parts (Q).

DEJOCES,

[s] Herodot. l. 1. c. 95.

(Q) Ecbatan in scripture (38) is called Achmetha; by Ctesias and Stephanus Agbatan. In the book of Judith it is said to have been built by Arphaxad king of the Medes; but whether Arphaxad and Dejoces be but two names of one and the same person is what we shall examine hereafter. Dr. Prideaux (39) tells us, upon what ground we know not, that Ecbatan was only enlarged and beautified by Dejoces. He will perhaps have Arbaces, whom by an unaccountable inadvertency he confounds with Tiglath-pileser, to be the founder of it. Josephus (40) acquaints us, that the decree of Cyrus, about rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, was found at Ecbatan, which plainly proves DEJOCES, thus lodged in a magnificent and well-defended city, enacted the following laws, to be observed by all his subjects of what rank soever. That no one should be admitted to his presence; but transact all things by his servants and ministers; that none should be allowed even to see him, that were not immediately of his household, and that for any, who attended him, to laugh or spit in his presence should be accounted a great indecency, and contrary to the respect which is due to a sovereign. These laws he enjoined, that the malecontents might have no opportunity of putting in execution any evil design against his person, not doubting, but those, who were debarred from seeing him, would be easily induced to think him of a superior nature to themselves. Though he kept himself thus concealed from the eyes of the people, yet he was informed of every thing that happened in his dominions, maintaining to that end many emissaries in the provinces of his government, who brought him a minute account of every transaction. By this means no crime escaped either the knowledge of the prince, or the rigor of the law; and the punishment, thus treading upon the heals of the offence, kept the wicked in awe, and stemmed the course of violence and injustice.

DEJOCES was so entirely taken up in civilizing his unpolished subjects, and making laws, that he never engaged in any enterprize against his neighbours, though his reign was very long, for he is said to have ruled over the whole nation of the Medes fifty three years [t].

HE was succeeded by his son Phraortes, who being of a warlike temper, and not satisfied with the kingdom of Media, which his father had left him, invaded Persia, and is said to have brought that nation under subjection to the Medes [u]. But we are inclined to disagree with our author in this particular, and ascribe the conquest of Persia; not to Phraortes, but to his son and successor Cyaxares (P). However, proves it to be the same with the Achmetha of scripture, where according to Ezra (41) the said decree was lodged.

(P) It seems plain from scripture, that the Persians were not subdued by the Medes, till after the taking of Niniveh, by the joint

(41) Ezra, ubi supra.

However, he ſubdued ſeveral of the neighbouring nations, attacking one after another, till he made himſelf maſter of almoſt all the upper Aſia, lying between mount Taurus and the river Halys. Elated with the good ſucceſs, that attended his army, at length he invaded Aſſyria, which was now in its decline, and greatly weakened by the revolt of many nations, who, following the example of the Medes, had withdrawn their obedience from the Aſſyrians. Nebuchadonoſor, or Chyniladan, at that time king of Aſſyria, raiſed a powerful army to oppoſe the conqueror, ſummoning the whole force of his wide-ſpreading dominions, and inviting other joint forces of Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which the Jews reckon to be the firſt of Nebuchadnezzar, God threatened by his prophet (42), that he would take all the families of the north and Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, and bring them againſt Judea, and againſt the nations round about, and utterly deſtroy thoſe nations, and make them an aſtoniſhment and laſting deſolation, and cauſe them all to drink the wine-cup of his fury; and in particular, he names the kings of Judah and Egypt, and thoſe of Edom, and Moab, and Ammon, and Tyre, and all the kings of Elam, and all the kings of the Medes, &c. Where it is to be obſerved, that, in numbering the nations which were to be ſubdued, he omits the Aſſyrians, who muſt conſequently have been already conquered, and names the kings of Elam or Perſia, as diſtinct from thoſe of the Medes, whence we may conclude, that the Perſians were not yet ſubdued by the Medes. In the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, that is in the ninth year of Nebuchadnezzar, the ſame prophet foretold the approaching conqueſt of Perſia by the Medes and their confederates: Behold, ſays he, I will break the bow of Elam——upon Elam will I bring the four winds from the four quarters of heaven——and there ſhall be no nation where the outcaſts of Elam ſhall not come——I will ſet my throne in Elam, and will deſtroy from thence the king and the princes, ſaith the Lord; but it ſhall come to paſs in the latter days (that is in the reign of Cyrus) that I will bring again the captivity of Elam ſaith the Lord (43).

From theſe words of the prophet it is manifeſt, that in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, nay, after the deſtruction of Niniveh, the Perſians had kings of their own, and conſequently could not be ſubdued by Phraortes, who was killed before Nebuchadnezzar came to the crown of Babylon (44).

other nations of the east to his assistance. His embassadors were received every where with contempt, and no one people obeyed the summons. However, Nabuchadonosor took the field with what force he had, and he, joining battle with Phraortes in the great plain of Ragau, defeated his cavalry, overturned his chariots, and pursuing the king to the adjacent mountains, whither he had made his retreat, took him prisoner and put him to death. After this victory he entered Media, took many strong holds without opposition, and pushing on his conquests stormed the famous city of Ecbatan, and levelled it with the ground. Flushed beyond measure by this, perhaps more than expected, success, he returned to Niniveh, where he feasted and revelled with those who attended him in this expedition, for the space of 120 days [w]. Phraortes reigned twenty-two years, and was slain near the beginning of the reign of Josiah; for this war was made after Phœnice, Moab, Ammon, and Egypt had been conquered by Assarhadon, and when the Jews were newly returned from captivity, as is plain from the book of Judith * (Q) *.

(Q) As Arphaxad is said, in the first book of Judith (45), to have been killed by Nabuchadonosor, and likewise to have built Ecbatan, most writers will have Dejoces, the founder of Ecbatan, and not Phraortes, to have carried on this unsuccessful war, and lost his life in the mountains of Ragau (46). The passage in Judith, that Arphaxad built a very strong city, and called it Ecbatan, has led them astray, and made them conclude, that Arphaxad must be Dejoces who was certainly the founder of that city. But the Greek text of Judith, which the vulgate translates ædificavit, built, says only, that Arphaxad added new buildings to Ecbatan, Επωκοδόμησε επὶ Εκβατάνοις. And what can be more natural, than that the son should finish so great a work, which the father had begun, but had not been able to perfect.

Upon the death of Phraortes his son Cyaxares was placed on the throne. He was a brave and enterprizing prince, and indeed such a man was, then more than ever, wanting to save the nation from impending slavery, most part of the kingdom being possessed by the Assyrians. Having settled himself well in his kingdom, and brought his troops under good discipline (R), he soon recovered what the Assyrians had taken after their victory in the plains of Ragau. What he had next at heart was to avenge the death of his father by the destruction of Niniveh. And accordingly, having assembled all his forces, he marched out with a design to treat that city, as Nabuchadonosor had treated the metropolis of Media. The Assyrians meeting him on the frontiers, with the remains only of that great army which had been destroyed before Bethulia, an engagement ensued, wherein the former were defeated and driven into Niniveh. Cyaxares, pursuing his victory, laid close siege to the city; but was soon obliged to give over the enterprize, and employ his troops in the defence of his own kingdom [y].

Cyaxares I. Year of the Flood, 2375 Year before Christ, 624.

A formidable army of Scythians, having driven the Cimmerians out of Europe, were in full march in pursuit of their flying enemies, and ready to enter Media. They were come from the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, and commanded by king Madyes the son of Protothyas. This Madyes can be no other than Indathyrsus the Scythian, who invaded Asia, as Strabo informs us [z], and, having laid waste great part of that country, advanced to the confines

636. The cause of this variation seems to be this, in the history of the Assyrians they compute the reign of Dejoces from the revolt of the Medes, including the twelve years of anarchy, but here in the history of the Medes, they allow the fifty one years reign to Dejoces, exclusive of the anarchy.

(R) He was the first, according to Herodotus (47), that marshalled the people of Asia into distinct bodies of lances, cavalry, and archers; whereas, before his time, horse, and foot, and pikemen, and archers engaged promiscuously. But this we can hardly believe, when we consider, that the nations of this part of Asia were engaged in continual wars, and consequently must have been more experienced in the military art.

confines of Egypt. Cyaxares no ſooner heard of their march, but, breaking up the ſiege of Niniveh, he advanced with all his forces againſt them. The two armies engaged, and the Medes, though encouraged by the example of their king, who on that occaſion gave proofs of an extraordinary valour, were utterly routed. The conquerors having no other enemy to contend with, over-ran not only all Media, but the greater part of upper Aſia(S). From thence they extended their conqueſts

(S) Euſebius tells us, that Cyaxares took the city of Niniveh before the Scythians invaded Media. But as Herodotus and all the profane hiſtorians, without exception, unanimouſly agree in this point, that the Scythians broke into Media while he was beſieging Niniveh, and obliged him to withdraw his troops from thence to the defence of his own kingdom, we have choſe to follow them, rather than Euſebius, whoſe authors we are unacquainted with. Touching the expedition of the Scythians Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians, being driven out by the Scythians, invaded and laid waſte part of Aſia, and that the Scythians, not ſatisfied with driving them from their habitations, followed them, we know not why, into far diſtant countries, and in this purſuit fell, as it were by chance, upon Media, while the Cimmerians were gone another way into Lydia. As the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians were all of the ſame race and nation, which Goropius Becanus learnedly proves in his Amazonica, we are inclined to think, this pretended expulſion of the Cimmerians was nothing elſe but the ſending of a colony into Aſia, with an army of Scythians to aſſiſt them in acquiring new ſettlements, and eſtabliſhing plantations, in a foreign country. For though the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians were but one people, yet they were diſtinguiſhed in name according to their different tribes, profeſſions, and perhaps dialects. Such another expedition the ſame people undertook ſome ages after, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they came from the countries bordering on the lake Mæotis; they were then likewiſe aſſiſted, as Plutarch informs us (48), by their neighbours the Scythians, and had in their army above 300,000 men, beſides a great multitude of women and children. They wandered over many countries, bearing all down before them, and finally deſigning to ſettle in Italy, divided into ſeveral bodies to facilitate their paſſage thither; but were all cut off in three battles by the Roman conſuls. Mere neceſſity obliged theſe poor nations to infeſt their neighbours and expoſe themſelves to ſuch dangers.

conquests into Syria as far as the confines of Egypt. But there Psammiticus king of that country, meeting them in person, prevailed upon the barbarians, what by entreaties, what by presents, to proceed no farther, and thereby saved his country from the heavy oppression which his neighbours groaned under [a]. In this expedition the Scythians possessed themselves

For their country abounding more in men than in substance, and shut up in the north by intolerable cold, they were compelled to discharge their overgrown numbers on the southern countries, and drive others, right or wrong, from their possessions, as being entitled to what others had, because they had nothing themselves. As they were a warlike race and inured to hardships, they generally prevailed, their next neighbours giving them a free passage, that they might the sooner get rid of them; others supplying them with provisions and guides to lead them to more wealthy countries.

The first body of these, mentioned by Herodotus, took the way of the Euxine sea, which they had on their left, as mount Caucasus on their right. They passed through Colchis and Pontus, and arriving in Paphlagonia fortified the promontory, whereon Sinope was afterwards built by the Greeks. Here they left under a strong guard such as were unfit for service and great part of their baggage, and then continued their march into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, having now no mountains or deep rivers to stop their march; for the Iris and the Halys they had already passed. We shall give an account of their wars with the Lydians in the history of Lydia.

As the Cimmerians held their course westerly along the shore of the Euxine sea, so the Scythians took the other way, and having the Caspian on their left passed between that sea and the Caucasus, thro' Albania, Colthene, and other obscure nations, till they came into Media, where they engaged and routed Cyaxares, as we have said. To this overthrow of Cyaxares Tremellius and Junius refer that prophecy of Nahum; He (that is Cyaxares besieging Niniveh) shall recount his worthies; they shall stumble in their walk (that is in the walk or perambulation of the Scythians, whose coming at this time into Asia may well be so termed, since it was rather a passing thro' than any settlement; for in the short space of twenty eight years they over-ran, conquered, and lost Media, Assyria, and all upper Asia): they shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defence shall be prepared, that is, they shall hasten to Niniveh, as if they intended to deliver it from the Medes besieging it (49).

themſelves of the city of Bethſheam, in the territories of the tribe of Manaſſeh, on this ſide of the Jordan, and held it as long as they continued in Aſia; whence it was called Scythopolis, or the city of the Scythians [b]. On their return from Egypt, as they paſſed through the land of the Philiſtines, ſome of the ſtragglers plundered the temple of Venus at Aſcalon, which was believed the moſt ancient in the world dedicated to that goddeſs. To avenge this attempt the goddeſs is ſaid to have inflicted on thoſe, that were concerned in the ſacrilege, and their poſterity, the hemorrhoids; which ſhews, that the Philiſtines ſtill preſerved the memory of what they had formerly ſuffered on account of the ark. For from that time they looked, it ſeems, on this diſtemper, as a puniſhment from heaven attending ſuch ſacrilegious attempts, and therefore, in charging the Scythians with this crime, took care not to omit in their hiſtories the puniſhment, which their anceſtors had ſuffered for one of the ſame nature [c].

THE Scythians were for the ſpace of twenty-eight years maſters of the upper Aſia, namely the two Armenians, Cappadocia, Pontus, Colchis, Iberia, and great part of Lydia. Cyaxares finding it impracticable to get rid of his troubleſome gueſts by open force, reſolved to try what might be effected by ſtratagem. And accordingly invited the greateſt part of them to a general feaſt which was given in every family. Each landlord made his gueſts drink, and in that condition were the Scythians maſſacred, and the kingdom delivered from a long and cruel bondage (T). The Medes

(T) We do not find, that the Scythians, who eſcaped this bloody feaſt, raiſed any commotions in Media, or that they ever afterwards, either in revenge of this treachery, or on any other pretence, troubled the Medes. Which ſeems the more ſtrange, as we know from Herodotus himſelf (50), that the army returning out of Media was very ſtrong and numerous, and met with greater oppoſition at home than they had found abroad. We are therefore apt to believe, that the ſtratagem of Cyaxares was attended with leſs bloodſhed than is commonly ſuppoſed. For by cutting off the chief men among them, he may have brought the others to reaſonable terms. It is not improbable, that, in

(50) Herodot. l. 3. c. 1.

Medes then repoſſeſſed themſelves of the provinces they had loſt, and once more extended their empire to the banks of the Halys, which was their antient boundary weſtward [c].

Cyaxares, having thus freed his country from the oppreſſion of the Scythians, found himſelf ſoon after engaged in a war with the Lydians. The occaſion of this war is thus related by Herodotus [d]. Upon a ſedition which happened among the Scythian Nomades, a party of them made their eſcape into Media, where they were not only entertained with great humanity by Cyaxares, but entruſted with the education of divers youths, whom they were to inſtruct in the uſe of the bow and the Scythian language. Theſe ſtrangers went frequently to hunt, and were ever accuſtomed to return with ſome game. But one day happening to come home with empty hands, Cyaxares, whom they uſed daily to preſent with ſome veniſon, treated them with moſt opprobrious language; this they reſented, and agreed among themſelves to kill one of the youths committed to their care, dreſs his fleſh like veniſon, and ſerve it up to Cyaxares and his gueſts. They executed what they propoſed, and then flying to Sardis implored the protection of Halyattes king of Lydia. Cyaxares immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to demand the Scythians, but they not being able to prevail with the king of Lydia to deliver them up, a war of five years enſued between the two nations with various ſucceſs (U). The battle fought in the the ſpace of twenty-eight years, many had ſettled themſelves ſo well, that they were willing to live in ſubjection to Cyaxares, provided, they might peaceably enjoy what they poſſeſſed; many, who had enriched themſelves with the ſpoils of Aſia, were willing to return home to their wives and families with the booty, and ſuch as were not pleaſed with either of thoſe two courſes might join their companions in Lydia and Parthia, or ſeek their fortunes in other countries. We read in ſcripture, that all the families of the north were with Nebuchadnezzar; which may well be underſtood of thoſe northern nations ſettling in his dominions, after they were driven out of Media and Lydia. 'Tis certain, that after this expulſion of the Scythians, the Babylonians, who never before had been a match for the Egyptians, in all engagements with them carried the day; which may be aſcribed to this new addition of forces.

(U) This Herodotus delivers as the occaſion of a war between the Medes and Lydians; the one king demanding the fugitives, and the ſixth year of this war was very remarkable on account of a total eclipſe of the ſun, which happened during the engagement, and had been foretold by Thales the Mileſian (W). * The Medes and Lydians, who were then in the heat and the other refuſing to deliver up ſuch as had put themſelves under his protection. But to us, we muſt own, it does not at all ſeem probable, that the Scythians ſhould have ſheltered themſelves from their own countrymen in the dominions of either prince, conſidering how odious the Scythian name muſt at this time have been in both kingdoms. As to Cyaxares, they had particular reaſons to diſtruſt him for the treachery he had ſhewn towards their countrymen, as we have related above. Some writers are of opinion, that the Scythians, who retired into Lydia, where ſuch as had eſcaped the maſſacre in Media, and not a new colony, which ſeems moſt likely, for that univerſal ſlaughter being freſh in their memories, it is very unlikely, that other Scythians would have come to ſettle in the very country where it had been lately perpetrated.

(W) That this eclipſe fell out while Cyaxares the father of Aſtyages and Halyattes the father of Crœſus were engaged in a battle, is confirmed by Endemus in his aſtronomical hiſtory. Pliny likewiſe (51), in ſpeaking of eclipſes, acquaints us, that Thales the Mileſian was the firſt that foretold an eclipſe of the ſun; and adds, that the eclipſe foretold by him happened in the fourth year of the forty-eighth olympiad in the reign of Halyattes (and not of Aſtyages as we find in ſome modern copies) 170 years after the foundation of Rome. Clemens Alexandrinus (52) places this battle and the ecclipſe of the ſun in the 50th olympiad, wherein he differs widely from Endemus, whom he quotes and pretends to follow. The time aſſigned both by him and Pliny does not ſuit with the reign of Cyaxares, but with that of his ſucceſſor Aſtyages. The ſun and moon tables of Ptolemy, which are the ſame with thoſe of Hipparchus, place this eclipſe on the fourth year of the 44th olympiad, and on the 4th day of the Egyptian month Pacon (or the 20th day of September, according to the Julian calendar, on a ſunday) three hours, thirty-five minutes before noon. But according to Sir Iſaac Newton it fell upon the 28th of May, in the year of Nabonaſſar 163, forty-ſeven years before the taking of Babylon (53), and 585 before Chriſt.

* Sir Iſaac Newton and Dr. Prideaux place the Lydian peace after the deſtruction of Niniveh, and the former fixes the eclipſe of the ſun, that happened during the engagement on the 28th heat of the battle, equally terrified with this unforeseen event, which they looked upon as a sign of the anger of the gods, immediately retreated, and soon after concluded a peace by the mediation of Labynetus, that is, Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and Syennesis, king of Cilicia. This peace was strengthened by a marriage between Aryenis, the daughter of Halyattes, and Astyages, the eldest son of Cyaxares. Of which marriage was born the ensuing year Cyaxares, who in the book of Daniel is called Darius the Mede [e].

Cyaxares's first care, as soon as he was disengaged from the Lydian war, was to resume the siege of Niniveh, which the irruption of the Scythians had obliged him to raise. Having with this view entered into a strait alliance with Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and confirmed it by a marriage btweeen that prince and his daughter Amyite (X), he returned in conjunction with the Babylonians before Niniveh, took the of May, 585 years before Christ. Cyaxares, according to the computation of the authors in this volume, began his reign 624 years before Christ; allow him to have taken up his two first years in preparations of war and besieging of Niniveh; the Scythians held Asia 28 years; Niniveh was taken in the second or third year after the expulsion of the Scythians and in the sixth year after the destruction of Niniveh, and the 39 year of the reign of Cyaxares the battle was fought with the Lydians, the year in which Sir Isaac Newton places the eclipse. This being the most intricate part of chronology in this volume, it seemed proper to make these observations.

(X) Some will have Amyite to be the daughter of Astyages and grand-daughter of Cyaxares. But Astyages could not at that time have a daughter marriageable, and Nebuchadenezzar, had he married her, must have been at the time of his death at least eighty five years old, and Astyages much older. In the book of Tobit the destruction of Niniveh is ascribed to Ahasuerus king of Media and Nabuchadonosor king of Babylon. This Ahasuerus can be no other than Cyaxares, who, as Sir Isaac Newton shews, was called Achsuerus, Assuerus, Oxyares, Axeres, prince Axeres or Cy-Axeres, the word Cy signifying a prince in the Median language (54). By Nabuchadonosor is meant Nebuchadnezzar the place, ſlew Sarac the king, and levelled that mighty city with the ground. Thus was the proud metropolis of the Aſſyrian empire laid in aſhes, purſuant to the prophecies uttered above a hundred years before. * Wo to the bloody, it is all full of lies and robbery; he that daſhes in pieces is come up before thy face [f]. The Lord cometh to avenge the cruelties done to Jacob and to Iſrael. I hear already the noiſe of the whip, and the noiſe of the rattling of the wheels, and of the prancing horſes and of the jumping chariots. The horſeman lifteth up both the bright ſword and the glittering ſpear. The ſhield of his mighty men is made red: the valiant men are in ſcarlet. They ſhall ſeem like torches, they ſhall run like the lightning. God is jealous; the Lord revengeth, and is furious. The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burnt at his preſence: who can ſtand before his indignation; and who can abide in the fierceneſs of his anger?

buchadnezzar the great, both theſe names being given by the Babylonians to their kings, as that of Pharaoh was by the Egyptians to theirs. That Nabopollaſſar the father of Nebuchadnezzar was called by theſe names, is plain from the book of the Rabbies, and from Joſephus. R. Juchaſin calls Nebuchadnezzar the ſon of Nebuchadnezzar (55); and David Ganz calls the father Nebuchadnezzar the firſt, and the ſon of Nebuchadnezzar the ſecond (56). Joſephus in ſpeaking of Nabopallaſſar ſometimes calls him Nabuchadonoſor (57) and ſometimes Nabulaſſar (59), which is a contradiction of Nabopallaſſar. It is certain, that the books of Tobit and Judith cannot be reconciled with any other antient writings, ſacred or profane, relating to thoſe times, unleſs we allow the name of Nabuchadonoſor to have been common to the kings of Babylon.

* The authors fix the taking of Niniveh in the year 609 before Chriſt. Cyaxares began to reign in the year 624 before Chriſt, according to the computation of the authors here in the hiſtory of the Medes; the Scythians poſſeſſed Aſia 28 years, and ſix years he was engaged in a war with the Lydians, therefore Niniveh could not be taken before the year 589 before Chriſt; ſo that if they are right as to the deſtruction of Niniveh, Phraortes's death could not happen later than the year 636 as placed in the firſt volume; but this is contrary to Sir Iſaac Newton's calculation of the eclipſe and the former obſervations.

THIS victory with the deſtruction of Niniveh the Jews aſcribe to the Chaldeans; the Greek to the Medes; Tobit, Polyhiſtor, Joſephus, and Cteſias to both. It gave a beginning to the great ſucceſſes of Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares, and laid the foundation of the two collateral empires, as we may call them, of the Medes and Babylonians, which roſe on the ruins of the Aſſyrian monarchy.

AFTER the reduction of Niniveh, the two conquerors proſecuting their victory led the confederate army againſt Pharaoh-Neco king of Egypt, who had ſometime before routed the king of Aſſyria and taken Carchemiſh. Pharaoh met them near the Euphrates, was defeated, and forced to abandon whatever he had formerly taken from the Aſſyrians [h]; for what once belonged to them, Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar looked upon now as theirs by right of conqueſt (Z). After this victory they ſeized on the important place of Carſhemiſh, reduced all Cœle-Syria and Phœnice, and then with an army of Babylonians, Medes, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, to the number of 10,000 chariots, 180,000 foot, and 120,000 horſe, invaded and laid waſte Samaria, Galilee, Scythopolis, &c. and at laſt beſieged that is 48 of our miles. The other twelve miles make it, as Strabo ſays, much bigger than Babylon. We have already fixed the æra of its deſtruction.

(Z) From this time the Jewiſh computation of the years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign begins, that is, from the end of the third year of Jehoiakim, and therefore the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Nebuchanezzar was by his father taken into partnerſhip of the empire, is according to the Jews (64) the firſt year of his reign. But according to the Babylonian computation his reign is not reckoned to begin till his father's death, which happened two years after. As both theſe computations are found in ſcripture, we thought it neceſſary to ſay thus much in order to reconcile them. We muſt further obſerve, that as the Chaldean aſtronomers counted the reigns of their kings by the years of Nabonaſſar, beginning with the month Thoth; ſo the Jews counted the reigns of their kings by the years of Moſes, beginning with the month Niſan; inſomuch, that if any king began his reign but a few days before the firſt of the month Niſan, thoſe few days were reckoned a whole year, and the beginning of this month was accounted the beginning of his ſecond year (65).

beſieged Jeruſalem, and took king Jehoiakim priſoner [i]. Enriched with the ſpoils of the conquered nations, they divided their forces, Nebuchadnezzar purſuing his conqueſts in the weſt, and Cyaxares falling upon the Aſſyrian provinces of Armenia, Pontus, and Cappadocia, which he ſubdued with great ſlaughter of the inhabitants. After this they united their forces once more, and by the reduction of Perſis (A) and Suſiana accompliſhed the conqueſt of the Aſſyrian empire.

The prophet Ezekiel [k] enumerates the chief nations that were ſubdued and ſlaughtered by the two conquerors, Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar. Aſhur is there and all her company, viz. in Hades or the lower parts of the earth, where the dead bodies lay buried, his graves are about him: all of them ſlain, fallen by the ſword, which cauſed their terror in the land of the living. There is Elam, and all her multitude round about her grave, all of them ſlain, fallen by the ſword, which are gone down uncircumciſed into the nether parts of the earth, which cauſed their terror in the land of the living: yet have the born their ſhame with them that go down into the pit.——There is Meſhech, Tubal, and all her multitude (viz. the Scythians); her graves are round about him: all of them uncircumciſed, ſlain by the ſword, though they cauſed their terror in the land of the living.—There is Edom, *her kings, and all her princes, which with their might, are laid by them that were ſlain by the ſword. (A) While the Aſſyrians reigned at Niniveh, Perſia was divided into ſeveral kingdoms. Amongſt others there was a kingdom of Elam, which flouriſhed in the days of Hezekiah, Manaſſah, Joſiah, and Jehoiakim, kings of Judah, and fell in the reign of Zedekiah (66). This kingdom ſeems to have been very powerful, and to have waged war with the king of Touran or Scythia, beyond the river Oxus, with various ſucceſs, and at length to have been ſubdued by the Medes and Babylonians; which confirms what we have ſaid before, viz. that the Perſians were not ſubdued by Phraortes, as Herodotus would have it, but by Cyaxares, in conjunction with the Babylonians.

the ſlain. By the princes of the north are meant ſuch as were on the north of Judæa, namely the princes of Armenia and Cappadocia, who fell in the wars which Cyaxares waged in reducing thoſe provinces after the deſtruction of Niniveh.

CYAXARES, having thus erected the kingdom of Media into a powerful empire, and ſhared the new acquiſitions with his Babylonian ally, died in the fortieth year of his reign [l], and was ſucceeded by his ſon.

ASTYAGES, who in ſcripture is called Ahaſuerus [m]. This prince had by Aryenis, the daughter of Halyattes king of Lydia, Cyaxares II. called in ſcripture Darius the Mede, and who was ſixty two years old at the taking of Babylon [n]. The ſame year that Cyaxares was born, Aſtyages gave his daughter Mandane, whom he had by a former wife, to Cambyſes a Perſian; from which marriage ſprung Cyrus, the founder of the Perſian monarch, and the reſtorer of the Jews to their country, to their temple, and former condition. He was born but one year after the birth of his uncle Cyaxares, and conſequently was in the ſixty-firſt year of his age when Babylon was taken. Whether his father Cambyſes was king of Perſia, as Xenophon [o] would have it, or only a nobleman of that country, as we read in Herodotus [p], is what we ſhall examine hereafter. Though the reign of Aſtyages was very long, having laſted thirty-five years [p], yet we find no particulars of it recorded in hiſtory, except his repulſing the Babylonians, who, under the conduct of Evil-merodach the ſon of Nebuchadnezzar, had made an inroad into his country, as we have related at length elſewhere [q]. The victory, which he gained on this occaſion, was in great part owing to the valour and conduct of Cyrus, who attended his grandfather in this expedition, and, though at that time but ſixteen years of age, ſignalized himſelf in a very particular manner [r], purſuing the Babylonian with great ſlaughter quite home to his own borders. This raſh, and ſeemingly unjuſt, undertaking of Evil-merodach laid the foundation of that animoſity between the Medes and Babylonians, which ended at laſt in the ruin of Babylon. From hence we may infer, that Evil-merodach was not the ſon of of Nebuchadnezzar by Amyite the daughter of Cyaxares, or, as others will have it, of Astyages, but by some other wife; it not being likely, that they would have thus engaged in war against each other had they been so nearly related. It is still more improbable, that Evil-merodach should undertake such hostilities while he was on the point of marrying Nitocris, as is commonly reported, who was by birth a Mede.

Cyaxares II. Year after the Flood, 2450. Before Christ 549.

Astyages after a reign of thirty-five years was succeeded by his son Cyaxares, uncle to Cyrus. This prince was scarce warm on his throne, when he found himself engaged in a bloody war with Nerigliſſar, who had murdered Evil-merodach and usurped the crown of Babylon. This war was carried on with great slaughter on both sides by Cyaxares and Cyrus, during the reigns of the usurper Nerigliſſar, of his son Laborosoarchod, and of Nabonadius, the son of Evil-merodach and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose time Babylon was taken, and the Babylonian empire utterly ruined. But as this war, which lasted twenty years, was entirely managed by Cyrus, we shall defer the relating of these important events, till the reign of that great and glorious prince, which, as he was the founder of the Persian monarchy, we shall reserve to the history of that empire.

As for Cyaxares, he is said in scripture to have taken the kingdom, after the reduction of Babylon and death of Belshazzar [s]. For Cyrus, as long as his uncle lived, held the empire only in partnership with him, though he had entirely acquired it by his own valour. Nay, so far did he carry his complaisance, that he let him enjoy the first rank. But, the command of the army and the whole management of affairs being vested in Cyrus, he alone was looked upon as the supreme governor of the empire. And hence it is, that in Ptolemy's canon no notice is taken of Cyaxares, but immediately after the death of Nabonadius, Cyrus is placed there as the next successor. But that a Mede reigned at Babylon after the death of Nabonadius, or, as Herodotus calls him Labynetus, the last Babylonian king in the canon, is plain both from Xenophon [t] and scripture: the former tells us, that, after the taking of Babylon, Cyrus went to the king of the Medes at Ecbatan, and succeeded him in the kingdom: and we read in scripture, that Babylon

Babylon was destroyed by the Medes [u]; by the kings of the Medes, and the captains and rulers thereof, and all the land of his dominion [x]; that the kingdom of Babylon was numbered, and finished, and broken, and given to the Medes and Persians [y]; first to the Medes under Darius, and then to the Persians under Cyrus: for Darius reigned over Babylon like a conqueror, not observing the laws of the Babylonians, but introducing the immutable laws of the conquering nations the Medes and Persians [z]. In his reign the Medes, as we have observed elsewhere, are constantly placed before the Persians [a]; as the Persians, in the reign of Cyrus and his successors, are placed before the Medes [b]; which shews, that, according to scripture, a Mede reigned at Babylon between the last Babylonish king in Ptolemy's canon and Cyrus. This king can be no other than Cyaxares, as Xenophon calls him [c], or Darius the Mede, as he is stiled by Daniel. The scripture ascribes the destruction of Babylon chiefly to Cyaxares, whereof Hierom alledges three reasons [d]; 1. because Darius or Cyaxares was the elder of the two; 2. in regard the Medes were at that time more famous than the Persians; and lastly, because the uncle ought to be preferred to the nephew. On the other hand, few of the Greek writers take any notice of Cyaxares, which we may easily account for. The Persians, desirous to magnify and extol Cyrus their countryman, gave him all the glory of that great conquest, and from them the Greeks borrowed their relations. Besides, Cyrus alone was employed in the siege of Babylon, Darius being then absent, and the confederate army under his conduct stormed the town, and put an end to the empire of Babylon. We may add, that as Darius did not reign at Babylon full two years, before the fame of this great conquest was spread abroad in distant countries, Cyrus was in the entire possession of the Babylonian empire, whence they looked upon him as the great hero, who had alone performed such extraordinary feats. But Josephus [e], who was better informed, tells us, that Darius with his ally Cyrus destroyed the kingdom of Babylon. The same author adds, that this

Darius was the son of Astyages, and that he was known to the Greeks by another name. Now if we ask the Greeks the name of Astyages's son, Xenophon [f] will tell us, that he was called Cyaxares. As for the name of Darius, it was preserved in the Darics or Stateres Darici, those famous pieces of gold, which for several ages were preferred by the eastern nations to any other coin: for we are told [g], that these were coined not by the father of Xerxes, but by an earlier Darius, the first king of the Medes and Persians that coined gold. But no Darius, more antient than the father of Xerxes, is any where said to have reigned, except this Darius, whom the scripture calls Darius the Mede.

After the reduction of Babylon, Cyaxares in concert with Cyrus settled the affairs of their new empire, dividing it into 120 provinces [h], which were governed by those who had distinguished themselves during the war. Over these governors were appointed three presidents, who were constantly to reside at court, and, receiving accounts of what happened in the several provinces, dispatch the king's orders to the immediate officers; so that these three principal ministers had the super-intendency over, and the chief administration of, the most weighty affairs of the whole kingdom. Of these Daniel was appointed the chief, an honour, which he highly deserved, not only on account of his great wisdom, but likewise of his age and consummate experience; for he had now served the kings of Babylon full sixty-five years in the quality of prime minister. As this employment advanced him to be the next person to the king, it raised no small jealousy in the other courtiers, who conspiring against him would have compassed his ruin, had he not been miraculously preserved by that providence, which is ever watching over the safety of the just. As the only thing they could lay hold of to disgrace him at court, and make him incur the king's displeasure, was the law of his God, to which they knew him inviolably attached, they prevailed with Darius to issue out a proclamation, forbidding all persons to put up any petition whatsoever to God or man, except to the king, for the space of thirty days, upon pain of being cast into the lions den. Now, as Daniel was saying ing his usual prayers, with his face turned towards Jerusalem, he was surprised, accused, and, as the laws of the Medes were unalterable, condemned to be devoured by the lions. But, being miraculously delivered from their jaws, this malicious contrivance ended in the destruction of its authors, and greatly raised, as we may well imagine, Daniel's reputation, both with Darius and Cyrus [i]. This probably happened, while Cyrus was in Syria; for after having settled his affairs at Babylon, and furnished the garisons with such troops as were necessary for the defence of the several parts of the empire, he marched with the remainder into Syria, which he brought under subjection with the other adjacent countries, extending his conquests as far as the Red sea and the confines of Æthiopia. In the mean time, Darius remained at Babylon, managed the civil affairs of the empire; and in this interval was Daniel cast into the lions den. The Darics were, perhaps, coined much about the same time out of the gold of the conquered Lydians (B). But in the reign of Cyrus we shall give a more distinct account of several particulars relating to his two predecessors Cyaxares and Astyages. We have hitherto supposed the former to be Daniel's Darius the Mede, and Nabonadius his Belshazzar; but as both these points are controverted by writers of no mean characters, before we dismiss the history of Media we must beg leave to offer some thing in our notes in defence of this our supposition, after having acquainted the reader with the sentiments of others, and the arguments they produce to support them (C).

(B) This piece, according to Dr. Bernard (67), weighed two grains more than one of our guineas; but as it had very little allay, it may be reckoned, as the proportion of gold and silver now stands with us, to have been worth twenty-five shillings.

(C) As the whole history of Babylon, from the death of Nebuchadnezzar to the reduction of that city by Cyrus, is overcast, we may say, with an impenetrable mist, writers are strangely puzzled to find out Daniel's Belshazzar among the last kings that reigned reigned there, and equally at a loſs concerning his Darius the Mede, who was in that kingdom ſucceeded by Cyrus. To proceed with all the perſpicuity we can in ſo perplexed a ſubject, we ſhall firſt produce what we read in the prophecies of Daniel relating to the laſt kings of Babylon; 2. What is allowed on all hands to be certain, and is confirmed by the concurrence of all the prophane hiſtorians; and laſtly the various opinions of modern writers, with the arguments they alledge to ſupport them.

The prophet Daniel, after mentioning what had happened in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, relates the viſions he had in the firſt and third year of Belſhazzar, and the fatal end of that prince in the following manner (68). Belſhazzar, having made a great feaſt, commanded the veſſels of gold and ſilver to be brought to him, which his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple of Jeruſalem. He drank in them, and his wives, and his concubines, and the lords of his court. In the ſame hour an hand appeared and wrote over-againſt the candleſtick on the plaiſter of the wall of the king's palace. The king, who ſaw the motion of the hand, was greatly frightened, and commanded his wiſe-men and ſooth-ſayers to be ſent for. But none of them being able to explain the writing, Daniel was immediately ſent for at the ſuggeſtion of the queen, who, on the alarm which that prodigy had occaſioned, entered the banquetting-room, and acquainted the king with the great abilitities of Daniel in ſuch matters. The prophet, after reproaching the king for profaning the holy veſſels, reads the writing, and informs him, that the words, are Mene Mene, Tekel Upharſin, which he thus interprets; Mene, God has numbered thy kingdom and finiſhed it: Tekel, thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting: Peres, thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Perſians. The prophet adds, that in that night Belſhazzar, king of the Chaldeans, was ſlain, and that Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threeſcore and two years old.

The ſame prophet informs us next (69), what order Darius eſtabliſhed in the realm, and relates the viſions which he had in the firſt year of Darius and in the third of Cyrus. It is manifeſt, that Daniel ſpeaks here of three kings ſucceeding each other to the crown of Babylon; namely, Belſhazzar, Darius the Mede, and Cyrus. The laſt is well known; but the queſtion is, who the two others were? a queſtion which we muſt endeavour to ſolve, in order to reconcile Daniel and the profane hiſtorians.

Moſt hiſtorians agree, that Nebuchadnezzar, after a reign of forty-three years, (or forty-five if we compute the two years which he reigned jointly with his father) was ſucceeded by his ſon Evil-merodach, who reigned two complete years, and was murdered murdered in the beginning of his third by Nerigliſſar. Nerigliſſar ruled four years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Laboroſoarchod, who was murdered after a ſhort reign of nine months. Nabonadius came to the crown next, and reigned ſeveſhteen years. In his time the city of Babylon was taken by Cyrus, and the empire overturned.

(68) Dan. c. v. (69) Dan. c. vi.

'Tis manifeſt, that Belſhazzar was one of the four laſt kings of Babylon, and that he was of the race of Nebuchadnezzar, ſince in ſcripture he is often called his ſon; but authors are ſtrangely puzzled to determine which of the four bears this name in Daniel's prophecies.

Sir John Marſham takes Belſhazzar to be Evil-merodach the ſon of Nebuchadnezzar; he founds his opinion on the authority of ſcripture, where Nebuchadnezzar is often called the father of Belſhazzar, and Belſhazzar the ſon of Nebuchadnezzar. Several other circumſtances concur to prove that Evil-merodach and Belſhazzar muſt be one and the ſame perſon. Beroſus (70) repreſents Evil-merodach as a lewd and wicked prince; Belſhazzar in ſcripture bears the ſame character. Beroſus tells us, that Evil-merodach was killed at a banquet by ſome of his lords (71); the ſcripture ſays that Belſhazzar was murdered at a great entertainment which he gave to 1000 of his lords. However convincing theſe proofs may ſeem and conſonant to ſcripture, yet upon examination we ſhall find them to be of no force, and quite inconſiſtent with what we read in holy-writ. The prophet Daniel, after relating what happened to Belſhazzar at his grand entertainment, adds, and in that night Belſhazzar, king of the Chaldeans, was ſlain, and Darius the Median took the kingdom. From theſe words it is plain, that immediately after the death of Belſhazzar the kingdom was given to the Medes and Perſians (73). But this did not happen upon the death of Evil-merodach, who was ſucceeded, according to Beroſus and Megaſthenes, (74) and Sir John Marſham himſelf, by Nerigliſſar his ſiſter's huſband, who was at the head of the conſpiracy againſt him. This objection ſeemed of ſuch weight to Sir John Marſham, that, in order to allude it, and maintain his aſſertion without contradicting the ſcripture, he was forced to ſuppoſe Nerigliſſar to be Darius the Mede, and the Medo-Perſian empire to have begun in him; a ſuppoſition which we ſhall confute when we come to ſpeak of Darius the Mede. To what we have alledged out of Daniel againſt our learned author's ſyſtem, we ſhall add a proof no leſs convincing from the prophet Jeremiah, who foretold (75), that all nations ſhould ſerve him, (70) Beroſ. apud Joſeph. Antiq. l. 10. c. 11. (71) Beroſus ibid. (73) Dan. v. 28, 30, 31. (74) Beroſus & Megaſthen. ubi ſupra, & apud Euſeb. de præp. evang. l. 9. (75) Jer. xxvii. 7.

him, (Nebuchadnezzar) and his ſon, and his ſon's ſon. If the kingdom was transferred from his ſon to the Medes and Perſians, as Sir John Marſham would have it, it is manifeſt, that this prophecy was never fulfilled. What the author urges in defence of his opinion, viz. that Belſhazzar was, according to ſcripture, the ſon of Nebuchadnezzar, is very true, not in a literal, but more extenſive, ſenſe, wherein any deſcendant is called ſon, and any anceſtor father; and that this is the ſtile of the ſcripture, nobody, who is converſant in the holy books, can be ignorant of.

To Evil-merodach ſucceeded, as we have hinted above, Nerigliſſar, who had married Nebuchadnezzar's daughter. We have not yet met with any author that ever aſſerted him to be Daniel's Belſhazzar. He reigned four years, and left a ſon, named Laboroſoarchod according to Beroſus, or Labaſſoaraſc, as Megaſthenes is pleaſed to call him (76). This prince came very young to the crown, and betrayed a moſt vicious turn of mind, was murdered by his own ſubjects after he had reigned only nine months (77). And this is the reaſon why he is omitted in Ptolemy's canon, where the whole year is reckoned to the king that begins it, how ſoon ſoever he dies after. If a king died but a few days after the beginning of the month Thoth, he was ſaid to have reigned that whole year; and if any other reigned in the interim, but did not live to the beginning of the ſaid month, his name was omitted in the canon. And this was the caſe of Laboroſoarchod.

But to return to our ſubject; Joſeph Scaliger (78), will have Laboroſoarchod to be Daniel's Belſhazzar, and founds his opinion on the following arguments, viz. that he was the laſt of Nebuchadnezzar's race; that he was killed by conſpirators, and that his kingdom devolved to Nabonadius or Labynitus, who was, according to Megaſthenes (79), a ſtranger to the family of Nebuchadnezzar. He adds a circumſtance out of Daniel, which he takes to be of great weight; the queen adviſed Belſhazzar to conſult Daniel; this queen, ſays he, could not be the king's wife; for his wives and concubines were at the feaſt; 'twas therefore the queen mother, which ſuits well with the character of Nebuchadnezzar's daughter, who was regent. If we object againſt this hypotheſis, that Laboroſoarchod reigned only nine months, whereas it is plain from Daniel, that Belſhazzar reigned ſome years; his anſwer is, that the ſcripture aſcribes to Laboroſoarchod or Belſhazzar the whole four years which the canon accounts to Nerigliſſar or Nericaſſolaſſar, as he is there called, becauſe Nerigliſſar reigned only as his guardian. And hence it is, that we hear of

of the firſt and third year of Belſhazzar in Daniel (80), though Laboroſoarchod reigned alone no more than nine months.

This opinion too is clogged with two unſurmountable difficulties, which, in a few words, are; 1. That it ſuppoſes Nabonadius to be Darius the Mede, a ſuppoſition which we ſhall plainly prove from holy writ to be falſe; 2. That it falſifies the prophecy of Jeremiah, promiſing the empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his ſon, and his ſon's ſon; whereas Laboroſoarchod was his daughter's ſon. This difficulty Scaliger ſeems not to be aware of, ſince he takes no notice of it, in ſolving the objections that may be brought againſt his opinion.

If neither Evil-merodach, or Nerigliſſar, nor Laboroſoarchod were Daniel's Belſhazzar, it follows, that Nabonadius was the king who in ſcripture bears that name. This will appear more plain if we conſider, 1. That he is on all hands agreed to have been the laſt of the Babylonian kings, and therefore muſt be the ſame, who in ſcripture is called Belſhazzar; for immediately after the death of Belſhazzar the kingdom was given to the Medes and Perſians (81). 2. That he was of the race of Nebuchadnezzar, for he is by Daniel often called his ſon, and in the Chronicles (82) it is ſaid, that Nebuchadnezzar and his children or off-ſpring reigned at Babylon till the kingdom of Perſia; 3. That the nations of the eaſt were to ſerve Nebuchadnezzar, and his ſon, and his ſon's ſon, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah (83); he muſt therefore have been ſucceeded by a ſon and a ſon's ſon to the crown of Babylon. Evil-merodach was his ſon, and of all the kings that reigned after him none but Belſhazzar could be his ſon's ſon. For Nerigliſſar was only his daughter's huſband, and Laboſoarchod his daughter's ſon. 4. Herodotus tells us, that the laſt king of Babylon was ſon to the celebrated queen Nitocris; and it is plain, that by Evil-merodach alone ſhe could have a ſon, who was ſon's ſon to Nebuchadnezzar. This opinion ſeems to us the leaſt perplexed with difficulties, and of all others the moſt agreeable to what we read both in ſcripture and in the profane hiſtorians; and therefore we have, upon ſecond thoughts, preferred it to that of Sir John Marſham, which we were inclined to embrace in our hiſtory of Babylon.

Authors are no leſs divided in their opinions touching Daniel's Darius the Mede, than they are about his Belſhazzar. Sir John Marſham (84), as we have hinted above, ſtands up for Nerigliſſar, and will have the Medo-Perſian empire to have begun in him. He ſuppoſes Nerigliſſar to have been a Mede, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he married the ſiſter of Evil-merodach, whoſe mother mother was a Mede. We are unwilling to quarrel with him on account of this supposition, or rather conjecture; but should be glad to know how, even in this supposition, the kingdom of Babylon was upon the death of Belshazzar, that is according to him of Evil-merodach, divided and given to the Medes and Persians; and this happened immediately upon the death of that king, as the words of the prophet plainly insinuate; thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. —— In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain. And Darius the Median took the kingdom (85). Besides, it is very plain from the whole sixth chapter of Daniel, that Darius the Mede was king of Media. He introduced the laws of the Medes and Persians, which would have been very impolitic in him, had he usurped the crown without any friends or troops to rely on, except the Babylonians, whose laws he trod under foot and annulled. And this, if we suppose him to be Neriglissar, was his case, for he introduced the laws of the Medes and Persians, was at war with both nations, and had no friends to depend upon except his own subjects, who naturally must have hated him, without any farther provocation, as a stranger, as an usurper, and as the murderer of their lawful prince. To this we may add, that if the Medo-Persian empire began in Neriglissar, Cyrus did not destroy the Babylonian but the Medo-Persian empire, which no author ever asserted. But the strongest proof, in our opinion, that can be produced against this system, and that also of Scaliger, who takes Nabonadius to be Darius the Mede, is, that Darius is said to have divided his empire into 120 provinces (86), which must be understood, not of the Babylonian, which was never so extensive, but of the Persian, empire. The latter on the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses, and of Thrace and India by Darius Hystaspis had seven other provinces added to its former number. Whence in the time of Esther it consisted of 127 provinces. If this was the division of the Persian empire in her time, the former must necessarily have been of the same empire. For if the Persian empire from India to Ethiopia contained but 127 provinces, the empire of Babylon alone, which was hardly the seventh part of the other, could not contain 120. It is not therefore to be doubted, but Darius the Mede was lord not of the Babylonian only, but of the Persian empire, which cannot be said either of Nerigliffar or Nabonadius.

Scaliger (87) maintains Nabonadius to be Daniel's Darius, adding, that he was by nation a Mede, and no ways related to Nebuchadnezzar, but freely elected king by the same Babylonian lords who put Laborosoarchod to death. That he was freely elected he endeavours to prove from the words of the prophet Daniel, saying, that he took the kingdom, which imply a free election, and not a forcible invasion. That (85) Dan. v. 28, 30, 31. (86) Dan. vi. 1. (87) Scal. de emendat. tem. l. 6.

That he was a Mede he pretends to evince from a prophecy, which Megaſthenes (88) relates Nebuchadnezzar to have uttered before his death, foretelling to the Babylonians, that a great calamity was to fall on them, which neither Belus, nor queen Beltis could avert; that a Perſian mule ſhould bring the Babylonians under ſubjection, being aſſiſted by a Mede. The Perſian mule is Cyrus, he being the iſſue of a Perſian and a Mede; the Mede, who aſſiſted him, was Nabonadius. If we aſk Scaliger how Nabonadius can be ſaid to have aſſiſted Cyrus in deſtroying the city and kingdom of Babylon, ſince he waged war with him in defence of both, and was vanquiſhed and killed; his anſwer is, that Nabonadius forwarded the deſtruction of Babylon by being conquered and ſlain, and that in this ſenſe (if in this there be any ſenſe) he concurred with Cyrus in the overturning of the Babylonian empire. This argument needs no anſwer, it is ſufficiently refuted by being related. And therefore Iſaac Voſſius well obſerves (89), that the arguments produced by Scaliger to ſupport this wild opinion are unworthy of Scaliger. As to his other proof, viz. that Darius took the kingdom; they imply, we own, no violence, on the part of Darius, who cannot properly be ſaid to have ſtormed the town or won it by dint of arms; ſeeing this was performed by Cyrus in the abſence of Darius, though with the joint forces of the Medes and Perſians. The city being thus reduced by the troops of Darius and by Cyrus his general, Darius without any farther oppoſition, took poſſeſſion of the empire as conquered by his forces. It is not by any means probable, that the Babylonian lords after murdering their kings ſhould place a Mede on the throne, while they were at open war with that nation; nor can the diviſion of the Kingdom of Babylon between the Medes and Perſians foretold by Daniel be meant of a king, who, though by nation a Mede, ſhould be elected by the Babylonians, and peaceably enjoy the kingdom till driven out by the Perſians. This diviſion muſt have been made after the empire was deſtroyed and the city taken. To conclude; this ſyſtem contradicts not only the prophecy of Daniel, touching the diviſion of the empire between the Babylonians and Medes, but that likewiſe of Jeremiah, where it is ſaid, that all nations ſhould ſerve him (Nebuchadnezzar) and his ſon, and his ſon's ſon. If Nabonadius was Darius, who of all the kings of Babylon was Nebuchadnezzar's ſon's ſon? Since Scaliger could not anſwer this queſtion, it is well done of him to take notice of it, in diſplaying and ſolving, in the beſt manner he could, ſeveral difficulties that others might have ſtarted againſt his aſſertion. He commonly adopts the ſentiments of Beroſus; but here he even forſakes him; for Beroſus tells us (90), that

Nabonadius was a Babylonian. 'Tis true, he seems afterwards concerned for having thus slighted the authority of such an unerring guide, and is inclined to make him a Babylonian. But how can this be reconciled with scripture, where he is ever stiled Darius the Median? He has a salve for this sore too: the word Median or Mede is not, says he, the national name, as the whole tribe of chronologers and interpreters, simple well-meaning men, have imagined, but the firname of Darius. But it is very unlucky for Scaliger that Daniel should begin his 9th chapter thus: In the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans. He was therefore by nation a Mede, and the son of a king of Media. But our writer seems to have been more conversant in the mingled fragments of Berosus, than in the books of the prophets, from which there is no appeal: and may, on that very account, richly deserve the compliments which in an ironical manner he bestows on such as are unwilling to adopt his wild notions. But we must forgive him, scorn and contradiction were the ingredients of his character; and had he not in most things been singular, in all peremptory, he had neither been a Scaliger, nor the son of Julius.

The difficulties we have objected against the two foregoing opinions have made other writers look for Darius the Mede elsewhere. They suppose, that there was one Darius a Mede king of Persia before Cambyses the father of Cyrus, who was also, according to Xenophon, king of Persia. This conjecture is supported by a passage out of Æschylus (91), where that poet seemingly supposes the first king of Persia there mentioned to have been a Mede, who with a powerful army took Susa. Next to him he places his son, whom he does not name, and in the third place Cyrus, whom he calls a happy prince. This Darius, who took Susa and waged war with the Babylonians, they will have to be Darius the Mede, son of Ahasuerus. This opinion is liable to one strong objection, namely, that Darius the grandfather of Cyrus could not be alive when Babylon was taken, Cyrus himself being then, as it is agreed on all hands, and we shall shew in the history of Persia, sixty-one years old.

Other writers, following Xenophon's account, maintain Cyaxares, the son of Astyages and uncle of Cyrus, to be Darius the Mede. He succeeded Astyages in the kingdom of Media, as Cyrus did Cambyses in that of Persia. These two kings with joint forces invaded the kingdom of Babylon and took the city. Cyaxares reigned two years at Babylon, and at his death Cyrus became master of the whole empire. This hypothesis is entirely agreeable to scripture, and free from those unsurmountable difficulties, which attend the others, as is allowed even by those who reject it. Their only exception to this system is, that neither Herodotus, (91) Æsch. Persæ, v. 761.

Herodotus, Berosus, nor Megasthenes knew of any such king as Darius or Cyaxares II. nay, Herodotus tells us in expres words, that Astyages was succeeded by his grandson Cyrus. This immediate succession of Cyrus to his grandfather is vouched by Diodorus, Justin, Strabo, Polyænus, Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, Hierom, Austin, &c. but these, as they have only copied after Herodotus, add no new weight to the scale. The above-mentioned writers, we own, give Astyages no other successor than Cyrus.; but Xenophon (92) does, and likewise Josephus (93), forsaking herein Berosus, whom he often quotes, and ever follows, where his authority does not clash with scripture. Xenophon calls the successor of Astyages Cyaxares, and Josephus gives him the name of Darius, adding, that he overturned the kingdom of Babylon, being in that enterprize assisted by his nephew Cyrus (94), which is consonant both to scripture and chronology; whereas the contrary opinion, though perhaps not repugnant to holy writ, cannot by any means be reconciled with chronology. For if we suppose, that Astyages had no other successor but Cyrus, we must allow him to have lived a hundred years and upwards. For he gave his daughter in marriage to Nebuchadnezzar, as the sticklers for Herodotus tell us, before the siege of Niniveh, that is seventy-three years before the reduction of Babylon. He must have been at that time at least thirty years old, and two years more he reigned at Babylon. Could we but prevail upon ourselves to believe, that Astyages lived to so great an age, we should willingly follow Herodotus, having a great respect for that venerable, and by some much injured, historian. His system is no ways repugnant to scripture, where nothing is said of Darius the Mede, which may not be as well applied to Astyages himself as to his son.

A modern writer (95), so prepossessed in favour of Herodotus, as not to call in question any thing that author asserts, endeavours to support his system with a passage from the 13th chap. v. 65th of Daniel, where it is said, And king Astyages was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus of Persia received the kingdom. His quotation is right according to the vulgate, which is the standard in the church of Rome; but in our bibles these words are to be found in the apocryphal history of Bel and the Dragon xi. 1. However, we need not lay any stress upon this, seeing the same writer, who started the difficulty, has been so kind as to suggest us an answer to it: For a few lines after he lanches out into great commendations of father Tournemine, calling him a critic of great penetration, the most learned and honest man that ever was bred bred in his ſociety ; and theſe encomiums he beſtows on that very honeſt Jeſuit for diſcovering, that the names of Cyaxares, Aſtyages, and Ahaſuerus were common to all the kings of Media (96). 'Tis very ſurprizing, that he ſhould appropriate the name of Aſtyages to the grandfather of Cyrus, and a few lines after admire the penetration and adopt the opinion of one who will have that name to be common to all the kings that reigned in Media. If F. Tournemine's diſcovery be true, as perhaps it may, we ſhould be glad to know, why the ſon of Aſtyages might not have bore that name as well as his father, and if he might, how will our author prove, that the abovementioned paſſage refers to the father and not to the ſon ? This writer makes a conſcience of forſaking Herodotus in the number of his kings, and at the ſame time does not ſcruple to contradict him with regard to the years of their reſpective reigns ; for he makes Cyaxares reign ſixty-four years, whereas Herodotus allows him only a reign of forty ; wherein he is no leſs at variance with himſelf, after laying ſuch ſtreſs on the authority of Heredotus, than he is with that antient hiſtorian. Thus much we have thought neceſſary to ſay on a ſubject, which has occaſioned endleſs diſputes among the learned, and hope, that the reader will not think we have treſpaſſed on his patience, when he reflects, that we have brought within the compaſs of one note what has ſupplied matter for whole volumes.

HISTORY of PERSIA.

SECT. I.

The Deſcription of Perſia.

THIS country, like many others, has in different ages been called by different names, and tho' to ſome the ſettling of theſe may ſeem a dry and uſeleſs taſk, yet inaſmuch as the ſubſequent hiſtory will be much enlightened thereby, we ſhall give the reader as diſtinct and accurate an account of them as we can. The moſt antient name of Perſia is that by which it is called by Moſes [a], viz. Elam, or, as ſome write it, Ælam, from Elam the ſon of Shem, the father of its firſt inhabitants. [b] Herodotus calls its inhabitants Cephenes, and in very antient times the [c] people of this country are ſaid to have called themſelves Artæi, and the region wherein they dwelt Artea. In the books of [d] Daniel, Eſdras, &c. we find it called Paras, agreeable to the Perſian denomination of Pars and Phârs, whereby the proper Perſia is called at this time. It has been alſo called [f] Achæmenia and Arſaica from its antient kings. In [g] oriental writers it is called Agjem, Irân, and Shahiſtân, that is the dominions of the Shâh. It is true, that, ſtrictly ſpeaking, Achæmenia and Iran are not general names of Perſia, but rather of parts thereof, yet, as they are frequently quently uſed in authors to ſignify that country which we call Perſia, they may well enough be comprehended in this liſt of names (A).

The

(A) The beſt commentators agree, that the Elamites, who were the anceſtors of the Perſians, were deſcended from Elam the ſon of Shem, and thus much has been aſſerted and proved, as far as the nature of the thing would admit, in our firſt volume (1). It is likewiſe allowed, that the moſt antient among the inſpired writers conſtantly intend Perſia when they ſpeak of Elam and the kingdom of Elam. Thus, not to detain the reader with unneceſſary quotations, when the prophet Jeremiah, after the denouncing many Judgments againſt this country, adds theſe words, But it ſhall come to paſs in the latter days that I will bring again the captivity of Elam, ſaith Jehovah (2). He is always underſtood to mean the reſtoration of the kingdom of the Perſians by Cyrus, who ſubdued the Babylonians, as theſe had before ſubdued the Perſians, and made them ſubject to their empire (3). As to the word פרס Paras, authors are not well agreed as to its etymology or ſignification, ſome are for deriving it from the Arabic word Phâris which ſignifies a horſe. Some Perſian hiſtorians ſay, that Phars is a proper name, and that the perſon ſo called was the ſon of Arſham, i. e. Arphaxad the ſon of Shem; others make this Phars the ſon of Japhet, &c. Some again, who ſeem to be neareſt the truth, ſay, that he was the ſon of Elam the ſon of Shem (4). It is evident, however, that the Greek word Perſis and the Latin word Perſia are derived from this oriental denomination, and not from this country's being conquered by Perſeus. The name Artæi is thought to be derived from the Perſian word Ard or Art, which ſignifies ſtrong, brave, magnanimous, intimating, that the people of this country were ſuch in their diſpoſitions (5). Achæmenia, as (6) Stephanus Byzantius informs us, was only a part of Perſia, (7) Strabo ſays nearly the ſame thing, yet ſometimes it is uſed to ſignify Perſia in general, as particularly by (8) Herodotus, who makes Cambyſes in an oration calls his people Achæmenidæ. In the Armenian language Perſia, as I have ſaid, is ſtiled Shahiſtân, i. e. the country of the Shâh (9). The Arabians gave the name of Agemeſlaan to Perſia, becauſe in their language Agem ſignifies ſtranger or rather barbarian, which, with great modeſty, they impoſe on every other nation but themſelves; hence the diſtinction

THE extent of Perſia has been in different ages as various as its names [h], Ptolemy bounds it thus: on the north it has Media, on the eaſt Carmania, on the weſt Suſiana, on the ſouth the Perſian gulph, but this relates to Perſia as a province. We conſider it in another light, and therefore, to ſpeak as clearly and diſtinctily as we may, let us firſt aſſign the boundaries of the Perſian empire as they ſtood anciently, when it extended fartheſt, let us next ſettle the boundaries of the modern Perſian empire, and thirdly, let us review the ſeveral provinces mentioned by ancient writers, and, as we go on, take ſome account of the condition they are now in. Extent.

AS to the antient empire of the Perſians it reached in length, from the Helleſpont to the mouth of the river Indus, about 2800 Engliſh miles, in breadth, from Pontus to the mouth of the Arabian gulph, about 2000 miles. Boundaries.

THE [k] modern Perſia, that is the dominions of the Perſian crown, extends in length, from the mouth of the river Araxes to the mouth of the river Indus, about 1840 of our miles, and in breadth, from the river Oxus to the Perſian gulph, about 1080 of our miles, bounded thus; on the north by the Caſpian ſea, the river Oxus, and mount Caucaſus; on the eaſt by the river Indus and the dominions of the great Mogul, as he is commonly call'd; on the ſouth by tion of Arak-Arab and Arak-Agem, which ſignifies as much as the towns of the Arabs and the towns of the Barbarians. The Perſians themſelves call their country generally Iroun, and Iran, for this reaſon, they ſay, that under the reign of king Effraſiab, their empire contained all the countries between the Caſpian ſea and China. This monarch divided his mighty empire into two parts, calling that on the other ſide of the river Oxus Touran, and this Iran, i. e. on the other ſide of the river, and on this ſide of the river, whence in the antient Perſian hiſtories Key Iran and Key Touran ſignified the king of Perſia and the king of Tartary; at this day the Perſian monarch is ſtiled Padcha-Iran, and the grand-vizier of Perſia, Iran-Medary, i. e. the pole of Perſia (10).

by the Persian gulph and the Indian ocean, and on the west by the dominions of the Grand-Signior (B).

Gedrosia. In our account of the provinces, into which the country we are speaking of was antiently divided, we shall begin with Gedrosia, mentioned by [1] Pliny, Strabo, and other writers. It is bounded on the west by Carmania, on the north by Drangiana and Arachosia, on the east by Guzarat

[1] See note (C).

(B) The ingenious Sir John Chardin tells us, "that Persia "is the greatest empire in the world, if we consider it accord- "ing to the geographical descriptions of the Persians, for they "represent its antient bonndaries to have been the four follow- "ing great seas, viz. the Black-sea, the Red-sea, the Caspian- "sea, and the Persian gulph, and also these six rivers, almost "as well known as seas, Euphrates, Araxis, Tigris, Phasus, "Oxus, and Indus. It is, indeed, impossible to mark precisely "the limits of this vast kingdom, for it is not with it as with "the dominions of some petty sovereign, where a rivulet or a "pillar marks the frontier. Persia has on every side a space "of three or four days journey utterly uninhabited, though the "soil is in some places the best in the world; the Persians look "on it as a mark of the true grandeur, the leaving such de- "serts between great empires, it hinders, say they, all disputes "about limits, and they serve like walls to separate one king- "dom from another. The seas and rivers before mentioned are "far from being the boundaries of Persia at this day, yet the "latest Persian writers describe always their empire within these "limits, for they insist, that of right all the countries between "them belong to them, and that they want only such another "brave king as Abbas the great to restore them to the possessi- "on of their antient territory. Persia, in the state I saw it, "taking it from Georgia, i. e. from the 45th deg. of lati- "tude to the 80th, and from the river Indus to the mountains "of Ararat, that is from the 77th to the 112th degree of lon- "gitude, contains in length about 550 Persian leagues which "makes 750 French leagues, and in breadth about 400 (11)". We have chosen to make use of the testimony of this traveller preferable to others, because he seems to have taken great pains in the description which he has given us of this country, and since it must be allowed, that his long stay therein, his great parts, and general knowledge qualified him perfectly for such a work. If we cannot credit him, it is hard to know on whom we may rely.

Guzarat a province of India, on the ſouth by the Indian ocean; it is call'd at preſent Makran, of old it was inhabited by the Arbitæ, Parſiræ, Muſarnæi, and the Rhamnæ; its principal cities were Paſis, Arbis, and Cuni, Ptolemy places here a celebrated emporium call'd the haven of women. The principal modern cities are [m] Firhk, Chalak, and the port of Guadal (C).

CARMANIA, divided into Carmania the deſart, and Carmania proper. [n] Carmania the deſart is bounded on the north by Parthia, on the weſt by Perſis, on the eaſt by Drangiana, Carmania.

(C) As it would have ſwelled this chapter to an exceſſive bulk, if we we had in the text been very particular as to the reſpective provinces of Perſia, ſo to avoid obſcurity on the other hand, we have thought it neceſſary to add ſuch a deſcription of each province in theſe notes, as may ſuffice to give the reader a competent idea of its ſituation, extent, and productions. This being premiſed, let us proceed in the order obſerved in the text.

Tho' Gedroſia be conſtantly ſo called by Strabo and Ptolemy, yet (12) Diodorus Siculus, (13) Suidas, and ſome manuſcripts of (14) Ammianus Marcellinus read Cedroſia. The extent of this province cannot eaſily be aſſigned, becauſe though in general terms its boundaries be pretty well ſettled, yet how to fix theſe at this diſtance of time is a queſtion not readily reſolved. Mount Becius, or rather a ridge of mountains, runs through the middle of this province, and from them ſprings the celebrated river Arbis or Arabis, which after a ſhort courſe runs into the Indian ocean, at the mouth of this river ſtood the Γυναικῶν λιμὴν of Ptolemy (15), mentioned alſo by Arrian in his Indian hiſtory, who tells us, that this place was ſo called, becauſe originally it was governed by women (16). The ſoil of this province was ſandy and barren, very deficient in water, and the air intemperately hot, ſo that Alexander's army ſuffered exceſſively here, notwithſtanding they built their huts with aromatic wood, and met with ſpices in profuſion (17). Ptolemy mentions two iſlands dependent on this province Aſtea and Codane (18): Arrian, ſpeaking of the voyage of Nearchus, tells us, he obſerved ſeveral others (19).

Drangiana, on the south by Carmania proper. [o] Carmania proper hath on the south the Indian ocean, on the west Persis and the gulph of Persia, on the east Gedrosia, and on the north Carmania the desart; it contains the modern provinces of Chirman and Ormas, it was inhabited by the Isatichæ, Zuthi, Gadanopydres, Camelobosei, Agdonites, Rhudianæ, Ares, Charadeæ, Pasargadæ, Armozæi; its antient cities were Carmanæ, now Khirman, still a considerable place, and famous for the scymetars made there, Alexandria built by Alexander the great, Armuza or Armuzum, on the shore of the gulph, giving name to a promontory, and to the island of Ormuz. The modern places of note besides are Khirman, [p] Bermazir, Kuhestek, and Iasquez, which gives name to a cape or promontory shooting into the Persian gulph (D).

(D) Though other authors speak of Carmania in general, yet Ptolemy makes not only the difference before noted in the text, but interposes the description of Arabia Felix between Carmania Deserta and Carmania the proper. As to the first, it is very truly what (20) Ptolemy calls it, having in it scarce a town or a village, its soil an unhospitable sand, its air hot and unhealthy, and the whole province in a manner destitute of water (21). Carmania proper, is a better country, having in it several rivers, particularly the Andamis mentioned by (22) Pliny and (23) Ptolemy, it is, however, mountainous, though with this advantage, that these mountains have mines of copper and iron; the people antiently, however, lived in no very desireable condition if the description given us by Pomponius Mela be true, "The "Carmanians, said he, have neither fruits, nor raiment, nor "house, nor cattle, but cover themselves with skins of fish, and "feeding on them for the most part, the bodies as well as "heads of these people are covered with hair (24)". It may be, Pomponius Mela confounds the Carmanians with a nation inhabiting the sea coast, and called from their manner of living Icthyophagi, mentioned both by (25) Strabo and (26) Arrian, and who are said not only to have fed on fish, but to have erected huts with their bones. (27) Ammianus Marcellinus gives Carmania a better character. At this day this province is particularly ticularly remarkable for producing ſheep which bear the fineſt wool in the world, they have this peculiar property, that having fed upon new graſs from January to May their fleece falls off of itſelf, and leaves the ſheep quite naked; the wool being gathered and beaten, the coarſe breaks, and the fine only remains. The Gaurs have the whole manufacture of this wool in their hands, which conſiſts chiefly in girdles much eſteemed through the eaſt, and in a ſort of ſerges, which are as ſoft and almoſt as fine as ſilk (28). Dependent on this province is the little, but famous, iſland of Ormus, in compaſs about 20 miles, ſtony and full of rocks, barren and deſtitute of all neceſſaries except ſalt, of which there is ſuch plenty and ſo hard, that it is ſaid houſes are built thereof. The ſoil is compoſed of a white ſand, formerly imported into Europe. Water (except ſuch as after rains was preſerved in ciſterns) it had none, ſo that even in its moſt flouriſhing times, when it was the emporium of this part of the world, its inhabitants had not only their victuals, but the very water they uſed, from the continent, the air in ſummer exceſſively ſultry, ſo that people were forced to live in grots, and to lie in water (29). At preſent there is nothing on it but a fort; but of its antient kingdom, and of the ſeveral revolutions which happened therein, we ſhall not fail to treat in its proper place.

[q] Drangiana, bounded on the ſouth by Gedroſia, on the eaſt by Arachoſia, on the north by Aria, on the weſt by Carmania the deſart, derived its name, as ſome ſay, from the river Drangius, and is called by the modern Perſians Sigiſtan; it was antiently peopled by the Darandæ and the Batrii. Ptolomy reckons ten conſiderable cities in this province, the moſt famous of them were Ariaſpe and Prophthaſia, the towns now of note are [r] Siſtan, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the antient city laſt mentioned, Chalak, and Kets. [s] Some writers ſpeak of a certain valley in this province called Mulebet, improved by a prince called Aladin into a paradiſe, though for very bad purpoſes (E).

Arachoſia. ARACHOSIA, bounded on the weſt by Drangiana, on the north by Paropamiſus, on the eaſt by the river Indus, on the ſouth by Gedroſia, its modern name is not well ſettled, inhabited of old by the Arimaſpi, who were afterwards called Margyetæ, and then Euergetæ, the Sydri, Roplutæ, and Eortæ. Ptolemy reckons up thirteen cities in this province, we ſhall content ourſelves with mentioning only three; Arachothus built on a lake of the ſame name by the famous Semiramis, who is ſaid to have given it the name of Cophes; Alexandria built by Alexander the great, and by ſome thought to be the ſame with the city now called [t] Cabul; Arbaca ſuppoſed to have derived its name from ſome of inhabitants Drangi (33). A ridge of mountains, the principal of which is called Bagous, runs through this country, and from thence ſome have fancied that there ran a river called Drangius, from whence this country took its name, but of this there is no certainty; the province is not large, and every where hilly, far from abounding with any rich commodities, and therefore never very famous either in antient or modern times, chiefly at preſent from its being reported to have been the birth-place of Ruſtan, the celebrated hero of oriental romances. As to the valley of Mulebet, or paradiſe of Sultan Aladin, mentioned above; its hiſtory runs thus: A petty prince of this name cauſed this valley to be adorned in the moſt elegant manner he could contrive, furniſhing it eſpecially with airy pavilions, fine women, rich ſherbets, and delicate proviſions, he then ſhut up its entrance with a ſtrong fort, and whenever he had any dangerous exploit to perform, for it ſeems he was but a kind of free-booter, he choſe out ſome ſtrong, able, young man, and having got him to drink to ſuch a degree as to loſe his ſenſes, he cauſed him while he was in that condition to be removed into that paradiſe of his, where having ſuffered him to remain for two or three days, he then directed him to be lulled aſleep in the ſame manner, and ſo ſent home to his own houſe, then, under promiſe of ſending him for ever to dwell in that Paradiſe, the joys of which he had taſted, Aladin quickly drew the deluded wretch to perpetrate the moſt barbarous and bloody facts that could be thought of (34).

of the kings of Parthia called Arbaces. As to modern towns of note we know of none (F).

PAROPAMISUS,

(F) It is on the authority of Monſ. Tavernier that we have told our readers there are now no towns of note in this province (35), by which we mean, none that are exactly known to ſtand within the limits of the antient Arachoſia; however, ſince ſome writers are poſitive, that the antient city of Arachotus, or rather Arachotos, for it is a Greek appellation, was ſeated where now ſtands the city of Cabul (63), we will take this opportunity of inſerting a deſcription of that city and the parts adjacent, which may perhaps prove as uſeful, and muſt of neceſſity be more entertaining, to our readers, than a dry recital of the conjectures of geographers relating to this province. "Caboul is a large city, the metro"polis of the province of Cabouliſtan, or Caboul, and hath "two caſtles well fortified, and becauſe ſeveral kings have held "their courts there, and many princes ſucceſſively have had it
"for their portion, there are a great many palaces in it; it lies "in 33 deg. of north latitude. The mountains about it produce
"plenty of Mirobalans, which from thence the eaſtern people
"call Cabuly, ſeveral ſorts of drugs, and ſome ſpices, which
"with the iron mines in them yield a great profit to the inha"bitants. In this town they maintain a great trade with Tar-
"tary, the country of the Uſbecks, and the Indies. The Uſ-
"becks alone ſell yearly in this town above ſixty thouſand horſes,
"and the Perſians bring hither great numbers of ſheep and other
"cattle, by which means they are much enriched. Wine is to "be had and proviſions are cheap, tho' the country about it is
"but cold and barren, unleſs in ſome places which are ſheltered
"by the mountains, being rendered little the more fruitful by "the two rivers that water it, and have their ſource in the "mountains. From this province eſpecially come the large canes,
"of which they make halberds and lances; and they have many "grounds planted with them. The inhabitants of the city and
"province are moſt of them heathens, and therefore in all towns "and villages are many pagods. They reckon the months by "the moons, and with great devotion celebrate the feaſt called
"Houly, which laſts two days, at the full moon in February.
"At this feaſt they are all cloathed in a dark red, and after they "have prayed in the temple, and made their oblations, they "ſpend the reſt of the time in dancing by companies in the "ſtreets, to the ſound of trumpets, viſiting their friends, and

Paropamiſus. Paropamisus, bounded on the weſt by Aria, on the north by Bactria, on the eaſt by the dominions of the Mogul, on the ſouth by Arachoſia. It is called by the moderns [u] Sableſtan, including likewiſe the kingdom of Candahar; its antient inhabitants were the Bolitæ, Ariſtophili, Ambantæ, Parietæ, and Parſii; its chief cities Ortoſpanum and Naulibis; modern cities there are many of great note, ſuch as Beckſabat, Aſbe, [w] Buſt, ſtrengthened with one of the fineſt caſtles in Perſia, and adorned with various beautiful Karawanſeras (G).

"eating together every tribe by itſelf. The Great Mogul's "revenue from this country is 4 or 5 millions yearly (37)". Yet after all it is far from being certain, whether Cabul has any thing to do with the antient province of Arachoſia, ſince Cabouliſtan lies beyond Candahar, and is generally reckoned part of the Mogul's dominions.

(G) The name of this province is differently written, generally Paropamiſus, ſometimes Parapamiſis, and again Paropamiſis (38), deriving this denomination from the mountain Paropamiſus, which is a part of Taurus, but was falſely ſtiled Caucaſus, to flatter Alexander the Great, that it might be ſaid of him that he had paſſed that famous ridge of mountains; a ſtrange vanity! and ſcarce to be credited, if it were not ſupported by the authority of writers of the higheſt credit (39). The ſoil of this country ingeneral is not over-fruitful, the province being full of hills, overſhadowing the valleys ſo as to render them cool and pleaſant. We have obſerved above, that the kingdom of Candahar is included within the antient province of Parapomiſus; this little realm hath for its capital a city of the ſame name, which is looked upon to be the beſt fortified place in all this part of Aſia; as the caravans paſſed conſtantly through it in going to, or coming from, India, it is conſequently a place rich and full of trade. Tavernier has given us ample deſcription of it at the end of the 5th book of his travels; as to the hiſtory of its princes and of the various fortunes it has ſuſtained, we ſhall give the reader a diſtinct view of them, when we have deduced the Perſian hiſtory as low as to the erecting of this little kingdom.

[x] BACTRIANA, or Bactria, now called Choraſſan, antiently inhabited by the Salataræ, Zariaſpæ, Chomatri, Comi, Acinacæ, Tambozi, Thocaræ, a powerful people, and ſeveral other nations of leſs note; it was in the firſt ages of the world a kingdom, and a very famous one too, in latter times it boaſted a thouſand cities, the chief of theſe were Bactra and Ebuſmi, both royal cities as Ptolemy tells us; Maracanda and Charracharta; its modern cities of note are are alſo numerous, but we ſhall not mention them here, becauſe we ſhall have occaſion hereafter to conſider this country more particularly. Bactria.

MARGIANA, bounded on the weſt by Hyrcania, on the north by Tartary, on the ſouth by Aria, and on the eaſt by Bactria; now called Eſtarabad, it is divided from Tartary by the river Oxus, called by the modern Perſians [y] Ruth-khané-burkan, inhabited antiently by the Derbicæ, the Maſſagetæ, who came hither from Scythia, the Parni, the Dahæ, and the Tapurni. [z] Among its cities of note we may reckon Alexandria, one of the ſix cities of that name in Perſia, afterwards called Antiochia, and after that Seleucia, Nigæa, or rather Nyſæa, mentioned by Ptolemy; as to modern places of note, Eſtarabad, Amul, and Damkau, deſerve chiefly to be mentioned (H). (H) Many antient authors agree in commending the ſituation of this province, begirt, as it is, with high mountains, watered with pleaſant rivers, amongſt the reſt with the noble river Oxus, ſo famous in Greek and Latin authors. It is likewiſe celebrated for its fertility in vines of ſuch an extraordinary ſize, that two men can ſcarce fathom the trunk of one of them, bearing cluſters, ſome of which are two cubits long. Antiochus Soter was ſo much pleaſed with the beauty of this country, that he not only built a magnificent city therein, but even incloſed the whole plain watered by the rivers Arias and Margue, with a wall 1500 ſtadia in circuit (40). Eſtarabad its preſent capital is chiefly remarkable for the fine druggets and other excellent woollen goods manufactured there (41).

Hyrcania.

[a] Hyrcania, bounded on the north by the Caſpian ſea, called ſometimes Mare Hyrcanum from its waſhing the ſhore of this Province, on the weſt by Media, on the ſouth by Parthia, and on the eaſt by Margiania; called now Mazandran, and including likewiſe the province of Kylan. The old inhabitants of this country were the Maxeræ, Aſtabeni, and Chrindi; its antient capital was called Hyrcania as well as the province, nor has it at this diſtance of time much changed its name, ſince it is ſtill called Hyrcan. Tambrace, a very ſtrong place at the time Arſaces began to lay the foundation of his empire. Modern places of note are [b] Ferh-abad, a port ſeated on a navigable arm of the Caſpian ſea, a fine city much frequented by Ruſſian merchants, as being not above a fortnight's ſail from Aſtracan; Giru, Telarapeſet, Ciarman, and Eſcref, are alſo places of note in this country (I).

[c] Aria,

[a] Ptol. l. vi. c. 9. [b] Sir Thomas Herbert's Travels in Harris's collect. vol. i. p. 434.

(I) Antient writers agree in repreſenting Hyrcania as a country fruitful in wine, wheat, figs, and all other kinds of fruits, here and there, however, interſperſed with meadows and paſture lands, and in ſome places with the leſs pleaſant proſpect of thick woods, abounding with wild beaſts of almoſt every kind, even to a proverb. As to its preſent condition, nothing can be more amazing than the wide difference there is between the accounts given us by perſons of credit and capacity, and who have had equal opportunities of acquiring a perfect knowledge of the things of which they diſcourſe. The reader will the better judge of this, if he takes the trouble of comparing the following paſſage, extracted from the travels of the duke of Holſtein's embaſſadors, with what we ſhall hereafter give him from Sir John Chardin, in ſpeaking of the air of Perſia. "It muſt be confeſſed by all "thoſe who have travelled in theſe parts, that the province of "Kilan is a terreſtrial paradiſe, abounding in ſilk, oil, wine, "rice, tobacco, lemons, oranges, pomgranates, and all ſorts "of other fruits; the vines (which ſpread themſelves with their "branches up the trees) being very excellent here, being as "big in compaſs as a man in the waiſt. The Caſpian ſea, as "well as the rivers belonging to this province, affords to the "inhabitants prodigious quantities of fiſh, as their paſture grounds "furniſh

[c] ARIA, bounded on the north by Margiana and Bactria, on the west by Parthia and Carmania the desart, on the south by Drangiana, on the east by Paropamisus, now comprehended under the province of Chorasan; it was antiently inhabited by the Nisæi, Astaveni, Musdorani, Cassirotæ, Obares, Elymandri, and the Bergi; its principal cities of old were Aria, seated on the river Arias, mentioned by Pliny, thought to be the same city which is still famous under the name of Heri, or Herat, rebuilt and splendidly adorned by the Sultan Heussien-Mirza, Alexandria built by Alexander, who settled a colony of Macedonians therein, Artacanda, called by [d] Strabo Artacana, and Bitaxa (K). " furnish them with great store of cattle, and their forests with " venison and wild fowl, which makes me admire, how John de " Laet, who follows the footsteps of Johannes de Persia, could " assert with so much confidence, that Messanderan (part of " the province of Kilan) lies under so cold a climate, that the " fruits there seldom come to full maturity, when it is confess- " ed by all that have any right knowledge of those parts, that " among all the provinces of that vast empire, there is none that " challenge prerogative for a temperate and benign air, before that " of Messanderan, which, beyond all dispute, produces the " best fruits of all Persia. Schach Abas was so well convinced " of this point, that he gave the preference in his opinion to " this province before any other of all his dominions, which " made him lay the foundation of the city of Ferabath, his ordi- " nary residence where he he died (43).

(K) It is not easy to determine, whether Aria and Ariana were the same province, or, if they were not; how they differed. To discuss so perplexed a question here, and to endeavour to solve what, to the best geographers, has appeared an inexplicable doubt, would be at once an act of vanity and rashness. It is better therefore to refer the learned reader to the authors cited at the bottom of the page, from whom we may receive all the satisfaction the nature of the thing will admit (44). In our description in the text, we have followed Ptolemy exactly, as knowing Parthia.

[e] Parthia, bounded on the west by Media, on the north by Hyrcania, on the east by Aria, on the south by Carmania the desart, surrounded with mountains, which serve it for boundaries on every side, at this day called Erak or Arak, and to distinguish it from Chaldea, which is likewise called Erak, this is styled Erac-Agemi. [f] The antient Parthians are said to have been originally Scythians, who, banished from their own country, settled here and assumed this name, which in their own, that is in the Scythian, language, signify'd exiles. Ptolomy reckons 25 large cities with this province, and it must certainly have been very populous, since many cities and 2000 villages were destroyed by earthquakes. Its capital was Hecatompylos, so called from its having a hundred gates, a noble and magnificent place, and so lucky, as some think, to remain still the capital of Persia, knowing no better guide, though we must at the same time allow, that some things there are in his description of this province which are not easily understood, such as the several fountains from whence he derives the stream of the river Arius, and the lake which he says it forms (45). Of the thirty-five cities mentioned by that author, we cannot find above five or six mentioned by any other antient writer, and of these the greatest part are found altogether in a paragraph of Ammianus Marcellinus (46). It was antiently a very populous country, though much subject to heats, and intermixed with desarts, heaths, and forests near the mountains; however, where the heat of the sun is a little rebated, they have very fruitful plains, which among other things produce grapes, the wine of which hath so strong a body as to keep fourscore or a hundred years, without dimunition of colour or flavour. The antient city of Aria, now known by the name of Heri or Herat, is still large and populous. Sir Thomas Herbert in his travels tells us, that when he was there he found it under a governor of its own, and adds, that the adjoining country abounds with roses, of which they make a water much stronger in its smell than that made in Europe. There are likewise, says another eminent traveller, admirable tapestries made in the neighbourhood of this place, such as transcend not only the tapestries of Europe, but even those that come from the rest of the Persian looms (47).

ſia, under the name of Hiſpahan, or rather Spauhawn. Modern towns of note are g Touchercan, Hamadan, a very conſiderable place, and eſpecially noted for great herds of cattle fed in its neighbourhood, producing great quantities of butter, cheeſe, and hides, Chachan, Com, Caſbin, &c. (L).

h PERSIS,

g Tavern. Voy. l. iv. c. 1.

(L) The mighty reputation which the kings of Parthia by their military virtues obtained will oblige us to ſpeak hereafter of this province more accurately, than in this general deſcription of the Perſian dominions it was proper for us to do. As to what we have advanced concerning the origin of the Parthians, it may not be amiſs to give the reader here the words of that author, on whoſe authority we took it. "The Parthians (ſays he) are alſo "derived from the Scythians: for they were exiles of that "country, as their very name teſtifies. For in the Scythian, "language baniſhed men are called Parthians. Theſe in like manner "with the Bactrians, being by civil wars driven out of Scythia, "firſt fixed themſelves by ſtealth in the country adjoining to "Hyrcania, and afterwards obtained by force more extended "dominions (48)". Though in latter ages Parthia became the miſtreſs of her neighbours, and ſhared with Rome the empire of the world, yet under the antient Perſian, and even under the Macedonian, monarchs, it was ſo little conſidered, that it remained an adjunct of Hyrcania, and was not made a particular province. It is not eaſy to fix the derivation of the capital of Parthia; in antient time, Polybius ſays, that it was called Hecatompylos, becauſe all the roads through the Parthian dominion centered here (49). Curtius ſays it was built by the Greeks, but by whom, or at what time, he informs us not (50). It ſhould ſeem, that Hecatompylos is rather a Greek interpretation of the true name of this city, than the real name thereof, but then what name this was in the Parthian language we pretend not to ſay, it not having been recorded by any author we have met with.

In reſpect to what has been obſerved in the text of Spauhawn's being founded on the ruins of the antient Hecatompylos, there are many authorities to bear us out, though I do not find any certain

tain grounds whereon to found this opinion (51). It is unanimously acknowledged, that the present city is of no great antiquity, and the two parts into which it is divided preserve the names of two contiguous towns from the junction of which it was formed. These are Heider and Neamet-Olahi. The inhabitants of these places, notwithstanding their neighbourhood, bore a mortal hatred to each other, which they have transmitted to their successors, who, tho' they live in the same city, shew notwithstanding, on all public occasions, a warm and inveterate antipathy one towards the other. Some indeed ascribe the enmity to another cause, they say, that Heider and Neamet-Olahi are the names of two princes who reigned antiently over Persia, and who divided their subjects into two parties, which are said to have subsisted ever since, not only in Spauhawn, but in all the towns of Persia. Such as say this, however, own, that the city we are speaking of are composed of two distinct towns, called by them Deredechte and Joubare. It may be wondered that magistrates in the course of ages have not subdued these unnatural feuds. An enquiry into the cause would be impertinent here, if the answer were not short, they have been always indulged by the magistrates, because these quarrels bring them gain (52). It is not very clear at what time the towns beforementioned were united, or when this city received the name by which it is now known. Some say this happened before the reign of the famous Timur-Bec, corruptly called Tamerlan, who destroyed it twice. Certain it is, that Spauhawn owes the glory it now possesses to the great Shâh Abas, who after the conquest of the kingdoms of Lar and Ormus, charmed with the situation of this place, made it the capital of his empire, between the year 1620 and 1628. There is perhaps no city in the world, the name of which is so differently written as this of the capital of Persia (54). Among Europeans

the Perſian gulph, called now Pârs, or Fars, antiently inhabited by the Meſabatæ, Rapſii, Hippophagi, Suzæi, Megores, Europeans it is uſually written Hiſpahan, or Iſpahan, it is alſo called Spaha, Spachea, Aſpahan, Izpaan, and Spahon; the Nubian geographer calls it Aſbahawn, and the Perſians themſelves pronounce it, as it is written in the text, Spauhawn, which orthography we have taken the freedom to introduce, ſince the beſt writers are divided on this head. Tavernier and Sir John Chardin write it Iſpahan, Dr. Gemelli Careri, Spahon, M. le Brun Spahan, but all theſe authors agree that the inhabitants pronounce it as ſettled by us. The etymology of the word is no leſs difficult to be diſcovered, than the manner in which it ſhould be wrote. Before the time of Tamerlane it is ſaid to have been called Sipahan, from the prodigious number of its inhabitants, Sipe, in the old Perſic and Uſbeque language, ſignifying an army, and the plural thereof Sipahan conſequently ſignifying armies. Another derivation there is from an Arabic word ſignifying a battalion (54): but it is time to quit theſe dry enquiries for ſomething more uſeful, as well as more entertaining, ſince in the deſcription of Perſia it would be an unpardonable fault to omit an exact account of its capital, eſpecially ſince we are furniſhed with ſuch noble materials, as are to be found in the travels of Sir Thomas Herbert, the Holſtein ambaſſadors, M. Tavernier, Sir John Chardin, Dr. Gemelli Careri, M. le Brun, and others, Chardin and le Brun having each of them given us a copious deſcription thereof adorned with copper-plates, from whence it is as eaſy to form a juſt idea of it as of London or Paris. All who ſpeak of Spauhawn are agreed, that nothing can be more beautiful in nature than the ſituation thereof: it ſtands in a plain ſpacious and fertile, ſurrounded with mountains, which defend it alike from the ſultry heats of ſummer and the piercing winds of the winter ſeaſon; through this plain run ſeveral rivers which water Spauhawn, and contribute alike to ornament and uſe. The firſt of theſe is the river Zenderoud, over which there are three fine bridges; this river takes it riſe in the mountains of Jayabat, three days journey from the city, and is but a ſmall ſtream of itſelf; but Abas the Great cut a channel, whereby he brought a briſker and more conſiderable ſtream to fall into this river, that it might benefit his capital the more, and by this contrivance the Zenderoud is as broad at Spauhawn in the ſpring, as the Seine is at Paris in the winter. The united waters of theſe rivers are ſweet, pleaſant, and wholeſome, (54) Holſtein Ambaſſadors Travels ubi ſupr.

res, Stabæi. Antient cities of note were Perſepolis, the noble metropolis of the antient Perſian empire; Axima; Maraſium, ſome, almoſt beyond compariſon, as indeed are all the ſprings which are found in the gardens belonging to the houſes of Spauhawn. The river brought by Abas into the Zenderoud is called Mahmoud, and we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak both of it and the Zenderoud in another place. Beſides theſe there are two other ſtreams, which run very near each other, and are both comprehended under the name of Abcorrenge: One of theſe is pretty conſiderable, its waters being at all times deep, and generally ſpeaking equal, for which reaſon ſeveral attempts have been made to bring it to enter the Zenderoud. King Tahmas in the XVIth century expended an exceſſive ſum of money on a project of this ſort without ſucceſs. Abas the great did the ſame thing on another project, but without effect, which did not, however, diſcourage Abas the ſecond from twice endeavouring at the ſame thing, in which likewiſe failing, it is now looked on as a thing impracticable (55). The extent of Spauhawn is very great, not leſs perhaps than twenty miles within the walls; they are of earth poorly built, and ſo covered with houſes and ſhaded with greens, that in many places it is a difficult thing to diſcover them; which is a defect not peculiar to this city, but is ſhared by moſt of the great towns in Perſia, whence many travellers have been led to repreſent them as not walled at all. The Perſians themſelves are wont to ſay, Spauhawn Niſpe gehon, i e. Spauhawn is half the world. It is certainly a very large and populous city, but never were there ſeen wider accounts than thoſe which different authors give us of the number of ſouls in this city. Sir Thomas Herbert ſays, in his time there were 200,000 (56). Sir John Chardin ſays, that ſome have reckoned eleven-hundred thouſand (57); but he is himſelf of opinion that it is not more populous than London. At a diſtance the city is not eaſily diſtinguiſhed, for the ſtreets being many of them adorned with plantanes, and every houſe having its garden, the whole looks like a wood. The ſtreets in general are neither broad nor convenient, there being three great evils which attend them; the firſt is that being built on common ſewers, theſe are frequently broke up, which is very dangerous, conſidering that moſt people ride; the ſecond is, that there are frequent wells or pits in the ſtreets, which are as dangerous; the third ariſes from the people's emptying all their ordure from the tops of their

Maraſium, called now Marazu; Tiace, the capital of a diſtrict of the ſame name; Parſagada, a noble city built by their houſes; the latter is indeed in ſome meaſure qualified by the dryneſs of the air, and by its being quickly removed by the peaſants who carry it away to dung their grounds. Sir John Chardin reckons eight gates; four looking to the eaſt and ſouth, and four to the weſt and north, viz. the gate of Haſſen-Abad, the gate of Joubare called alſo the gate of Abas, the gate of Seidahmedion, the Dervaze-deulet that is the imperial gate, the gate of Lombon, the gate of Tokchi, and the gate Deredechte; he rekons alſo ſix poſterns. Other authors ſay there are ten gates, but it is agreed, that there is no difficulty in entering Spauhawn at any hour of the day or night. Whoever has a mind to make himſelf perfectly maſter of the names of the ſtreets, and even of the houſes of this vaſt city may ſatisfy his curioſity, and be very agreeably entertained by peruſing Chardin's elegant deſcription, which is at once pleaſant and exact, and equally fitted to amuſe and to inſtruct the reader. The compaſs of this note will not allow us ſo much as to abridge his curious deſcription, we ſhall therefore content ourſelves with mentioning only the principal things in Spauhawn, as they are deſcribed by that gentleman and M. le Brun. To begin then with the royal palace, which is three-quarters of a league in circumference: It has ſix gates, the firſt called Ali-Kapie, that is the gate of Ali. The ſecond Haram Kapeſie, or the gate of the Serail; the third Moerbag Kapeſie, the gate of the kitchen; the fourth Gandag Kapeſie, or the garden gate, through which none paſſes but the king himſelf, and his kapaters or eunuchs who attend his women; the fifth Ghajatganna Kapeſie, or the gate of the taylors, becauſe thoſe belonging to his majeſty have apartments near it. The ſixth Ghanna Kapeſie or the gate of the ſecretary. The grandees of the kingdom, when they go to pay their court, generally enter the palace by the two gates firſt mentioned. The Mey-doen, which is one of the principal ornaments of this great city. It is a grand market 710 paces long from eaſt to weſt, and 210 broad from north to ſouth. On the ſouth ſide ſtands the royal palace, and on the north the Nachroe-chone a building wherein are placed the king's band of muſic. On one ſide of the Mey-doen ſtands the moſque called Sjig-lotf-olla, ſo called from one of their doctors who is reputed a ſaint. It has a fine dome adorned with green and blue ſtones encruſted with gold, having on the top a pyramid, on which are placed three balls by Cyrus, and hoonur'd with his tomb[i]. As to modern cities there are many of great note, and amongſt theſe Chiras, Benaron, balls of the ſame metal. On the weſt ſide of the Mey-doen ſtands the royal moſque extremely magnificent. At ſome diſtance from thence appears the gate called Ali-Kapie, and between theſe ſtand a range of fine buildings adorned with porticoes full of ſhops. The middle ſpace is taken up in a great meaſure with tents, under which all ſorts of goods are ſold; but theſe are taken away in the evening to make room for the guards, who with their great dogs attend there all night long. In this ſpace the mountebanks erect ſtages, diſtribute their packets, and with their antic tricks divert the populace. In the middle ſtands a pillar, on the ſummit of which the prize is placed when tournaments are celebrated here; this prize conſiſts generally in a cup of gold, or ſomething of the ſame value, and none are ſuffered to contend for it but perſons of very high quality. On the feaſt of Nouroes, or the beginning of the year, all the tents are taken away, and every thing is made clear for the more commodious celebration of the carouſals, which are then performed in the preſence of the king, who is ſeated in a kind of gallery or theatre called Talael, very curiouſly adorned on the gate of Ali. Next to this noble market-place we ought to mention the principal ſtreet of Spauhawn, called Chiaer-baeg, i. e. four-gardens, one of the grandeſt ornaments of this city; the ſhops therein being wonderfully magnificent, and the diſpoſition thereof in every reſpect convenient and pleaſant. From thence runs the bridge of Allawardie-Chan over the river Zendervade, 540 paces long, and 17 broad, built with large ſtones; it has three and thirty arches, ſome of which are founded on the ſand, which is firm and ſtable; and through theſe, when it is high enough, the water flows. There are ninety-three niches upon this bridge, ſome ſhut, ſome open, and the corners thereof are flanked with four towers. It has a wall or parapet of brick with openings at certain diſtances, which afford the fineſt proſpect in the world. In the neighbourhood of this bridge are divers pleaſure-houſes belonging to the king, and gardens ſtored with fruit-trees, and adorned with every thing elſe that contribute to the making them worthy of their poſſeſſor. There are ſome other bridges, moſques, and public ſtructures, which deſerve to be particularized, if this note were not already too long: Let us conclude it then with obſerving, that the citadel or fortreſs, called by the Perſians ſians Tabaroek, is a very mean ſtructure, and in as mean a condition, its walls being in ſuch a ruinous ſtate, that though there are ſome cannon mounted upon them, yet they are never made uſe of, from an apprehenſion that the walls would fall if thoſe pieces were diſcharged (59).

Benaron, Lar, Bender-abaſſi, or Gombroon, and Bender-congo, are reckoned the chief (M).

(M) This country is very frequently mentioned in antient authors, and therefore we are the better enabled to give an account of its former, as well as preſent, ſtate (60). Such parts of it as lie towards the north are hilly and barren, bearing neither fruit nor corn ſufficient for the uſe of the inhabitants; ſome emeralds indeed there are found, but of no great value. On the coaſt of the Perſian gulph the ſoil is as bad, though of a different nature, being hot and ſandy, producing few other trees than palms; but between theſe there lies a rich and pleaſant region abounding with corn, fruit, and cattle, and better watered, though but by ſmall rivers, than moſt of the other regions within this wide empire. The entrance of this country is narrow and difficult, defended formerly againſt Alexander the Great by Ariobarzanes, a noble Perſian, who gave a check to that conqueror's progreſs, and immortalized his name by his gallant performance in the ſervice of his country. As to Perſepolis, the antient capital of this province, and of the old empire of the Perſians, Diodorus Siculus informs us, that it was the richeſt city in the world at the time that it was ſubdued by Alexander, whoſe ſoldiers taking it by ſtorm put all the men to the ſword, rifled their houſes, and carried off immenſe quantities of gold and ſilver, Alexander reſerving to himſelf the treaſures in the citadel, which had been amaſſing there from the time of Cyrus, the founder of the Perſian empire If this author's computation be right, he took thence a hundred and twenty thouſand talents of gold; in fine, the ſpoil was ſo great, that the neighbouring countries were conſtrained to furniſh mules and other beaſts of burthen, beſides three thouſand camels to carry it off; for he had conceived ſuch a diſlike to the inhabitants of this city, that he was reſolved to leave them nothing of value; and thus, as the ſame writer obſerves, Perſepolis, once ſo famous for its its magnificence, became no less remarkable for its calamity (61). Among the cities of note at this time the principal is Schiras, which, with the adjacent country, is thus described by a famous traveller, in his account of the road from Spauhawn to the Indies: "From thence (i. e. Thel-minar) to Schiras is an hard day's "journey, especially when the snow melts, for then the road is "like a sea. The city of Schiras, which many will have to be "the antient Cyropolis, the metropolis of the province of Persia, "lies in 78 deg. 15 miles long. and 29 deg. 36 miles latitude. "It is seated in a plain, about four leagues in extent from "north to south, and about five leagues from east to west. "Upon the south-east is a lake of salt water about four leagues "in compass. The soil about it is very good and fruitful, and "is famous for the best wines in Persia. The city itself has "nothing handsome in it, for it looks more like a ruin-"ed town than a city. It has no walls but a bad ditch, "and the houses are built of earth dried in the sun, and whiten-"ed over with lime; so that when they are all well moistened "with rain, they often fall down of themselves, only the college "which Iman Kouli-Kan built, and some of the mosques "are of brick; and the best of these mosques, which is "called Sha-Shiraque, is kept in something better repair than "ordinary out of a particular devotion; but there is nothing "worth taking notice of in it. On the north-east stands a high "mountain, which is covered with several sorts of fruit-trees, "of which there are some orange, lemons, and cypresses, and "at the foot of a stone-bridge, from whence there is a street "which goes in a strait line quite through the city. This street "is walled on both sides, and at certain spaces are several great "gates which have neat little houses built upon them, from "which is a pleasant prospect into the gardens planted with "rows of cypresses. The streets of Schiras are somewhat nar-"row; but there are some fair ones, having in the midst of "them lovely canals and basons of water very pleasant. There "are a great many fair covered bazars with shops well furnished "with all sorts of Indian and Turkish commodities, and every "commodity has its particular bazar. In the college there are "professors who have salaries for teaching theology, philosophy, "and

" There are in this city three or four glaſs-houſes, where they " make great and ſmall bottles to tranſport the ſweet waters " made in this city, as alſo ſeveral other veſſels to put their " fruits in, which they ſend in great quantities into India, Su- " matra, Batavia, and other places. They make their glaſs of " a white ſtone almoſt as hard as marble, which they fetch " from a hill four days journey from Schiras, and 'tis as clear " and delicate as any glaſs in the world. It is wonderful how " they blow their great bottles called Caraba, which are a finger " thick, and hold near thirty quarts of wine. They have no " manufacture at Schiras, but a few coarſe painted cloths, and " uſed only by the meaner ſort. On the north-weſt ſide is the " king's garden called Bay-ſha, which is indeed well planted " with fruit-trees, roſes, and jaſmins, but for want of order it " looks like a wilderneſs. From this garden to the hills is a " vineyard, belonging to ſeveral perſons, two leagues long " and one broad, which is watered with the river Bendemir, " which is ſometimes dry in ſummer, becauſe it never rains " there but in ſpring and autumn. The wines made here are " the beſt in all Perſia, but they make no great quantities of " them, becauſe they dry and pickle good part of their grapes. " 'Tis an excellent ſtomach wine, but very ſtrong, ſo that, with- " out ſpoiling the taſte of it, it will carry two thirds of water. " They ſell their wine by weight, and not by meaſure, and putting " it in cheſts ſend a great deal yearly to Spauhawn and the Indies. " The people of Schiras are very witty, and moſt of the " beſt poets in Perſia were born here. In an antient moſque " here lies Scheich Sadi, one of the beſt of their poets, whom " they honour as a ſaint. The ſoil about this city is very good " and produces plenty of all things. They have all the fruits " that we have, and oranges and lemons in abundance. They " have vaſt quantities of roſes, from which they draw ſuch " great plenty of roſe-water that they furniſh all the Indies " with it, They have a great deal of corn, but give much to " their horſes to be eaten in the blade, becauſe they ſay that " for want of water it would never come to maturity. There " is a great deal of opium made at Schiras, for round about " the town are large fields ſown with white poppies; they " have alſo ſtore of capers which they ſend into all parts " (62).

THERE are two other provinces of the Persian empire, which need not be described here, because they have been treated of elsewhere already. These are [o] Curdistan, containing

(N) Susiana, as described by Ptolemy, includes the province stiled Elymais (63), which Pliny also observes to have lain within the bounds of this province, and to have been distinguished from it by the river Eulæus (64). It received its name from Susa, the capital thereof, once the royal seat of the Persian kings, who were wont to reside one part of the year here, and the other at Ecbatana. Pliny says, that it was founded by Darius the son of Hystaspes (65); but this is not to be taken strictly, for certain it is, that the Darius he speaks of could only be its restorer, since Strabo positively affirms, that it was built by Tithonus the father of Memnon (66); and Herodotus long before says, that Susa was called the city of Memnon (67). 'Tis difficult to determine whether in pleasantness, magnificence, or strength this noble city excelled; seated it was, as sacred and prophane authors agree, on the river Ulai or Eulæus, called also the Choaspes, or rather on the confluence of these two rivers, for the Eulæus and the Choaspes, meeting at Susa, run together in one stream, and are afterwards stiled sometimes by one name, sometimes by the other. As to its beauty, Diodorus affirms, that Alexander, whence he seized the palace here, took possession of the noblest mansion in the universe. Here were preserved the records of the Persian empire; and here were laid up the treasures of the kingdom, that they might be made use of on any emergency, and not be squandered away at the will of the prince. Alexander took from hence nine thousand talents of coined gold, and forty thousand talents of gold and silver bullion (68). The modern name of this celebrated city differs not much from that by which it was formerly called. The city of Shustern being by some travellers conceived to be built at least very near the place where of old stood Susa (69).

taining the antient Aſſyria, and [p] Schirwan, of old ſtyled Media. A famous modern traveller [q] tells us, that there are reckoned in the dominions of Perſia upwards of five hundred conſiderable places, walled towns, and caſtles, about ſixty thouſand villages, and forty millions of ſouls.

Climate. As to the air and climate of this country, conſidering the great extent thereof, it cannot be otherwiſe than varied, according to the ſituation of the ſeveral parts thereof, ſome being frozen with cold, and others burnt with heat at the ſame time of the year, which cannot be ſtyled wonderful, ſince it is natural, and occaſioned by cauſes for which we can eaſily account. The air, where-ever it is cold, is dry; but where it is extremely hot, it is ſometimes moiſt: In order to give the reader a juſt notion of this, it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that all along the coaſt of the Perſian gulph, from weſt to eaſt, to the very mouth of the river Indus, the heat is for four months ſo exceſſive, that even thoſe who are born in the country are unable to bear it, but are forced to quit their houſes, and retire to the mountains, ſo that ſuch as travel in theſe parts at that ſeaſon, find none in the villages, but wretched poor creatures left there to watch the effects of the rich, at the expence of their own health. The extreme heat of the air as it renders it inſupportable, ſo it makes it alſo prodigiouſly unwholſome, ſtrangers frequently falling ſick there, and ſeldom eſcaping. The eaſtern provinces of Perſia, from the river Indus, to the borders of Tartary, are ſubject to great heats, but not quite ſo unwholſome, as on the coaſts of the Indian ocean and Perſian gulph; but in the northern provinces, on the coaſt of the Caſpian ſea, the heat is full as great, and, though attended with moiſture, as unwholſome as on the coaſt before-mentioned. From October to May there is no country in the world more pleaſant than this; but the people carry in their faces indelible marks of the malign influence of their ſummers, looking all of them of a faint yellow, and having neither ſtrength nor ſpirits, though about the end of April they abandon their houſes, and retire to the mountains, which are five and twenty or thirty leagues from the ſea. In a word, the unhealthineſs of this place is ſo notorious, that when a perſon is ſent to the government of Ghilan, it is generally looked on as a kind of diſgrace, and the

the people at Spauhawn are apt to ask, whether he has robbed or murdered to deserve such a commission. But this moistness in the air is only in these parts; the rest of Persia enjoys a dry air, the sky being perfectly serene, and hardly so much as a cloud seen to fly therein. To say the truth, the purity of this element is the greatest blessing the inhabitants enjoy, deriving from thence a clear and florid complexion, together with an excellent habit of body. It rains seldom, but it does not follow, that the heat admits of no mitigation; for in the night though not a cloud to be seen, the sky being so clear that the stars alone afford a light sufficient to travel by, yet there is a brisk wind which lasts till within an hour of morning, which gives such a coolness to the air, that a man may dispense with a tolerably warm garment. The season in general, and in the middle of this kingdom, happens thus; the winter, beginning in November and lasting till march, is very sharp and rude, attended with frost, and snow falling in great flakes on the mountains, but never descending on the plains. There are mountains three days journey to the west of Spauhawn, on which the snow lies for eight months of the year. It is said, that they find there white worms as big as one's little finger, which if crushed feel colder than the snow itself. From the month of March to that of May, there are brisk winds, from May to September, the air is serene and dry, refreshed by pleasant gales which blow in the night, at evening, and morning, and in September and November the winds blow as in spring. It is to be observed, that in summer the nights are about ten hours long, the twilight being very short, which, joined to the coolness of the nights, renders the heat of the day so moderate, that this season is as supportable as Spauhawn as at Paris. The great dryness of its air exempts Persia from thunder and earthquakes. In the spring indeed there sometimes falls hail, and as the harvest is then pretty far advanced, it does a great deal of mischief. The rainbow is seldom seen in this country, because there rise not there vapours sufficient to form it; but in the night there are seen rays of light shooting through the firmament, and followed, as it were, by a train of smoke. The winds, however brisk, seldom swell into storms or tempests; but on the other hand they are sometimes poisonous and infectious fectious on the shore of the Gulph, as all travellers agree (O).

THERE

(O) As to the air and clime of Persia, we have chiefly followed the so often commended Sir John Chardin, but never without comparing what he says with what is said by other writers the most esteemed on the same subject. M. Tavernier and he both agree in reporting, that at Spauhawn it is usual to enquire whether a man has robbed or murdered who is sent to Kilan (70); which makes it the more strange, that intelligent persons, who have also been on the spot, should report directly the contrary, as had been remarked in a former note; yet after all some account may be given of this matter, nay, it is to be hoped, such a one as will satisfy even a critical reader. There are a few months in the year in which the account given by Olearius is still found strictly true: but alas! the rest of the the year the people are in a wretched condition, fly from their habitations, and scarce know where to seek for rest. It was in the best season of the year that the Holstein ambassadors, and their retinue crossed this country, and thus, it seems, it came to pass, that they represented it as a paradise, not suspecting that at another season of the year it could be so intolerable a place as it really is. As to the supportable heat at Gombroon, all authors are agreed about it. M. Tavernier says, that people oftentimes find themselves struck by a south wind in such a manner, that they cry, I burn, and immediately fall down dead (71). M. le Brun says, that he was greatly incommoded therewith while he was there, and that the people assured him, that the weather was at some times so excessively sultry as to melt the seals of letters. At this time the people go in their shifts, and are continually sprinkled with cold water; nay, the interpreter, belonging to M. le Brun and his company, had a well in which he passed some part of the day: Among the inconveniencies consequent from this malign disposition of the air, one of the most terrible is the ingendering in the arms and legs a kind of long small worms which are not to be withdrawn without great danger of breaking them, upon which a mortification ensues. Our author last mentioned has therefore just reason to say, that a severer punishment could not be inflicted even on a heinous offender, than the leaving him in such a place as this; and yet, as he observes, there are many people of worth and good sense, who, for the sake of acquiring large fortunes in a short time, hazard themselves here, and rarely live to enjoy riches when they have got them (72).

Mountains. THERE is perhaps no country in the world, which, generally speaking, is more mountainous than Persia; but these mountains are far from being advantageous, since many of them yield neither springs nor metals, and but a few are shaded with trees. It is true, that many of them are situated on the frontiers, and serve as a kind of natural bastions or ramparts to this vast region, and it is very likely contribute in other places to make the country wholesome, by sheltering the vallies under them from excessive heat. On some of these hills there is found a sort of mineral salt, which is sold very cheap [r]. As for particular mountains, we have already mentioned most of them, which deserve to be remembered in our description of the several provinces of Persia.

Rivers. IN respect to rivers, it has been already observed, that, except the Araxis, there is not one navigable stream in all this country. There are indeed in most of its provinces some little rivers which run short courses, and would be more considerable than they are, if through want of water the inhabitants were not forced to divert their streams, by small channels, in order to fructify their grounds. An eminent traveller informs us, that this was practised antiently much more than of late years, and that from hence in a great measure arises the mighty difference between the productions of antient and modern Persia. He affirms, that a Persian of great quality, and who was perfectly acquainted with this matter, informed him, that, within the space of 24 years, no less than fourscore channels had been choaked up and lost in the territory of Tauris [s]. As to seas, the northern provinces of the Persian empire lye on the Caspian lake or sea, of which an ample description has been already given. On the south the Persian shore is washed by the Indian ocean, and by the waters of the Persian gulph, or gulph of Balsora, flowing out of the Indian ocean near the isle of Ormus, from the south-east to the north-west, having Persia on the east, and Arabia on the west, it runs as high as the antient Chaldea, where it receives the Euphrates and the Tigris united in one stream, and very few rivers of note besides. It may not be amiss to take notice here, that the gulph is sometimes styled the red-sea, as well

AFTER

(P) As we have remarked, that there is not above one navigable river in Perſia, the reader need not be ſurprized that we ſay ſo little of the ſeveral ſtreams which water that country, one of them we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of under the head of natural rarities, but the river Araxes deſerves to be further conſidered on account of the miſtakes which ſome writers have been guilty of in relation thereto, occaſioned chiefly by the giving this name to two different rivers; Olearius gives us a very diſtinct account of this matter, which we ſhall therefore recite in his own words. "The 17th we croſs'd the famous river of Aras (Araxes) "by the means of a bridge of boats near Tzanat. Q. Curtius, "ſpeaking of this river, in two different paſſages, and in a "different ſenſe, has not a little puzzled the antient hiſtorians "and geographers, who indeed for the moſt part put it in the ſame "province, but can't agree in the deſcription of its courſe, for "Q. Curtius in his fifth book puts it in Perſis, and ſays its "courſe is to the ſouth, whereas in his ſeventh book he makes "it paſs through Media, and to diſembogue in the Caſpian ſea. "Strabo is no leſs dubious, and Raderus, endeavouring to "diſſolve this knot, by aſſerting that the river Medus, before it "is joined with the Araxes, had its courſe to the ſouth, and "afterwards exonerates itſelf into the Caſpian ſea, is fallen into "a groſs miſtake; for how is it to be conceived, that the river "ſhould make its way through the vaſt mountain Taurus, which "is ſo many leagues in breadth, and divides not only all Perſia "but even Aſia itſelf, and ſo continue its current from Perſe-"polis to the Caſpian ſea? The foundation of the whole miſtake "lay here, that there are two rivers which bear the name of "Araxes in Perſia, one in Media, the other in Perſis, to the laſt, "which waſhes the walls of Perſepolis, (now called Schiras) Q. "Curtius has left the right name of Araxes, but has taken the "liberty to impoſe the name of Tanais upon the Jaxartes, which "paſſes through Scythia, as he has given the name of Caucaſus to "the eaſtern branch of the mountain Taurus, but with what "reaſon I am not able to determine. That which paſſes through "Perſis is by the Perſians called Bend-Emer, from a ſignal "miracle there performed by Ali, and diſembogues in the "ocean in the Perſian gulph, that which we ſpeak of now keeps "its antient name, and riſes out of the mountains of Armenia "behind the great Ararat, and being joined by many other "rivers, the chiefeſt whereof are Karaſu, Senki, Kerni, and "Arpa, it turns its channel near Karaſu deep into the country, "and afterwards near Ordabath falls with a great noiſe, which "which is heard two leagues thence, in the plain of Mokan. Its "courſe there is very ſlow, and after having received into its "channel

After this account of mountains and rivers, and after affirming

" channel about twelve leagues above Tzanat the river Cur or " Cyrus (as large a river as itself, coming northward out of " Georgia) it exonerates itself into the Caspian sea. This suffi- " ciently refutes Ptolemy and those who follow his footsteps, " who make the Araxes and the Cyrus fall by two different chan- " nels into the Caspian sea. Thus they would have Cyropolis " called Scamachie, which Maginus would infer from the de- " grees of latitude given by Ptolemy: But according to that " supposition those two rivers must not be placed above, but " below, the city towards the south, it being certain, that when " we travelled in those parts, we found the conflux of those two " rivers at 39 deg. 54 min. and the city of Scamachie at 40 " deg. 50 min. which is 15 leagues thence and under another " meridian. Neither is there any other river within 19 days " journey of Scamachie on either side, which bears the least " comparison in bigness or otherwise to this river (73)". We should not have introduced so long a quotation, if it had not been a matter of consequence, as will appear in the subsequent history, where this account will serve to rectify some points, which have hitherto confounded even the best authors. It is but just to add, that M. Le Brun in his travels confirms precisely what this author has said (74). As to the Persian gulph, it is not to be questioned, but that the ancients stiled it, as well as the gulph of Arabia, the Red Sea; what renders it most remarkable now is its pearl fishery, of which no doubt the reader will expect some account. They fish for them in many places of the gulph, but especially about the islands of Baharin. This fishery produces a prodigious quantity of pearl, Sir John Chardin says, more than a million in a year, the largest weigh generally from ten to twelve grains, and if by chance any are taken of greater weight, the fishers are directed under great penalties to bring them to the king's exchequer, which it is, however, believed that they do not always do (75). This fishing is performed by divers, who, being carried down to the bottom of the sea in five fathom water, by the weight of a stone fixed to their toes, pick up there all the shells they can see as fast as they can, and put them into a basket they carry down with them on purpose, and then rise up again to take breath, and refresh themselves with a pipe of tobacco; those who are in the boat pull up the baskets, the divers work but from one to eleven, and from eight to three.

affirming that there are many of the former, and but a very few to be met with of the latter, the reader will eaſily comprehend, that the ſoil cannot be generally rich or fruitful, but on the contrary ſandy and barren; however, here and there, there are vallies fruitful and pleaſant enough. The earth in ſome places is ſandy and ſtony, in others heavy and hard, but every where ſo dry, that if it be not watered it produces nothing, no not ſo much as graſs. Rain is not wholly wanting here, but it rains, however, very ſeldom, and not enough to keep even the beſt lands in a condition of bearing corn or fruits without farther help; and even in the winter the beams of the ſun are ſo briſk and ſo drying, that the rain has not much effect. But where-ever the ſoil is ſufficiently moiſtned, either by natural or artificial means, it bears wonderfully well. If it ſhould be aſked, how this deſcription ſuits with what we find recorded, in antient authors, of the luxury and profuſeneſs of the Perſians, ſuch a demand is capable of various anſwers; for firſt, Perſia is not now near ſo much peopled as it was heretofore, and conſequently there cannot be ſo great a number of labourers, which muſt induce barrenneſs in a country, where the ſoil produces nothing without cultivation. Again, it may be ſaid, that the alteration of government, and of religion, has in a great meaſure produced this difference. The antient kings of Perſia were mild and beneficent to their ſubjects, whereas the Mohammedan princes have been always proud, over-bearing, and cruel. According to the opinion of the Perſees or Gaurs, it was meritorious to render barren fields fertile, whereas the Perſians, like other Mohammedans, are ſatisfyed with what good things they find, and will not give themſelves the trouble to labour for poſterity. They look upon life as a great road, wherein men ought to content themſelves with ſuch things as fall into their way, and, in conſequence of ſuch notions, there is no great wonder, that ſterility has enſued, and that modern travellers do not ſpeak in that language with Quintus Curtius, Ammianus Marcellinus, and other ſuch like authors. [t] Sir John Chardin din therefore delivers it as his opinion, that if the Turks were to inhabit this country, it would grow still poorer than it is, whereas if the Armenians or the Persees were to become masters thereof, it would from their industry quickly recover its antient splendor. It must not, however, be imagined, that there subsists not at this day the same variety in point of fruitfulness among the provinces of this extensive country as heretofore. Media, Iberia, Hyrcania, and Bactria, are still in a great measure what they were, and surpass most of the other provinces in their productions; as along the coasts of the Persian gulph the soil is still more barren, cattle less plenty, and every thing in a worse condition than any where else. Before we part with this subject, we think proper to remark, that the Persians are so sensible of the snow's fertilizing their land, that they examine very curiously how high it rises every year, there being a stone on the top of a mountain four leagues from Spauhawn, between two and three foot high, over which when once the snow rises, the peasant, who first brings the news to court, receives a considerable reward for his pains [u]. But it is now time for us to speak more particularly of the productions of the earth.

Trees. AMONG the trees, the most common in Persia, we may reckon the plantane, the willow, the fir, and cornel, called by the Arabs Sedar, and by the Persians Conar, from whence probably came the latin Cornus, and thence our cornel. It is a received opinion in this country, that the plantane has a singular virtue against the plague, and all other infectious diseases, and they positively assert, that there has been no contagion at Spauhawn, since the planting vast numbers of these trees in streets and gardens. The tree which bears Gall-Nuts grows in several parts of Persia, but particularly in Koureſtan. The trees which produce Gums, Mastic, and Incense, are found very commonly in most parts of Persia, that, however, which bears Incense is particularly found in Carmania the desart, resembling in form a large Pear-Tree. Turpentine Trees, and Almond Trees, with the wild Chesnut, are common. The tree which bears Manna is also frequent, but there are several sorts of Manna in Persia, the best is of a yellowish colour and of a large grain, it comes from Nichapour, which is a part of Bactria. There is another sort called the Manna of Tamarisk mariſk, becauſe it is gathered from that tree; all the different ſorts of Manna are uſed to the ſame end in medicine, and are therefore gathered with like care, being eſteemed a valuable commodity, as well as one eaſily diſpoſed of. The herbs in Perſia, eſpecially ſuch as are aromatic, exceed thoſe of other countries, roots, legumes, and ſalleting are larger, fairer, and better taſted than elſewhere, and are eaten raw without danger of their creating any crudities in the ſtomach. Moſt of our European roots and legumes flouriſh here in great perfection, and they would certainly be more cultivated than they are, if, as in Europe, men were by religion reſtrained from eating fleſh. As to drugs, Perſia produces as many as any country in Aſia; for, beſides Manna, Caſſia, Sena, the Nux Vomica, are common in moſt provinces, gum Ammoniac, called by the Perſians Ouſcioc, is found in abundance on the confines of Parthia towards the South. Rhubarb grows commonly in Coraſſan or the antient Sogdiana, but it is not ſo good as that which is brought from the country of the Tartars, between the Caſpian-Sea and China, and for this reaſon they endeavour to confound both under the name of Rivend-tchini, i. e. Rhubarb of China; in Coraſſan they eat it commonly as we do beet-roots. The poppy of Perſia is eſteemed the fineſt in the world, not only in reſpect to its beauty, but becauſe its juice is by far ſtronger than the juice of the ſame plant elſewhere. The Perſians call this juice Afioun, from whence our word opium; the beſt is made in the territory of Lingan ſix miles from Spauhawn, though others prefer the Afioun of Cazeron, which is towards the Perſian gulph, as being leſs apt to ingender crudities in the ſtomach. Tobacco grows all over Perſia, eſpecially about Hammadan, which is the ancient Suſa, and in Coureſtan near the Perſian gulph, which is eſteemed the fineſt, the Perſians themſelves, however, who are great ſmoakers, prefer what they call Tambacou Ingleſi, or Engliſh tobacco to their own; but Sir John Cardin ſays, that this tobacco, which was no other than brazil, being kept at too high a price, the demand for it is now quite loſt. Saffron is cultivated in many provinces, and eſpecially about the Caſpian ſea and in the neighbourhood of Hammadan, and is much eſteemed. The plant called by the Perſians Hiltet, and ſuppoſed to be the lazerpithium or ſilphium of Dioſcorides, from whence drops the Aſſa-fœtida, is common every where, but abounds moſt in Sogdiana: there are two ſorts of it, the white and the black,

black, the white is the least esteemed, because less strong than the black; this juice or gum is all over the east called King, and the Indians consume vast quantities of it, mixing it in all their ragouts and sauces; it has by far the strongest odour of any thing hitherto discovered, since places where it has been kept will retain its scent for whole years, and the vessels in which it is transported to India are so thoroughly impregnated therewith, that no other goods can be put on board them without acquiring its scent, however carefully packed up. Mummy of both sorts is a great Persian commodity, the first is taken from embalmed bodies, or such as are dried in the sands, the other is a precious gum which distils out of a rock; there are two mines or sources of it in Persia, the one in Carmania the desart in the country of Sar, which is the best; for it is certain, that there is no bruise, cut, or wound, which a drachm of this precious gum will not cure in twenty-four hours. The other mine is in Corassan, the rocks from whence it distils belong to the king, and all that issues from thence is for his use, they are inclosed with walls, the gates of which are secured by the seals of the five principal officers in the province, once a year each mine is opened in their presence, and all the mummy that is then found, or at least the greatest part of it, is sent to the king's treasure. It derives its name from the Persian word Moum, which signifies literally an unguent, the Hebrews and the Arabs make use of the same term; the Persians say, that the prophet Daniel taught them the use and preparation of mummy. Cotton is very common over all Persia, but there is a tree which somewhat resembles it, but is by far more rare, which produces a sort of silk very fine and soft, and of which many uses are made. Galbanum is likewise common in this country, together with the vegetable alkali, and many other drugs which do not deserve to be mentioned here [u].

In speaking of the fruits of Persia, melons certainly claim the first place, they have above twenty sorts of them here, the first are called Guermec, i. e. forced by heat, they are round and small, a spring fruit, insipid in the mouth, and consequently no way pleasant, the people, however, fancy them prodigiously wholesome, and on their first coming in eat for a fortnight or three weeks together twelve or thirteen pound weight each day, nay an author of good good credit and a physician says, that some eat thirty pounds of them at a meal without feeling any inconvenience therefrom. For four months in the year, in which melons are common, the common people eat hardly any thing else, and Sir John Chardin says, that they eat more of them in Spauhawn in a day than throughout all France in a month; the best grow about a little borough called Craguerde on the borders of Tartary, from whence, though it be thirty days journey, they are brought to Spauhawn for the use of the king. The people in general are so fond of melons, that they take great pains to preserve them in certain repositories during the last months of the year, and even till the guermec are again in season. After the melon the raisin deserves our notice, of which there are twelve or fourteen sorts in Persia, the most esteemed are the violet, the red, and the black, they are so large that one of them is a good mouthful; they preserve grapes all the winter in Persia, putting them up in paper bags on the vines, in order to preserve them from the birds. In Courdestan, and about Sultania where they have abundance of violets, they mingle their leaves with the dry raisins, which at once give them a fine taste and render them the more wholesome; the best grapes in the neighbourhood of Spauhawn are found on the vines belonging to the Gaurs or antient Persians, for they, being permitted by their religion to drink wine, take the more pains in cultivating these trees, which for the same reason are neglected by the Mohammedan Persians. The dates of Persia are without comparison the richest in the world, their syrup being sweeter and more pleasant than virgin honey, the best grow in Coureستan, Sistan, about Persepolis, and the shore of the Persian gulph, and particularly at Jaron, a town in the road between Schiras and Lar; strangers, however, ought to eat very moderately of this fruit, otherwise it is apt to overheat the blood, sometimes to such a degree as to create ulcers, but the inhabitants never feel any such inconvenience. Dates grow in clusters on the palm-tree, which is the highest of all fruit-bearing trees, and has no branches but at the very top, it produces fruit at fifteen years growth, and continues bearing till it is two hundred years old. All our European fruits grow in great perfection here, their apricots are excellent and of several sorts, nectarines and peaches weigh sometimes sixteen or eighteen ounces each, they break easily, and what is very extraordinary, the stone opens at the same time the peach is broke, and discovers a kernel extremely white, and of a taste the most delicious that can be imagined. The Persian pomgranates grow of several colours and in the highest perfection, some of them weighing a full pound; to sum up all, it may not be amiss to mention the particular places where the several kinds of fruit are held most excellent; apples and pears grow to the highest perfection in Iberia, dates in Carmania, pomgranates about Schiras, oranges in Hyrcania, and all sorts of things in Bactria, which produces finer and fairer fruit than any other country in the world; but it is particularly renowned for its onions, at once prodigiously large, and sweet as apples; pistaches, almonds, hazels, filberds, and figs abound; and Sir John Cardin tells us, that, at an entertainment near Spauhawn, he saw fifty several kinds of fruit provided for one desert [w].

Grain. THE grain most common in Persia is wheat, which is wonderfully fair and clean; as for barley, rice, and millet, they make bread of them in some places, as in Courdestan, when their wheat-bread is exhausted before the return of harvest. They do not cultivate in this country either oats or rye, except where the Armenians are settled, who make great use of the latter in Lent. Rice is the universal aliment of all sorts of people in Persia, for this reason they are extremely careful in its cultivation, for after they have sown it in the same manner with other grain, they in three months time transplant it root by root into fields which are well watered, otherwise it would never attain that perfection in which we find it there, since it is softer, sooner boiled, and more delicious to the taste, than the same grain in any other part of the world: it may be its taste is in some measure heightened by a practice they make use of to give it a glossy whiteness, viz. by cleansing it after its being beaten out of the husks with a mixture of flour and salt [x].

Flowers. THERE are in Persia all the sorts of flowers which are to be found in Europe, but they are not equally common in all the provinces of this empire; for there are fewer sorts of them, and fewer of each sort in the southern provinces than in the rest, excessive heat being more destructive to them than frost; which is the reason that in India they have fewer than in Persia, and that those in in Perſia have more vivid and delightful colours than thoſe either in India or in Europe. Hyrcania in this reſpect excels the reſt of Perſia, as much as Perſia does other countries; there are there whole foreſts of oranges, the jeſſamin ſingle and double; and there all the flowers we have in Europe, with many we have not, are profuſely ſcattered by nature. The moſt eaſtern part of this country, which is called Mazenderan, is a perfect parterre; from September to the end of April the whole country is covered with flowers as with a carpet, and the fruits are then in their beſt ſeaſon, the exceſſive heat and the malignity of the air deſtroying them in ſucceeding months. Towards Media, and on the northern frontiers of Arabia, the fields are adorned with tulips, anemonies, ranunculuſſes, of the brighteſt red, all ſpringing of themſelves in other places, as in the neighbourhood of Spauhawn jonquils grow wild and ſubſiſt all the winter. To recite all that is ſaid on this ſubject, by ſuch as have travelled through Perſia, would not be agreeable to the deſign of this work; let us content ourſelves therefore with adding, that roſes of uncommon beauty are frequent here, the buſhes bearing often three different coloured roſes on one branch, viz. yellow, yellow and black, and red. Pietro della Valle, who reports that the Perſians are wont to make uſe of art in dying their roots, in order to give different colours to their flowers, is in this circumſtance contradicted by Sir John Chardin, who affirms on the contrary, that their gardeners have little or no ſkill, and that the nobility of Perſia are ſo far from being curious in ſuch things, that they take no pleaſure in walking in their gardens, however beautifully and richly adorned, but content themſelves with ſingling out ſome ſpot or other on their firſt coming in, where they ſit down, and ſmoak, and drink coffee, as long as they remain there (Q) y.

(Q) Though there is ſcarce a province in Perſia which does not produce wine, yet the wine of ſome provinces is much more eſteemed than the wine of others; but Schiras wine is univerſally allowed to be the very beſt in Perſia, inſomuch, that it is a common proverb there, that to live happily one muſt eat the bread of Yezd, Metals or minerels.

METALS of all sorts are frequently found in Persia, especially of late years; and since the reign of Abas the Great, who was at immense pains to search them out, and to make the best use of mines where-ever they were discovered; iron, copper, and lead are common, but of gold and silver there are no mines open at present. As Persia is a very mountainous country, and as those mountains produce sulphur and salt-petre, if the inhabitants of this country were as active and inquisitive as amongst us, there is no doubt to be made, but that gold and silver both might be found in some part or other of the Persian dominions. In the country of Guendamon, near a town called Kervan, four leagues from Spauhawn, there is a silver mine, which has been formerly wrought, but through the scarcity of wood it produce has never equalled its expence; and it is therefore become a proverb in Persia to signify an unlucky undertaking, that it is like the mine of Kervan, where they lay out ten to receive nine. There were also silver mines in Kirman, and Mazenderan, but they are now abandoned for the same reason. Mines of iron are found in Hyrcania, in the northern Media, in Parthia, and in Bactria, but it is not so pliable as some European iron. The mines of steel are the most valuable of any in this country, and produce in such abundance, that Sir John Chardin tells us, it is not worth above sixpence a pound; this steel is so full of sulphur, that if you take off the filings thereof and cast them into the fire they make a report as loud as gunpowder; it is so fine and close, that it is as hard as a diamond, but on the other hand it is as brittle as glass, and as the Persian artizans know not how to correct this, they are able to make no very valuable instruments thereof. It is to be observed, that this steel is quite a different metal from iron, which appears

Yezd. and drink the wine of Schiras. They do not make use in this country of wooden vessels, as we do, for keeping their wine, but preserve it in earthen vessels, which they take care to have well glazed, otherwise they would imbibe a great quantity of wine. These pots are set in very handsome order in their caves or cellars, these too being as much adorned as such places will admit of, and have always a reservoir of water in the middle of them, that upon occasion people may be entertained there, and drink wine out of the reach of the sun (77).

(77) Tavern. tom. i. liv. iv. c. 2. p. 420.

appears from hence, that by giving it too fierce a fire it may be burnt and deſtroyed; the Perſians call both this and the ſteel of the Indies ſteel of Damaſcus, in order to diſtinguiſh it from European ſteel. Copper is found in greateſt quantity at Sary in the mountains of Mazenderan; there are alſo mines of it in Bactriana, and towards Caſbin; it is, however, poor and not fit for uſe, till mingled with either Swediſh copper or copper of Japan; the lead mines are towards Kirman and Yezde. Minerals are alſo found in Perſia in vaſt abundance, ſulphur and ſalt-petre are taken out of the mountain of Damavend, which ſeparates Hyrcania from Parthia. Salt is made here by nature without the leaſt aſſiſtance of art, as are alſo ſulphur and allom; nothing is more common than to meet in this country with plains, ſometimes ten leagues in length, covered intirely with ſalt, and others covered in like manner with ſulphur or allom; in Media and at Spauhawn the ſalt is dug out of mines, and is as hard and firm as free-ſtone, nay in Carmania the deſart the people actually uſe it as ſuch in building their houſes. Marble, free-ſtone, and ſlate, are found in great plenty about Hamadan; the marble is of four colours, white, black, red and black, and white; the beſt is found about Tauris, it is tranſparent as chryſtal, its colour is white mingled with a pale green, but it is ſo ſoft, that ſome have queſtioned whether it be really a ſtone or not; in the neighbourhood of the ſame city they find azure, but it is not ſo good as that of Tartary. In Hyrcania, and eſpecially in Mazenderan, the Petrolium or Naphthe is met with, of two ſorts, black and white, but the richeſt mine in Perſia is the Turquoiſe; there are two ſorts of this precious ſtone, one at Nichapour in Coraſſan, and the other in Phirous-cou, or mount Phirous, between Hyrcania and Parthia, four leagues journey from the Caſpian ſea; this mountain derives its name from the antient king of Perſia, who ſubdued this country, and in whoſe time the mine was found; nay the very ſtones carry his name alſo, for though we call them Turquoiſes, becauſe they come from the true and proper Turkey, yet throughout the eaſt they are ſtiled Firouze. They have of late years diſcovered another mine of the ſame ſort of ſtones, but they are by no means ſo valuable, but are diſtinguiſhed among us by the name of Turquoiſes of the new rock, to difference them from thoſe taken out of the antient mines, which belong entirely to the king, who, after ſelecting the moſt beautiful, ſells the reſt rest to merchants. The reason why these late discovered turquoises are less valued than those of the old mines is, because they are less beautiful in their colour, and what colour they have is not thoroughly fixed, but grows paler by degrees, and at last wears almost quite out [z].

Beasts tame and wild.

The horses of Persia are the most beautiful in the east, though they are not so much esteemed as those of Arabia; they are higher than our saddle horses, and their limbs as well proportioned as can be imagined; though there are great numbers of them, yet considering how much they are used, and the great demand made for them by the subjects of the mogul on one side, and of the grand-seignor on the other, they are held at a very great price, a fine horse being sometimes valued at a thousand crowns. Next to horses we may reckon mules, which are much esteemed here, and are very fine, and next to these we may justly place asses, of which they have in this country two sorts, the first bred in Persia, heavy and doltish as asses in other countries are, the other originally of an Arabian breed, the most docile and useful creature of its kind in the world; these are used wholly for the saddle, and are very frequently adorned with fine accoutrements, because of their easy manner of going, and their being very sure-footed. The clergy, that have not great benefices, affect to ride much on these Arabian asses, and on this account these animals also are kept at a high rate, a good ass being worth at Spauhawn twenty-five pistoles. Camels are numerous in Persia, and so much in esteem, that they are called Kechty-krouch-konion, i. e. the ships of the earth, because the inland trade is carried on by the help of these camels as the foreign by ships: To describe this animal particularly here would be improper, since they are rather more employed by the Arabians than by the Persians; let us content ourselves therefore with observing, that the Persians make use of three sorts, a smaller, a larger, and a swifter kind of camel, than are common elsewhere. The largest camels will travel with a load of twelve or thirteen hundred weight, the swifter kind of camel is called Revatrie, i. e. the goer, because they trot as fast as a horse can gallop. It is worthy of notice, that these creatures are managed entirely by the voice, those who direct them making use of a kind of song, and according cording as they keep a quicker, or ſlower, time, the camel moves briſker, or at its ordinary pace. As beef is little eat in Perſia, their oxen are generally employed in ploughing and other ſorts of labour. Hogs are no where bred in Perſia, if we except a province or two on the borders of the Caſpian ſea; ſheep and deer are very common throughout all Perſia, and as to the former, Sir John Chardin aſſures us, that he has ſeen flocks of them which covered four or five leagues of paſturage. As to beaſts of chace, they are not ſo common here as in moſt of the countries of Europe, becauſe it is generally ſpeaking devoid of wood; but in Hyrcania where there are woods, deer of all ſorts and gazells are found in great abundance; the gazell is a creature common throughout the eaſt, and ſo many of them have been brought into Europe that they need not any deſcription. As to wild beaſts, there are not a great number of them in this country, for the ſame reaſon which has been before aſſigned with reſpect to beaſts of chace, except in Hyrcania, where in the woods there are great numbers of lions, bears, tygers, leopards, &c. ſo that the antients ſpoke very truly of Hyrcania, when they called it the country of wild beaſts. One thing, however, is to be remarked, that neither here nor throughout all Perſia there are any wolves; but the chakal or jakal, a creature which makes a terrible noiſe, and which many good writers take for the Hyæna, is common every where, and has this peculiar quality, that it tears up dead bodies, if the graves are not carefully watched; as to inſects, the dryneſs of the air prevents our having much to ſay about them; therere are, however, in ſome provinces prodigious numbers of locuſts or graſs-hoppers, which come in ſuch clouds as to obſcure the air. In certain parts of the Perſian dominions they have large black ſcorpions, ſo venomous, that ſuch as are ſtung by them die in a few hours; in others they have lizards frightfully ugly, which are an ell long, and as thick as a large toad, their ſkins being as hard and tough as that of the ſea dog; they are ſaid to attack and kill men ſometimes, but that may be doubted. Among the reptiles of this country there is a long worm called by the inhabitants Hazar-pey, i. e. thouſand feet, its whole body is ſtuck with ſmall feet, with which it runs prodigiouſly faſt; it is longer and ſmaller than a caterpillar, and its bite is dangerous, and even mortal, if it gets into the ears [a].

[a] Chardin. tom. iii. p. 32. Tavern. tom. i. l. iv. c. 3. p. 423. Carreri, tom. ii. p. 215.

There are in Persia all the several sorts of fowl which we have in Europe, but not in such quantities, because they are chiefly bred and taken care of by the Armenians, who have frequently capons fatted to such a degree, that they are killed for nothing but their grease. There are, however, vast numbers of pigeons, wild and tame; and as the dung of pigeons is the best manure for melons, they keep great flocks all over the kingdom, so that it may be on grounds presumed, that no country in the world has such a number of pidgeon-houses; they are most of them six times as large as any we have in Europe, they are built of brick and plaistered on the outside, every thing being disposed in the most convenient manner possible for the preservation of these creatures. In the neighbourhood of Spauhawn they reckon more than three thousand of these pidgeon-houses, chiefly erected for the preservation of the dung, which is sold for about three-pence the dozen pound. The Persians call this manure Tchalgous, i. e. enlivening; it is a great diversion among the lower sort of people in town and country to catch pigeons, though it be forbidden; for this purpose they have pigeons so taught, that flying in one flock, they surround such wild ones as they find in a field and bring them back with them to their masters. People who follow this trade are called kestor-perron, or pigeon-stealers, and there are some so addicted to it, that they will lie out whole days in the very depth of winter, in order to carry on this foolish and wicked employment: for, under the notion of wild pigeons. they take every bodies pigeons they can find. The patridge of this country are the largest and finest in the world, being generally of the size of our fowls; as to water-fowl, they have geese, ducks, cranes, herons, and many other sorts, but they are more plenty in the northern than the southern provinces; the singing-birds here are of the same kinds we have in Europe; the nightingale is heard here all the year, but chiefly in the spring: martlets, which learn whatever words are taught them; and another bird of the same size, called by them Noura, which chatters continually, and repeats very pleasantly whatever it hears. As to the birds of a larger size, the most considerable is the Pelican, called by Persians Tacab, i. e. water-carrier, and also Misc, i. e. sheep, because it is as large as one of those animals, its feathers white and soft like those of a goose, its head is much larger in proportion than its body, and its beak from eighteen to twenty inches long, and as thick as ones arm, under this beak it has a

ſack or pouch, in which it preſerves a quantity of water for moiſtening its food; it uſually reſts this long beak on its back, which would otherwiſe incommode it very much. The Pelican lives chiefly upon fiſh, in taking of which it ſhews an admirable contrivance, by placing its beak in ſuch a manner under the water, as to catch them as it were in a net; when it opens its throat, the paſſage is large enough for a lamb; it it called the water-carrier, becauſe in Arabia and other places where water is hard to be had, it makes its neſt at a great diſtance from ſtreams or wells, foreſeeing, that there will be leſs danger of diſturbance in ſuch places, though this ſituation obliges the bird to fly ſometimes two days journey for a ſupply of water for her young, which ſhe brings in the ſack before-mentioned; and hence the fables of the antients of the pelican's tearing her breaſt open to feed her young. There are in Perſia various birds of prey, and in the mountains, about fifteen or twenty leagues from Schiras, there are ſome of the largeſt and fineſt in the world. The people take great pains in teaching them to fly at game, and the king has generally eight hundred of theſe birds, each of which has a perſon to attend it. The Perſian lords are likewiſe great lovers of falconry, and even the common people practice it much; for neither this, nor ſhooting, nor hunting with dogs, is forbid to the meaneſt man in Perſia [b].

Fiſhes. We ſhall divide the fiſhes of Perſia into freſh or ſalt water fiſh; as to the firſt, they are not very plenty, becauſe there are no great rivers in Perſia; however, there are of theſe three kinds, thoſe of the lakes, of the rivers, and of the keriſes or ſubterraneous paſſages; thoſe in the lakes are carps and ſhads; the river fiſh is chiefly barble, which is alſo the ſort of fiſh commonly met with in the ſubterraneous channels; they are very large, but they are by no means good, and their eggs are particularly dangerous, which is generally attributed to their never beholding the light of the ſun, but living altogether in theſe foul and cold ſtreams. There are in the river at Spauhawn a great number of crabs which crawl up the trees, and live night and day under the leaves, whence they are taken, and are eſteemed a very delicious food. As to the ſea-fiſh, no country is better ſerved; the Caſpian ſea, as we have ſeen before, contains very fine fiſh on one ſide, and the Perſian gulph on the other is believed to have more fiſh in it than any other ſea in the world; they fiſh there twice a day, morning and evening, and ſuch fiſh as are not ſold by ten o'clock in the morning, or before ſun-ſet, are thrown back into the ſea. There are taken on the coaſts of this gulph a ſort of fiſh, for which they have no particular name, its fleſh is of a red colour, very delicious, and ſome of them weigh two or three hundred pounds; its fleſh will take ſalt like beef, but it cannot be kept long, becauſe the ſalt in this country is very corroſive; for which reaſon, whenever they intend to keep either fiſh or fleſh, the inhabitants content themſelves either with drying it in the air, or by the help of ſmoke [c].

Natural rarities.

As we have now examined the productions of the air, earth, and waters of Perſia, we are next to ſpeak of the natural rarities which are to be found in this large empire. Of theſe the firſt we are to take notice of is a certain poiſonous ſhrub or plant, called by the Arabians Chark, by the Perſians Gulbad-Samour, i. e. the wind-poiſoning flower; it flowers like the thiſtle, and has pods filled with a thick white liquor of the conſiſtence of cream, ſharp and ſour to the taſte; it is affirmed, that where-ever the wind blows over a member of theſe plants, as it does frequently in Carmania the deſart, it thence contracts a poiſonous quality, which proves mortal to the next that reſpires it [d]. There is likewiſe another ſhrub in the ſame country, viz. Carmania the deſart, ſingularly noxious, it is called Kerzehre, i. e. aſſes poiſon, becauſe theſe creatures are apt to eat of its fruit which generally proves mortal. The very water that waſhes its roots is likewiſe held to be poiſonous, the trunk of this ſhrub is as large as one's leg, and it ſometimes grows to the height of ſix feet; its bark is remarkably rough, and of a bright green colour, its leaves perfectly round with a riſing ground in the middle; it bears a ſort of flower exactly reſembling the roſe, of a kind of fleſh-colour, whence it is apprehended, that the Greeks called it Rhododendron, the Arabians as well as the Perſians call it the gaul or poiſon of an aſs. Some are of opinion, that it is the Nerium of our herbaliſts, and the ſame plant that is called in French Roſage [e]. The goats, both wild and tame, which feed on the ſhore of the Perſian gulph, afford the the bezoar, ſo much eſteemed in medicine, but the very beſt is taken out of theſe creatures, in the province of Coraſſan or Bactria, and is thought to excel by far the bezoar of Golchonda and the reſt of the Indies. The naturaliſts in Perſia give it as their opinion, that the more dry and hard the food is, on which the animal lives, the more ſalutiferous and efficacious the bezoar found in it proves. Coraſſan and the coaſts of the Perſian gulph are allowed to produce the dryeſt herbage in the world. It is no fable, what has been reported, as to the formation of bezoar, for there is generally found in the core of ſuch balls, lumps, or ſtones as it grows in, a little ſprig of bramble or other buſh, round which by a continual acceſſion of matter the ball of bezoar is formed; this ſtone is here found in ſheep as well as in goats, but it is not ſo in the Indies. Its very name is of oriental extract, and ſhould be wrote Pe-zaor, i. e. poiſon killing, for the eaſtern people held it heretofore to be one of the ſtrongeſt counter-poiſons; quacks, however, were thoſe, who commended it moſt, and its virtues were rather taken upon truſt, than ſupported by experience: the number of the credulous, however, being great, raiſed its price very high: but of late years it is much ſunk in its reputation, as well in the eaſt as in Europe, it being now regarded chiefly as a ſudorific, and thought no very extraordinary thing in that claſs. The manner of giving it in Perſia is thus, they either ſcrape or powder it, and put about two or three grains for a doſe into a ſpoonful of roſe-water. While it was dear, it was often counterfeited, and the materials made uſe of to this end were, generally ſpeaking, reſin and Spaniſh wax. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that the poliſh which bezoar ſtones generally have, is artificial, for when they are taken out of the creature, their outſide is of a rough greeniſh hue, juſt as the ſtone appears within [f]. The Abmelec, i. e. water of locuſt, or graſhoppers, is a bird which deſerves to be deſcribed better perhaps than moſt others of which travellers have given us an account, becauſe the facts relating to it are not only ſtrange in themſelves, but are alſo ſo well and ſo diſtinctly atteſted, that, however ſurprizing they may ſeem, we cannot but afford them our belief. The food of this creature is the locuſt, or graſshopper. It is of

of the ſize of an ordinary hen, its feathers black, its wings large, and its fleſh of a greyiſh colour; they fly generally in great flocks, as the ſtarlings are wont to do with us; but the thing which renders theſe birds wonderful is, that they are ſo fond of the water of a certain fountain in Coraſſan, or Bactria, that where-ever that water is carried, they follow; on which account it is carefully preſerved; for where-ever the locuſts fall, the Armenian prieſts, who are provided with this water, bring a quantity of it, and place it in jars, or pour it into little channels in the fields, the next day whole troops of theſe birds arrive, and quickly deliver the people from the locuſt [g], (R). The river Mahmoudker, i. e.

(R) Sir John Chardin has given us in his deſcription of Perſia the following paſſage from an antient traveller in relation to this bird. "In Cyprus, about the time that the corn was ripe for the "ſickle the earth produced ſuch a quantity of cavaletts or locuſts, "that they obſcured ſometimes the ſplendor of the ſun. Where-"ever theſe came they burnt and eat up all; for this there was "no remedy, ſince as faſt as they were deſtroyed the earth pro-"duced more; God, however, raiſed them up a means for "their deliverance, which happened thus. In Perſia near the "city of Cuerch, there is a fountain of water, which has a won-"derful property of deſtroying theſe inſects; for a pitcher full "of this, being carried in the open air, without paſſing through "houſe or vault, and being ſet on a high place, certain birds "which follow it, and fly and cry after the men who carry it "from the fountain, come to the place where it is fixed; theſe "birds are red and black, and fly in great flocks together like "ſtarlings, the Turks and Perſians call them Muſulmans. Theſe "birds no ſooner came to Cyprus, but they deſtroyed the "locuſts with which the iſland was infeſted; but if the water be "ſpilt or loſt theſe creatures immediately diſappear, which ac-"cident fell out when the Turks took this iſland, for one of "them going up into the ſteeple of Famaguſta, and finding there "a pitcher of this water, he, fancying that it contained gold or "ſilver, or ſome precious thing, broke it, and ſpilt what was "therein, ſince which the Cypriots have been as much tormented "as ever by the locuſts" (77).

i. e. Mahmoud the deaf, is a noble natural rarity. At ſome diſtance from Spauhawn there is a range of rocks, plain and equal for a conſiderable ſpace, except that here and there they have openings, like the embraſures in baſtions, through which the winds paſs with ſurprizing velocity; through theſe rocks falls the river we mentioned into a noble baſon, partly wrought by the water itſelf, and partly formed by art. As one aſcends the mountain, certain natural chinks ſhew the water at the bottom of it, like a ſleeping lake covered with rocks and mountains; it is thought to be of unfathomable depth, and when ſtones are thrown into it, they make a moſt amazing noiſe, whence this river derives its name. After its deſcent from the baſon before mentioned, it rouls along the plain, till at laſt it falls into the river Zenderoud; ſome are of opinion, that this river does not derive its water from ſprings, but from the ſnow on the tops of the mountains, which, melting gradually, diſtills through the chinks of the rocks into the vaſt lake before mentioned; and this they think is in ſome meaſure proved from the acrimonious taſte of theſe waters, which is, however, loſt after it joins the Zenderoud [h]. Under a certain mountain called Tagte-Ruſtan, ſo called from the ruins of a building on the ſummit thereof, ſuppoſed to have been erected by the giant Ruſtan, there runs a grotto, which deſerves a place among the natural rarities of Perſia; from the top of this grotto there diſtills thro' the whole mountain, in two or three places, freſh water, which, falling into proper receptacles, forms two or three diſtinct ſtreams, which iſſue from thence to water the plain. In this grotto, about the beginning of April, a great number of Indians aſſemble to celebrate a feaſt in honour of a hermit or ſaint of theirs, who lived long here, and the whole cave is full of ſhreds or rags of peoples garments, who have come hither to be cured of their diſeaſes, and have found relief. Not far from hence there is a mountain, where they pick up a ſort of blue ſtones, very hard and ſhining, which they make uſe of in adorning their moſques, tombs, and other public buildings. We might add a multitude of other articles of this nature, if the deſcription of Perſia did not already begin to ſwell under our hands; though we

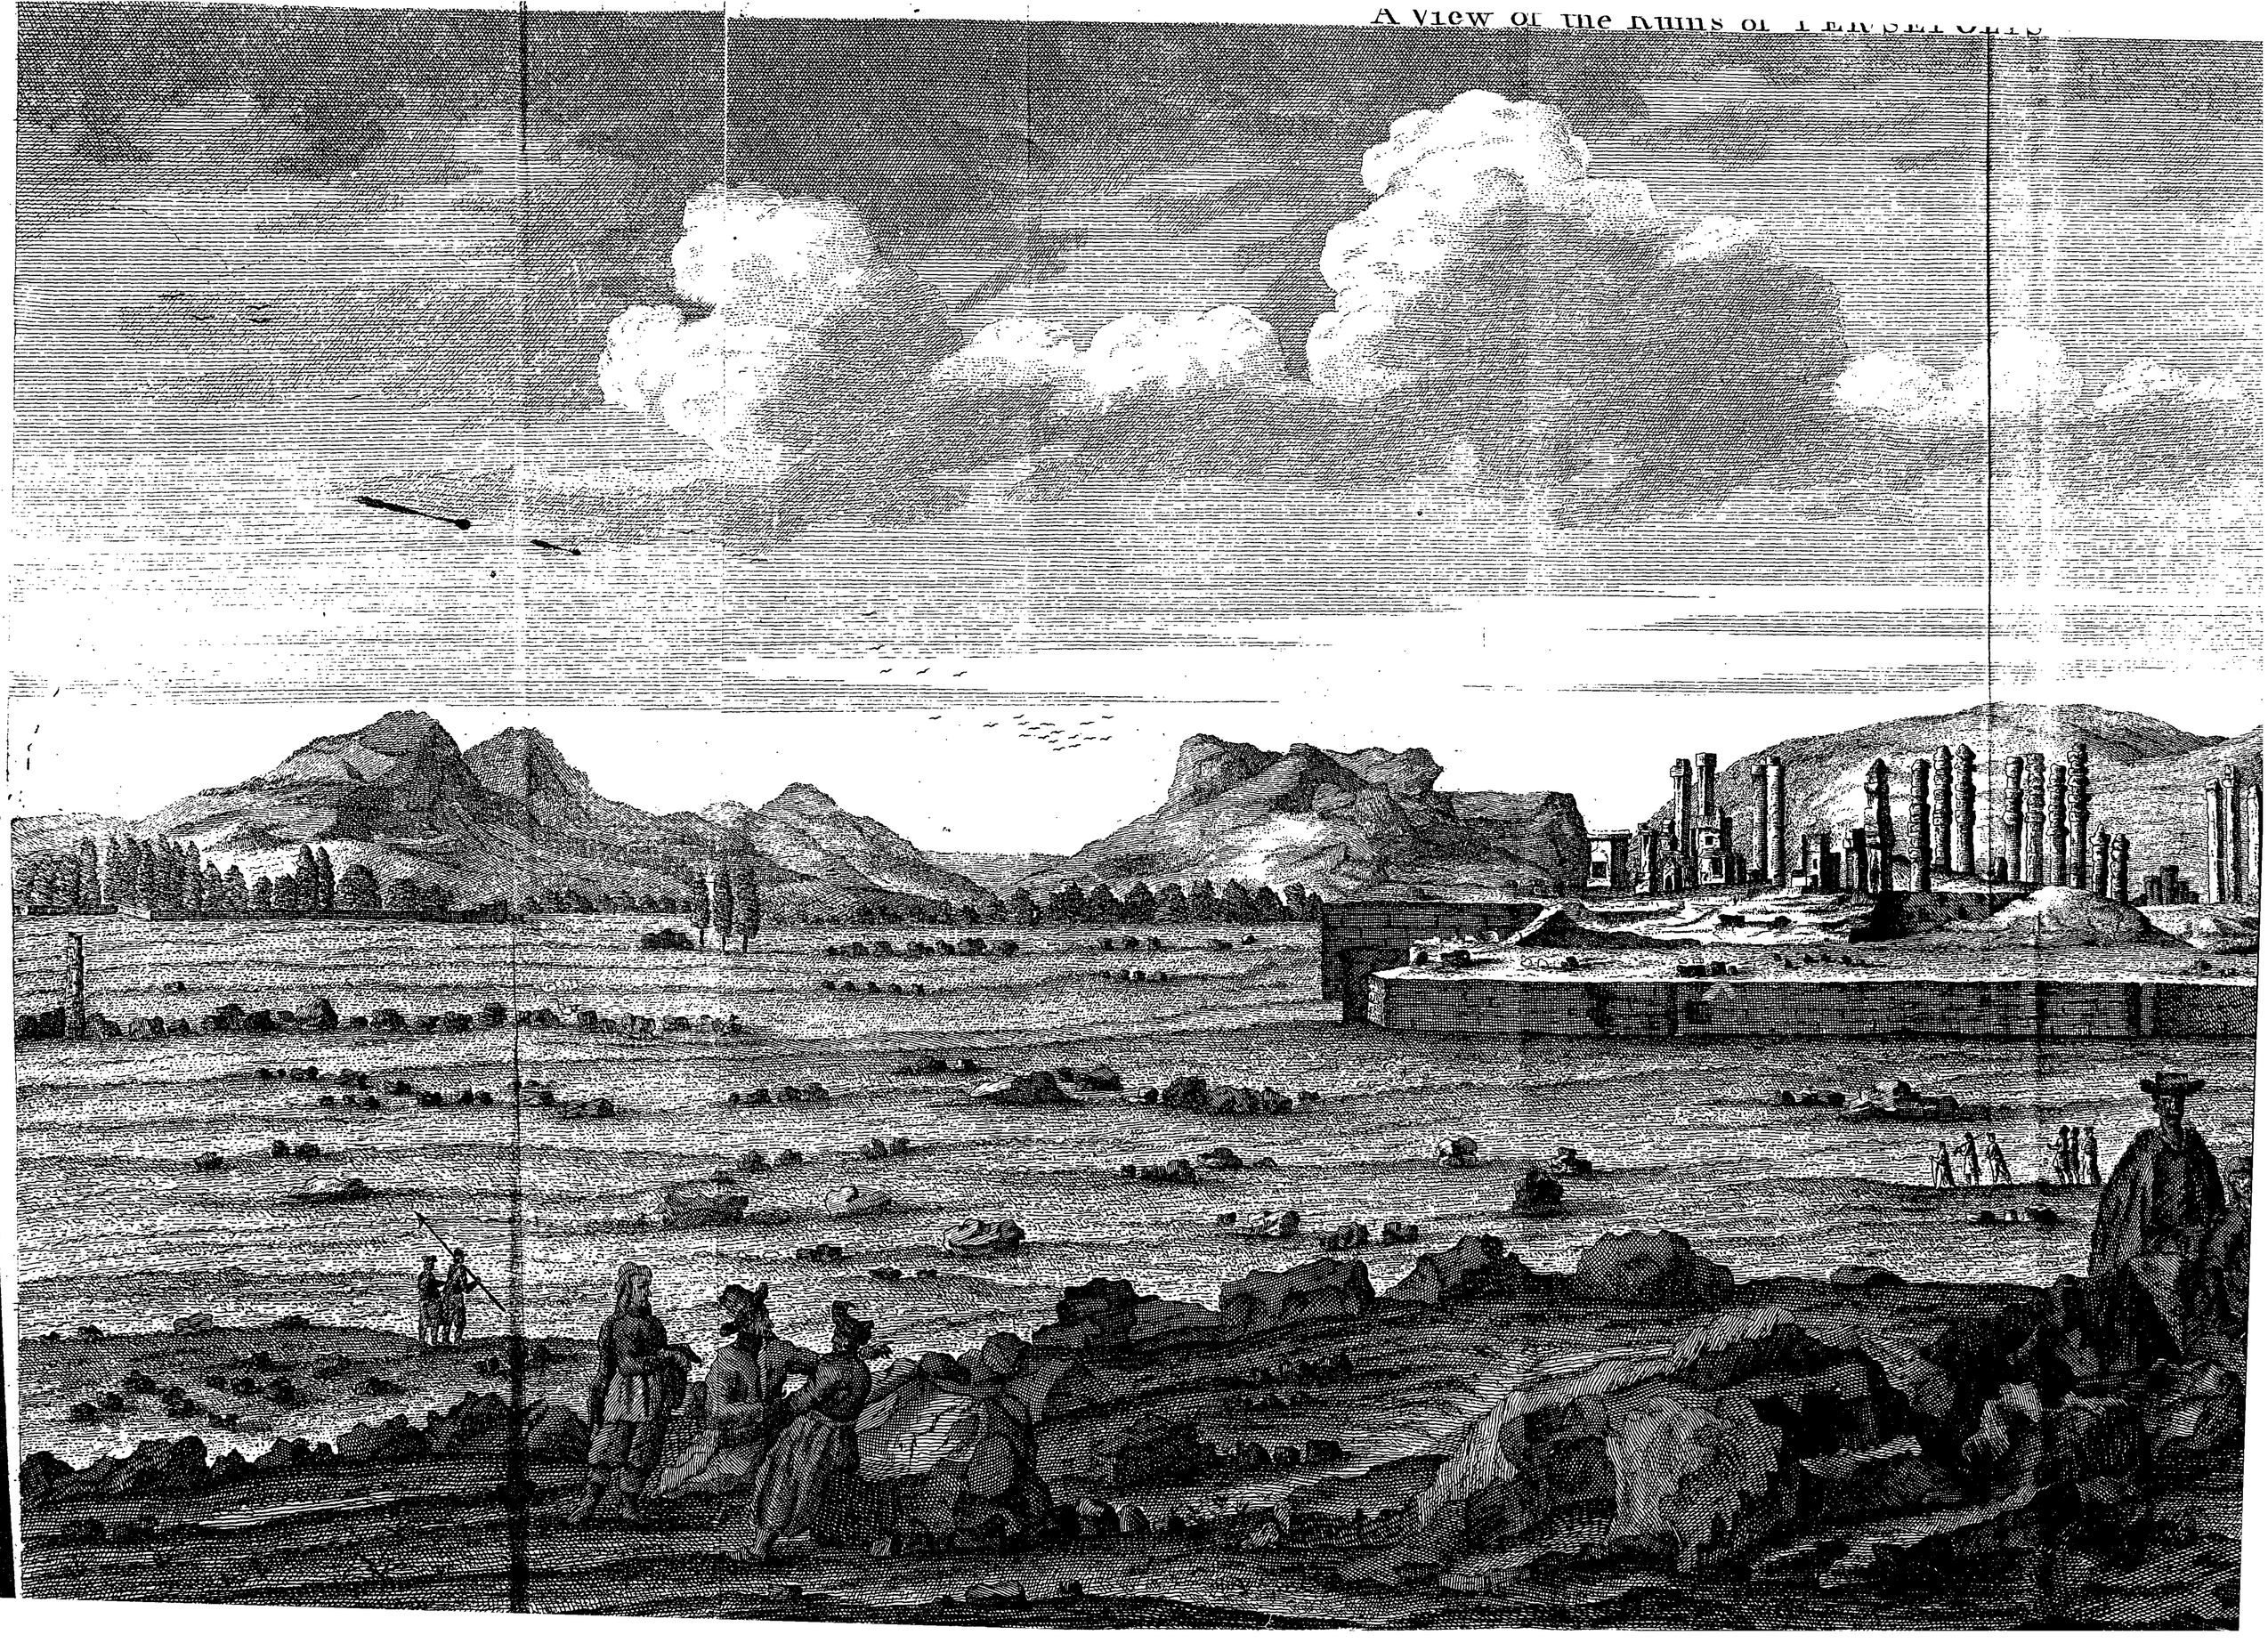
we have uſed all the caution in our power to prevent its containing ~~any thing, which may~~ not be uſeful and inſtructive, as well as entertaining, to the reader. Let us now paſs to the artificial rarities viſible in Perſia.



To begin then with the antient Perſepolis, the ruins of which ſtill teſtify the truth of what ſome antient writers have affirmed, that in the day of its proſperity it was one of the moſt auguſt cities in the world; nay, when we conſider all things, when we compare the deſcription of travellers one with another; when we conſider what is recorded of other cities, and what is ſtill to be ſeen of thoſe that were moſt famed; we ſhall be induced to confeſs, that the Perſian empire in all its grandeur could boaſt of nothing more glorious, nor hath left any thing more aſtoniſhing to poſterity, than the preport and ruins of this city. Should we pretend to give a full account of theſe noble remains, it would extend much farther than it is reaſonable this chapter ſhould go. We are writing a geographical deſcription of Perſia; we ought to omit nothing that may give the reader a diſtinct idea of this country, or which may enable him to underſtand thoroughly that hiſtory which is to follow; but in doing this we are to remember, that this geographical deſcription and this hiſtory are but ſections of a far greater work, and therefore we muſt have a care that it be of a piece, and not reſemble a ſtatue, with the body and arms of a man, and the hands, or even the finger, of a giant. For this reaſon we think ourſelves obliged to contract the many diffuſive accounts, which we have read of the ruins of Perſepolis, within reaſonable compaſs, giving the reader ſuch an account as may enable him to conceive how grand and how magnificent they are, and at the ſame time how uſeful fine draughts and exact relations of them may be, towards ſettling many points of antient hiſtory, and giving us juſt notions of the ſpirit and genius of that nation, whoſe capital this was. In doing this we ſhall not involve ourſelves in the diſputes of travellers, or attempt to decide whether Le Brun be in the right in his criticiſms, or rather invectives, againſt Sir John Chardin, our buſineſs is to give a ſuccinct proſpect of what has been ſaid of Perſepolis by authors antient and modern, and therefore to this let us come without further preface (S).

THE plain in which this famous city ſtood is one of the fineſt in Perſia, and, indeed, in all the eaſt; its length is

we have met with in collecting this article, we ſhall here give him a conciſe account of ſuch authors as have written on this ſubject, and thoſe deſcriptions we have peruſed. The firſt is Sir Thomas Herbert, who in his travels has a long relation, not only of what himſelf ſaw at Perſepolis, but of what has been ſaid by antient authors on that head. He has given us alſo a ſpecimen of the antient characters which are to be ſeen in the tables belonging to theſe ruins, which agrees perfectly well with the drawings of Le Brun. He has likewiſe inſerted his conjectures concerning theſe antiquities, which are neither improbable nor injudicious, but as we ſhall be obliged to mention moſt of theſe from M. Le Brun, it would be unneceſſary to trouble the reader with them here, we ſhall therefore add only to what we have already ſaid concerning the remarks of our worthy countryman, that the draught which he has left us of theſe ruins is far from being exact, and can hardly be ſaid to bear any reſemblance to the accurate deſcriptions of Chardin and Le Brun (79). Prior in point of time to Sir Thomas Herbert, but far inferior to him in every other reſpect, is the conciſe deſcription of theſe remains of antiquity given by our countryman Mr. Geofry Ducket, who in 1568 paſſed this way. The main of what he ſays may be reduced to this, that Perſepolis was 12 miles broad from gate to gate, whether this deſerves any credit, or whether it was the ſlip of an inadvertent author, as well as heedleſs obſerver, we preſume not to determine (80). John Albert de Mandelſloe, who obſerved theſe ruins in the year 1638, has left us a better deſcription of them than moſt of the writers who went before him, and as there is ſomething very plain and inſtructive in what he has left us on this ſubject, it cannot but be agreeable to the reader to compare what he has ſaid with what we have recorded in the text. "The "foundation or ground-work, on which this vaſt ſtructure was "erected, is raiſed 22 geometrical feet, having at each of its "four corners a pair of ſtairs of white marble of 95 ſteps, ſo "flat and broad that twelve horſes may go up conveniently "together a-breaſt. Before you come to the main body of the "ſtructure itſelf you paſs through a ſquare, where you ſee the "ruins of a wall and the remainders of two great gates, each "which have a horſe harneſſed and ſaddled after a very antic "manner, is eighteen or nineteen leagues, its breadth in some places two, in others four, and in some places six; it is watered

"manner, carved on one side, and on the other two creatures "resembling a horse, except that they have wings on each "side, and the head is crowned, and like that of a lion. On "the one side you see the ruins of 19 pillars of white and black "marble, the least of which are 8, and some 10, ells high "without the bases, but whether they had been intended for "the support of some large hall, or were built purely in the "air is not to be distinguished at this time". The same author speaking of some unintelligible characters engraven on a square pillar, tells us, there are twelve lines of them so well proportioned and nicely engraven, that they carry not in them the least mark of barbarity, but seem rather to have been wrought in a nice well-judging age; he complains of the rudness of the inhabitants, who, without the least regard to so noble and so antient a palace, carry away large quantities of marble and other stone, for the quicker dispatch of common and private buildings; he also deplores the want of perfect draughts of these wonderful fragments of the antient magnificence of Persia (81). Sir John Chardin in the year 1674, took a view of these ruins, examined them with great care and pains, as appears from the large and particular account of them inserted in the second volume of his travels; it is true, M. Le Brun, who stayed there a much longer time than he, and who had consequently a better opportunity of studying and describing what he saw than this gentleman had, attacks him very warmly on the head of his description; but whoever reads with calmness and candour, what Sir John Chardin, with great perspicuity and without the least affectation of learning, has delivered on this head, will be of opinion, that how much nicer and more exact soever the descriptions of M. Le Brun may be, yet both the narration and the cuts of Sir John Chardin are excellent in their kind, and serve to communicate to us a multitude of useful particulars, which are no where else recorded (82). Dr. Gemelli Carreri has written a whole chapter under the title of a description of the palace of Darius, and the ruins of the antient Persepolis; it is concise as all his descriptions are, and the observations he makes are short and weighty, according to the custom of Italian authors. He has illustrated his narration with a few prints, which serve to give a competent idea of the magnificence of this antient city, and to demonstrate the conformity there is between the tered by the great river Araxes or Bendemir, and by a multitude of rivulets beſides. Within the compaſs of this plain, there are between a thouſand and fifteen hundred villages, without reckoning thoſe in the mountains, all adorned with pleaſant gardens, and planted with ſhady trees. The entrance of this plain on the weſt ſide has received as much grandeur from nature, as the city it covers could do from induſtry or art. It conſiſts of a range of mountains ſteep and high, four leagues in length and about two miles broad, forming two flat banks, with a riſing terrace in the middle, the ſummit of which is perfectly plain, and even all of native rock. In this there are ſuch openings, and the terraces are ſo fine, and ſo even, that one would be tempted to think the whole the work of art, if the great extent the ſeveral accounts of theſe ruins contained in the works of intelligent writers (83). M. Le Brun, who arrogates to himſelf a great ſuperiority over all the writers on this ſubject, ſpent a long time in ſurveying, meaſuring, and drawing views of theſe fragments of antiquity, he has taken upwards of thirty folio pages in deſcribing what he ſaw, and remarking on the intentions of thoſe who deſigned the ſeveral figures, of which he has given us copies, which are certainly very uſeful, as well as very beautiful, ornaments to his book. Beſides, he has written a long diſſertation on the difference between his account and that of Sir John Chardin, wherein the antiquities of Perſepolis are farther explained (84). From theſe materials a very copious deſcription and very curious obſervations might have been thrown together, eſpecially when we conſider, that, beſides travellers, ſeveral other writers of great eminence have left us their thoughts on this ſubject, ſuch as the moſt judicious doctor Hyde in his learned book of the religion of the antient Perſians, wherein he has explained with great knowledge and learning ſome of the enigmatical figures repreſented on the walls and pillars of theſe antient buildings (85); but it is our buſineſs to hint only where the curious and inquiſitive reader may be informed at large, as to all the extraordinary particulars relating to theſe monuments of the Perſian glory, our deſcription being no more than the out-lines of a regular diſſertation on this head, for which what has been ſaid above, and what we have advanced in this note, will, we hope, ſerve for a ſufficient apology.

extent and prodigious elation thereof did not convince one, that it is a wonder too great for ought but nature to produce. Undoubtedly theſe banks were the advanced guards from Perſepolis took poſt, and from which Alexander found it ſo difficult to diſlodge them. One cannot from hence deſcry the ruins of the city, becauſe the banks are too high to be overlooked, but one can perceive on every ſide the ruins of walls and of edifices, which heretofore adorned the range of mountains, of which we are ſpeaking. On the weſt and on the north this city is defended in like manner, ſo that, conſidering the height and evenneſs of theſe banks, one may ſafely ſay, with a late ingenious traveller, that there is not in the world a place ſo fortified by nature [k]. The antient palace of the kings of Perſia, called by the inhabitants Chil-minar, i. e. forty columns, is ſituated at the foot of the mountain; and the walls of this ſuperb building are ſtill ſtanding on their ſides, and it has the mountain on the eaſt. The front is in extent ſix hundred paces from north to ſouth, and three hundred and ninety from eaſt to weſt, quite to the rock, without any ſtair-caſe on that ſide; till one comes to the mountain, where, by the help of certain ragged ſtones, it is eaſy to get to the loweſt part of the wall, where it is not above eighteen feet ſeven inches in height, and in ſome places not ſo high. This curtain is four hundred and ten paces in length, on the north, and one and twenty foot high in ſome places; but in moſt thirty quite to the mountain, where there is ſtill a corner of the wall, and in the middle an entrance, by which one may get up to the top by broken pieces of the rock. One finds alſo before the weſt ſide ſeveral rocks, which riſe towards the north, till they are even with the wall, appearing like a kind of platform, extending eighty paces before it. It ſeems, as if there had been a ſtair-caſe antiently on this ſide, and ſome buildings without this curtain, the rocks being very ſmooth in many places. On the top of this edifice there is a platform of 400 paces, which extends itſelf in the middle of the front-wall, quite to the mountain. Along this wall, and all the three ſides, runs a pavement of two ſtones joined together, which fill up a ſpace eight foot broad; part of theſe ſtones are eight, nine, and ten feet long, and ſix in breadth, but the reſt are ſmaller. The principal ſtair-caſe is not placed in the middle of the front, but much nearer nearer the north end than the ſouth, being ſix hundred paces diſtant from this, and only a hundred and ſixty-five from that; this ſtair-caſe is compoſed of two flights of ſtairs, forty-two feet aſunder at bottom. Its depth is 25 feet 7 inches to the wall, from whence proceed the ſteps, which are as long as the ſtair-caſe is deep, within five inches; each of theſe ſteps is four inches high, and fourteen in breadth, ſo that nothing can be more commodious. There are fifty-five on the north ſide, and fifty-three on the ſouth, but the latter are not ſo whole as the former. Aſcending thus high, one meets with a landing-place, fifty-one feet four inches broad, proportioned exactly to the breadth of the ſtair-caſe; the ſtones of this landing-place are of an extraordinary ſize. The two flights of the ſtair-caſe are ſeparated by the wall of the front, but in ſuch a manner, that they decline from each other to the middle, and incline towards each other from the middle to the top, which has a wonderful effect on the eye, and ſuits perfectly well with that magnificence which reigns throughout every other part of the building.

THE upper-part of this ſtair-caſe conſiſts of 48 ſteps on one ſide and on the other, ſome of which are damaged, notwithſtanding they are cut in the rock. At the top of theſe there is another landing-place, between the flights of ſtairs, 75 feet broad, paved with great ſtones, ſome 13 or 14 feet long, and 7 or 8 broad [1] (T).

To

[1] Le Brun, ubi ſupr. Chardin, ubi ſupr.

(T) In the deſcription in our text we have adhered pretty cloſely to M. le Brun, and that for many reaſons; firſt, becauſe his profeſſion, which was that of a painter, rendered him more capable of deſcribing minutely, and of deſigning exactly, all the wonders of Perſepolis, than any former traveller, whom either buſineſs or curioſity had led that way. Secondly, this gentleman had, as we have more than once hinted, determined with himſelf to conſider more attentively, and to examine more nicely, theſe relics of architecture, than any other author had done. Thirdly, he had not only all the authors we have mentioned in our laſt note, but Monſ. Chardin's curious plans to direct him, and it may be to correct him, in his notions on that head. Fourthly, there is ſuch an agreement, in material points at leaſt, between his accounts and thoſe of Chardin, notwith-

To ſpeak now of what is to be ſeen when one is amongſt theſe ruins. The firſt thing that ſalutes the eye in a ſtrait line, 42 feet diſtant from the front before deſcribed, are two great porticoes and two columns. The pavement of the firſt is much damaged by time, and the ſecond is ſunk five withſtanding his affecting on all occaſions to quarrel with that gentleman's ſentiments, that we did not think it at all neceſſary to trouble the reader with any particulars of a diſpute of no great importance in itſelf, and which, though proſecuted with warmth, ſeems to have been commenced out of vanity. It may not be amiſs to obſerve here, that the fame of theſe ruins has, for the two or three laſt centuries, been ſo great, and the deſires of the Virtuoſi to ſee exact plans of them ſo ſtrong, that ſome have ventured to publiſh the conceptions of their own brains for the antiquities of Chelminar. Such was the view of Perſepolis ſent into the world by Sebaſtian Serlio an Italian architect, in his account of noble buildings antient and modern, ſince therein are found juſt forty columns adorned with chapiters of the Corinthian order, which no traveller ever had the happineſs to ſee. In the voyages of John Struys, amongſt a multitude of other ſtrange things and temerarious aſſertions, we have a wild deſcription of theſe ruins, and a wilder plan, ſaid in the title page of the book to be drawn by the author's own hand, which, if it were, he certainly drew by gueſs; ſince it is not only quite different from the plans publiſhed by others, but contains alſo ſuch palpable miſtakes, as never could have been committed by an eye-witneſs of theſe noble works, eſpecially one who looked on them with a deſign of deſcribing them to the reſt of mankind. We are not, however, to fancy, that wherever travellers differ in their accounts, one of them muſt be miſtaken. M. Le Brun and Sir John Chardin vary very little in what they ſay, relating to the pillars yet ſtanding at Perſepolis; but there is a conſiderable difference on this head between what they ſay and what we find recorded in the writings of Figueroa, Herbert, and Thevenot, all of whom teſtify nearly to the ſame point. Time and the barbarity of the modern Perſians, who make very little account of theſe ruins, have made conſiderable alterations ſince they were firſt deſcribed; and it is very probable, that whoever ſees them twenty years hence, will find them not exactly anſwerable to what is ſaid of them by M. Le Brun (86).

(86) Chardin. voyag. tom. ii. p. 152.

five feet lower than the former, theſe porticoes are 22 feet 4 inches in depth, and 13 feet 4 inches in breadth. One ſees in the front of each pilaſter a large figure cut in baſs-relief, 22 feet in length from its fore to its hind-feet, and 14 feet and a half high. The heads of theſe animals are entirely deſtroyed, their breaſt and feet project from the pilaſter, and their bodies are very much damaged. Thoſe of the firſt portico front towards the ſtair-caſe, and thoſe of the ſecond which have wings on their bodies towards the mountains. One ſees above the pilaſters certain characters, but they are ſo ſmall and ſo high that one can make nothing of them. The firſt portico is ſtill 29 feet high, and the ſecond 28. The baſes of the pilaſters are five feet two inches high. The animals are not carved out of one ſtone, but out of three joined together for that purpoſe. In the preſent condition it is not eaſy to decide what they were intended for, tho' many authors have given the world their conjectures, of which the reader will find ſome account in the authors cited at the bottom of the page, and will judge for himſelf which is the moſt probable of thoſe taken notice of there.

THE two columns which ſtand between the two porticoes are more entire than any other part of the ruins. They are of white marble, fluted, and wonderfully beautiful, that is as to their chapiters and other ornaments, for as to their baſes they are covered with earth; they are 26 feet from the firſt portico, and 56 from the ſecond, 14 feet in circumference, and 54 high. There were certainly two others between theſe and the laſt portico, of which there are ſtill ſome remains, great pieces of marble lying about half buried in the earth: 52 feet from the laſt mentioned portico ſouthward, there is a large ciſtern cut out of a whole ſtone, 20 feet long, 17 feet 5 inches broad, and three feet above the earth. From thence to the wall there is a ſpace of about 130 paces, in which one finds nothing but broken pieces of ſtone, and the remains of a column which appears to have been unfluted, and therein differs from all the reſt; it is about two feet in compaſs, and 12 and a half long: from it to the mountain, there is nothing to be met with but wild heaps of broken ſtones.

Turning from theſe porticoes to the ſouth, one ſees at the diſtance of 172 feet another ſtair-caſe, conſiſting of two flights of ſteps in the ſame manner as the former, one fronting towards the eaſt, the other towards the weſt. The wall is ſtill about ſix feet 7 inches high, but in the middle 'tis almoſt entirely ruined. The extent is 83 feet of the eaſt flight of ſtairs, and it is evident enough from the lowermoſt of them, that they were adorned with figures in baſs-relief. On the top of the ſtair-caſe are ſtill ſome foliages viſible, with figures in baſs-relief of a lion tearing a bull, larger than the life. The ſtair-caſe is half buried in earth, and one ſees certain ſmall figures on the wall, on both ſides. The weſt flight conſiſts of 28 ſteps; the other, having ſuffered more by the acceſſion of the earth, has now but 18, each 17 feet long, three inches high, 14 inches and a half broad. There are many of theſe towards the top broken, and two or three entirely deſtroyed, tho' cut out of the rock. At the end of the landing-place, from the ſtair-caſe, there is another front, whereon there are three rows of ſmall figures, one above another; of the firſt row there is nothing now to be ſeen but the parts below the girdle, the reſt being deſtroyed by time; the ſecond row, which is the beſt preſerved, has notwithſtanding received great injuries; and as to the third, there is nothing now above ground but their heads. Theſe figures are two feet nine inches high, and the wall, of which there is ſtill five feet three inches above ground, is 98 feet in extent from the firſt ſtep to its left corner, where there is another ſtair-caſe, the ſteps of which are exactly of the ſame ſize with thoſe before deſcribed. From what remains of the inner wall it appears, that it alſo was covered with ſmall figures. At the end of the ſtair-caſe there is another wall, which extends 90 feet beyond the landing-place; the corner turns a little to the ſouth, and goes no farther, becauſe the earth is there at the ſame height; returning to the weſt flight of ſteps of the ſtair-caſe before mentioned, we meet with a wall 45 feet in length, beyond the bottom of the ſtair-caſe, with an interval of 67 feet to the weſt front. This ſide like the former is adorned with three rows of figures, and a lion tearing a bull or an aſs, with a horn in its forehead; between theſe animals and the figures there is a ſquare ſpace filled with characters, of which the higheſt are quite effaced;

the figures on this ſide are fairer than on the other, the ground being leſs elevated ; there are 25 ſteps here. The wall from the ſtair-caſe weſtward extends quite to the front; but beyond the ſtair-caſe is unadorned with figures.

At the ſtep of the ſtair-caſe, between the two flights of ſtairs, there is an open place, paved with very large ſtones between the ſtair-caſe and the firſt columns, which are 22 feet and two inches diſtant ; they ſtand in two rows, each conſiſting of ſix columns, of which there is only one remaining entire, eight baſes, and ſome broken pieces of the reſt. There are ſix rows of columns 70 feet eight inches diſtant from theſe, each row conſiſting of ſix columns. Theſe thirty ſix columns are 22 feet two inches one from the other, as the former are. There are ſtill ſeven of theſe intire, with the baſes of all the reſt, but much broken and defaced. Of thoſe which are left, there is one of the firſt row, one of the ſecond, two of the third, and one of each of the reſt. One finds, between theſe columns and thoſe before mentioned, ſeveral large ſtones, heretofore part of ſome ſubterraneous building. Seventy feet eight inches weſt from theſe columns, towards the front of the ſtair-caſe, there were 12 columns more diſpoſed in two rows, of which there are only five remaining. The baſes of ſeven more are viſible, and the ground is covered with ruins of thoſe which are decayed. One can diſcover, however, among the fragments of thoſe ornaments, which lie half interred, that each of theſe columns was ſurmounted by the figure of a camel kneeling. To the ſouth of theſe columns ſtands the edifice moſt elevated of any in theſe ruins, but it is neceſſary for us to obſerve, that on the eaſt there are ſtill diſcernable two rows of columns, conſiſting of ſix each, of which the baſes of four or five remain ſtill above the earth, and in all appearance theſe were oppoſed to other rows of columns which were in the front. Advancing ſtill towards the mountains, one finds the ruins of many buildings, conſiſting of porticoes, paſſages, and windows, the porticoes are adorned with figures, and theſe ruins take up a great ſpace ; but to return to the edifice ſpoken of before, it extends 118 feet from the columns, and the wall of its front is yet five feet ſeven inches high, compoſed of one row of ſtones only, ſome of which are eight feet broad, extending from eaſt to weſt 113 feet.

There is before the edifice certain ſtone foundations ſtill viſible, but what end they ſerved cannot be gueſſed, ſince there is no ſtair-caſe on this ſide. This wall is adorned with no ſort of ornament as the reſt are; there are, however, two ſtair-caſes, one on the north, the other on the ſouth-ſide, but almoſt entirely ruined; on the landing-place, however, we ſtill diſcover the remains of porticoes which an earthquake threw down; all the reſt of the building, which conſiſts of great and little porticoes, is entirely ruined, the ground covered with the fragments is about 147 feet in length, and nearly ſquare. On the north there are two porticoes, and three niches or windows walled up, and on the ſouth a portico and four windows open. There are two other porticoes, which are not covered, on the weſt, with two openings; and a third to the eaſt, with three niches or windows walled up. Six of theſe openings are without cornices, and there remains but half a one to the eaſt. One ſees under the two porticoes on the north, on each ſide, the figure of a man, and of two women from their knees upwards, their legs being covered with earth; under one of thoſe on the weſt ſide, there is the figure of a man fighting with a bull, which has a horn in its forehead, the man holds this with his left hand, and ſtrikes a poignard into the belly of the beaſt with his right; on the other ſide the figures are the ſame, excepting only, that the man holds the horn with his right hand, and ſtabs the beaſt with his left. In the ſecond portico there is the figure of a man holding a beaſt, reſembling either a deer or a lion, by ſuch a horn in its forehead, and with wings upon his back. Under the portico to the north, the ſame figures are viſible, only the man combats here a true lion, which he holds by the mane; theſe figures have half their legs buried under the earth. On both ſides of the partico towards the ſouth, there is the figure of a man, with an ornament on his head reſembling a crown, attended by two women, one of whom holds an umbrella over his head, and the other has ſome enſign of authority in her hand. Above theſe figures are three niches full of characters. On the pilaſters of the firſt portico, which are out of their places, and lie near the flight of ſtairs laſt mentioned, there are two men, each armed with a lance, which the one holds with both hands, the other only in his left; one of theſe only is entire.

Behind

Behind this edifice one finds another of much the ſame kind, except that it is 38 feet longer, with a niche or window blocked up, and another open, with two ſtones ſtanding up, one on the right hand, the other on the left: Of theſe, that towards the eaſt is broken, the other towards the weſt is ſtill 28 feet high. There is on the top of this ſtone three niches or tablets full of characters, and a fourth below which ſeems to have been cut after the reſt. The like inſcriptions are ſeen in the niches or windows before-mentioned, each tablet conſiſting of one ſtone only. To the ſouth there are two flights of ſtairs, the one to the eaſt, the other to the weſt; but of theſe only five ſteps are remaining; and on the wings, as well as on the wall which ſeparates them, there are ſtill viſible ſome ſmall figures and foliages, though half buried in the ground, a hundred feet from thence to the ſouth, the laſt ruins are found of theſe edifices, conſiſting chiefly of porticoes and encloſed ſpaces of ground, and between theſe two heaps of ruins another ſtair-caſe, of which only ſeven ſteps are remaining, which ſerve, however, to ſhew that antiently they were adorned with figures and foliages. On the eaſt-ſide of this ſtair-caſe there are certain ſubterraneous paſſages, in which the inhabitants imagine great treaſures are hid. M. Le Brun entered them, as ſeveral travellers have done before, but was quickly obliged to return without making any diſcoveries, the paſſages being ſo narrow, and ſo dark, and moiſt, that it was impoſſible to go far. However, even theſe experiments are ſufficient to ſhew, that the conjectures of the inhabitants are very indifferently founded, ſince from the ſtructure of theſe vaults we are left to judge they were rather intended for carrying off water, or ſome ſuch like purpoſe, than to be made the repoſitories of royal treaſures [m].

THERE would be no difficulty in following M. Le Brun's deſcription much farther, or in adding thereto his particular delineations of the pillars, niches, and figures ſpoken of before; but for the reaſons already given we ſhall ſtop here, that we may have room to ſay ſomewhat as to the conjectures of the learned, concerning theſe remains of the the magnificence of antient times. The processions delineated on the walls, the vases in the hands of many of the figures, the several tablets of unknown characters, and the many hieroglyphical representations, which are still seen in these ruins, have led some great men into an opinion, that this antient structure was a temple, dedicated to the deities worshipped in Persia. Others, with much greater reason, have delivered it as their sentiment, that these ruins are what remain of the antient palace of Persepolis, which they think strongly confirm'd by the description left us by antient authors of that noble pile of building. As to the figures in procession, those who adhere to this notion say, that they represent a birth-day feast of one of the Persian emperors, when his courtiers were wont to bring him presents; as to the inscriptions they are, generally speaking, illegible, by the Persees or antient Persians themselves, so that hardly any argument can be deduced from them. The hieroglyphics might as well serve for ornaments to a palace as to a temple, and, it may be, were some of the spoils of Egypt, brought thence by Cambyses army, led by Smerdis the Magian. However this be, certain it is, that the habits of these figures agree perfectly well with the descriptions of the old Median and Persian robes, as they are recorded in Greek writers. On the whole, therefore, it may be presumed, that whatever this edifice was, it was actually erected by the kings of the first race, since nothing seen there carries the aspect of latter times; but whether Cyrus was the founder, or whether this palace was begun by Darius, and finished by Xerxes, is a point not easily, if at all, to be determined. From a view of the figures visible on the walls, pillars, &c. it seems probable to us, that they were enigmatical representations, at least for the most part, of the course of the heavenly bodies, and of the effects produced by them; but of this, and of the reasons which incline us to believe it, we shall take occasion to discourse more largely in our section on the religion of the antient Persians. The traditions of the natives in respect to these antiquities are generally represented by travellers, as confused, extravagant, and not to be depended on. This may, however, in some measure arise from their want of acquaintance with oriental history, which is not always so fabulous and incoherent as it is represented to be; there is, and there ever will be, a wide difference between the narrative ſtyle of theſe eaſtern nations, and that in uſe amongſt us; but as we ſhall elſewhere ſhew, even in reſpect to theſe ruins, certainty may be deduced, as well from the hyperbolical relations of eaſtern writers, as from the artful memoirs of ſome of our weſtern hiſtorians (V).

At

(V) In this note we intend to examine, in as ſhort a compaſs as poſſible, what antient writers have delivered concerning the city and palace of Perſepolis; to begin then with what is ſaid by Diodorus the Sicilian on this ſubject. He relates, that, after paſſing the river Araxes, Alexander met with near 800 Greeks, moſt of them old men, ſome having their hands, others their feet, ſome their ears, and ſome their noſes, cut off, which had been done by the Perſians of that diſtrict; which ſo incenſed him, eſpecially againſt the inhabitants of Perſepolis, that he called ſays our author, the Macedonians together and told them, "That Perſepolis, the metropolis of Perſia, of all the cities "of Aſia, had done moſt miſchief to the Grecians, and "therefore he gave it up to the plunder and ſpoil of the "ſoldiers, except the king's palace. This was the richeſt "city of any under the ſun, and for many ages all the "private houſes were full of all ſorts of wealth, and what-"ever was deſirable. The Macedonians therefore, forcing "into the city, put all the men to the ſword, and rifled "and carried away every man's goods and eſtate, amongſt "which was abundance of rich and coſtly furniture, and or-"naments of all ſorts. In this place was hurried away here "and there vaſt quantities of ſilver, and no leſs of gold, "great numbers of rich garments, ſome of purple, others em-"broidered with gold, all which became a plentiful prey to "the ravenous ſoldiers. And thus the royal ſeat of the "Perſians, once famous throughout the world, was now ex-"poſed to ſcorn and contempt, and rifled from top to bot-"tom. For, though every place was full of rich ſpoil, yet the "covetouſneſs of the Macedonians was inſatiably ſtill thirſting "after more. And they were ſo eager in plundering, that "they fought one with another with drawn ſwords, and many "who were conceived to have got a greater ſhare than the "reſt, were killed in the quarrel. Some things that were of "extraor-

At two leagues diſtance from theſe ruins, there is a famous mountain, ſeated between two of the fineſt plains in the world, and which is called by the inhabitants by ſeveral names; ſometimes they ſtyle it Kabreſton-Gauron, i. e. the ſepulchres of the Gaurs; ſometimes Nachs Ruſtan, the pictures of Ruſtan; and ſometimes Takt-Ruſtan, i. e. the throne of Ruſtan. This Ruſtan, as we have obſerved before, is the Hercules of the eaſt, or rather the Amadis, for the ſtories they tell of him are alike fabulous and romantick. Our buſineſs, however, is not with them, but with the mountain, which is one entire rock, harder and capable of a better poliſh than marble; it is levelled by art, its ſides are perfectly perpendicular, ſo that it looks like a large wall, and upon it there are figures repreſented in baſs-relief, with great ſkill and beauty. The firſt of theſe, which was about the height of a pike from the ground, repreſents

" extraordinary value they divided with their ſwords, and each " took a ſhare; others in rage cut off the hands of ſuch " as laid hold upon a thing that was in diſpute. They firſt " raviſhed the women, as they were in their jewels and rich " attire, and then ſold them for ſlaves. So that by how " much Perſepolis excelled all the other cities in glory and " worldly felicity, by ſo much more was the meaſure of their " miſery and calamity. Then Alexander ſeized upon all the " treaſures in the citadel, which was a vaſt quantity of gold " and ſilver of the public revenues that had been heaping " up, and depoſited there from the time of Cyrus, the firſt " king of Perſia, to that day. For there was found an hundred and twenty thouſand talents, reckoning the gold after the rate of ſilver. Part of this treaſure he took for " the uſe of the war, and ordered another part of it to be " treaſured up at Suſa. To this purpoſe, he ordered, that a " multitude of mules, both for draught and carriage, and " three thouſand camels with pack-ſaddles ſhould be brought " out of Babylon, Meſopotamia, and Suſa, and with theſe " he conveyed all the treaſures to the ſeveral places he had " appointed. For, by reaſon of his great hatred to the inhabitants, he was reſolved not to truſt them with any thing, " but utterly to ruin and deſtroy Perſepolis: Of whoſe palace in regard of its ſtately ſtructure, we conceive it " will not be impertinent if we ſay ſomething. This " ſtately fabrick or citadel was ſurrounded with a treble " wall;

repreſents a combat between two knights, mounted on horſeback, each of them having an iron mace in his left-hand. He on the right has a bonnet on his head, and holds out in his right-hand a large ring of iron, of which the other knight ſeems to take hold with his right-hand; at the foot of each of their horſes lies a man grovelling on the ground. All theſe figures, as well of horſes as of men, are gigantic; and as to the meaning of the piece, if we truſt tradition and the Perſian poets, it is thus to be underſtood; they

" wall: the firſt was ſixteen cubits high, adorned with many " ſumptuous buildings, and lofty turrets. The ſecond was " like to the firſt, but as high again. The third was drawn " like a quadrant four ſquare, ſixty cubits high, all of the " hardeſt marble, and ſo cemented as to continue to the lateſt " time. On the four ſides are brazen gates, near to which " there are curtains or palliſades of the ſame metal, twenty cu- " bits high, theſe were raiſed as well to ſtrike the beholder with " terror, as the ſtrengthening and ſecurity of the place. On " the eaſt ſide of the citadel, about four hundred feet diſtant, " ſtood a mountain called the royal mount, for here are all the " ſepulchres of the kings, many apartments and little cells be- " ing cut into the midſt of the rock; into which cells there is " made no direct paſſage, but the coffins with the dead bodies " are by machines hoiſted up, and ſo let down into theſe vaults. " In this citadel were many ſtately lodgings, both for the king " and his ſoldiers, of excellent workmanſhip, and treaſury " chambers moſt commodiouſly contrived for the laying up of " money. Here Alexander made a ſumptuous feaſt for the en- " tertainment of his friends, in commemoration of his victory, " and offered magnificent ſacrifices to the gods. At this feaſt " were entertained whores who proſtituted their bodies for hire, " where the cups went ſo high, and the reins ſo let looſe to drunk- " enneſs and debauchery, that many were both drunk and mad. " Among the reſt there was at that time a curteſan, called " Thais, an Athenian, that ſaid Alexander would perform the " moſt glorious act of any that ever he had done, if while he " was feaſting with them he would burn the palace, and ſo the " glory and renown of Perſia might be ſaid to be brought to " nothing in a moment by the hands of women. This ſpread- " ing abroad, and coming to the ears of the young men, (who " commonly make little uſe of reaſon when drink is in their " heads) preſently one cries out, Come on, bring us fire-brands, " and ſo incites the reſt to fire the citadel, to revenge that impiety " the Perſians had committed in deſtroying the temples of the " Grecians. At this others with joy ſet up a ſhout, but ſaid, " that they ſay, that one of theſe cavaliers was Ruſtan or Ruſtem the ſon of Sal the white, the ſon of Sam, the ſon of Noramon king of the Indies; the ſecond Ruſtan or Ruſtem, the ſon of Tahmour king of Perſia; theſe two princes are ſaid to be engaged in long and bloody wars, and at laſt to have agreed to determine their quarrels by a combat. The manner in which this was to be performed was thus: one extended a ring of iron in his right-hand which the other laid hold of, it being previouſly agreed, that whoever could wrench from the other this iron ring, ſhould be eſteemed the conqueror, and ſhould be obeyed for the future by him who loſt it; they ſay too, that the king of Perſia, who is the

" that ſo brave an exploit belonged only to Alexander to per" form. The king ſtirred up at thoſe words embraced the " motion, upon which as many as were preſent left their cups " and leaped from the table, and ſaid, that they would now ce" lebrate a victorious feſtival to Bacchus. Hereupon multitudes " of fire-brands were preſently got together, and all the wo" men that played upon muſical inſtruments, which were at the
" feaſt, were called for, and then the king with ſongs, pipes,
" and flutes, bravely led the way to this noble expedition, con" trived and managed by this whore, Thais, who next after the " king, threw the firſt fire-brand into the palace. This pre" cedent was preſently followed by the reſt, ſo that, in very
" ſhort time, the whole fabric by the violence of the fire was " conſumed to aſhes (87)". We have tranſcribed this long paſſage to avoid a multitude of quotations, ſince ſeveral authors, have either copied Diodorus, or the authors made uſe of by him. Plutarch, in his life of Alexander, gives us an account of this tranſaction, little different from that which we have juſt ſeen; indeed, he ſpeaks leſs confidently of the ſtory of Thais than Diodorus does, whence ſome have ſuſpected the truth of it, and whether Thais had any concern therein or no. Arrian ſays, that Alexander ſeized at Paſſagardon on the money which had been laid up there by Cyrus, and then adds, " the royal " palace of the Perſian monarchs he burnt, much againſt the " will of Parmenio, who intreated him to leave it untouched,
" not only becauſe it was improper to ſpoil and deſtroy what " he had gained by his valour, but that he would thereby diſ-
" oblige the Aſiatics, and render them leſs benevolent to him, " for they would then ſuppoſe that he would not keep Aſia in " his poſſeſſion, but abandon it as ſoon as it was conquered and " laid waſte. To which Alexander made anſwer, that he was the perſon repreſented by the figure, having a long beard, vanquiſhed the king of the Indies in this engagement. Beſides this ring and mace, theſe combatants have iron bullets hanging by chains at the ſides of their horſes, which it is to be ſuppoſed they let fly at each other in the ſame manner as peaſants ſometimes fight with their flails. Joining to this figure there is another, wherein the men are repreſented as of a leſs ſtature than in that before deſcribed, viz. not above ſeven foot high; there is a perſon repreſented in the middle of the piece armed from head to foot, leaning on a naked ſabre with both his hands; he is ſaid to be the ſame king of the Indies before-mentioned, becauſe his bonnet and beard reſemble thoſe of the figure ſo called in the former piece; he turns his head towards five men, who have their bodies hid by the wall from the ſhoulders downwards, perhaps to ſignify that they are priſoners; behind him, there are three other men in the ſame poſition, who ſeem to be making ſigns to the five over-againſt them. As to this repreſentation it is impoſſible to ſay any thing with certainty, ſince we are furniſhed with no lights by antient writers, and the traditions of the modern Perſians on ſuch ſubjects are little to be depended on; though to ſay the truth,

" reſolved to revenge the antient injuries his country had re" ceived by the Perſians, who, when they arrived with their " army in Greece, ſubverted Athens, burnt their temples, and " committed many other barbarous devaſtations there. But " this, in my opinion, ſeems to have been no prudent or po" litic action in Alexander, and was no revenge upon the Per-" ſians at all (88)". Strabo ſpeaks very conciſely on this ſubject, his words are theſe, " Alexander deſtroyed the temple of " Perſepolis in revenge of the injuries done the Greeks, whoſe
" cities and temples the Perſians had formerly deſtroyed with " fire and ſword (89)". Curtius has nothing ſingular upon this head except the following obſervation. " The city of Perſe-
" polis was ſo far from being rebuilt, that unleſs the river A" raxes ran near it, there had not been the leaſt ſign left to " have gueſſed where it ſtood; that it was ſituated twenty
" ſtadia from the banks of this river, the inhabitants rather be" lieve than know with any certainty (90)". In this point, however, he ſeems to have been miſtaken; for firſt, he is the only author who ſays, that Perſepolis was ruined. Diodorus ſays, truth, the common people in Perſia are rather more modeſt than elſewhere, for when they are aſked about the meaning of theſe figures, they generally ſay, God knows. Nay, their men of learning content themſelves with affirming, that they relate to the ancient heroes of their country, without pretending to enter into particulars. At a hundred and twenty paces diſtance from this figure, one finds the firſt tomb, but before one comes thither, one ſees here and there on the mountains ſeveral tablets, which ſeem to have been deſigned for ſuch repreſentations as have been before deſcribed; whence it is evident, that the works on this mountain have been left unfiniſhed. One ſees before this firſt tomb the repreſentation of a combat between a knight and a giant; but as to the meaning thereof, we know as little as of that of the former. At ſixty paces from this tomb there is another, thirty paces from thence another, and at the diſtance of a hundred paces a fourth, which is the laſt. There are two inſcriptions near the third tomb, one fifteen lines in length, in the character made uſe of in the inſcriptions at the palace of Perſepolis. There are many other curious repreſentations carved on this mountain, ſome perfectly whole and ſound, others much defaced, either ſays, indeed, that it was plundered; but as to burning and deſtroying, what he relates is confined to the palace; beſides, after the death of Alexander, he informs us, that Antigonus, taking five thouſand talents of ſilver out of the treaſury at Ectabana, marched into Perſia, and after twenty days arrived at its capital Perſepolis (91). Arrian alſo ſpeaks of this city as ſtill ſtanding after the deſtruction of the palace; and, if we may believe the author of the book of Maccabees, it continued a great and noble city. What he ſays on this ſubject, ſtands thus, in our tranſlation. "About that time, came Antiochus "with diſhonour out of the country of Perſia. For he had "entered the city called Perſepolis, and went about to rob the "temple, and to hold the city, whereupon the multitude, run-"ning to defend themſelves with their weapons, put them to "flight; and ſo it happened, that Antiochus, being put to "flight of the inhabitants, returned with ſhame (92). In the firſt book of Maccabees, there is ſtill a more extraordinary paſſage in reſpect to the point before us. "About that time, ſays "the author, king Antiochus travelling through the high coun-"tries, either through the injuries of time and weather, or the brutal zeal of the Mohammedans, who pique themſelves much on deſtroying images. We ſhall not detain the reader any longer on ſo obſcure a ſubject, ſince our deſcriptions, however prolix, would never afford him the ſame idea he may gain at once by looking on the prints inſerted in their travels by Chardin and Le Brun [n]. Beſides, ſhould we run into a long diſcourſe on the conjectures, which have been or may be made in relation to theſe ſepulchres, it would certainly lead us far out of our road, and turn very little to the edification of the reader. On the whole therefore

" tries, heard ſay, that Elymais in the country of Perſia, was " a city greatly renowned for riches, ſilver, and gold. And " that there was in it a very rich temple, wherein were coverings " of gold, and breaſt-plates, and ſhields which Alexander, ſon " of Philip, the Macedonian king, who reigned firſt among the " Grecians, had left there. Wherefore he came and ſought to " take the city, and to ſpoil it, but he was not able, becauſe " they of the city, having had warning thereof, roſe up a- " gainſt him in battle: ſo he fled, and departed thence with " great heavineſs, and returned to Babylon (93)". That this city Elymais was Perſepolis, we have all the reaſon in the world to believe, ſince we are certain, that the latter is only a Greek appellation, and not the true name of the city; nor in all probability did the Greeks ever commit the Perſian name thereof to writing. One thing we will venture to obſerve here, which has not hitherto been remarked by any author; it is, this; Perſepolis or Perſæpolis ſignifies in Greek no more than the city of the Perſians; Elymais ſignifies the ſame thing, as alſo Phars-abad, which Sir John Chardin conjectures to be its antient name in the Perſic tongue; hence therefore, we may with probability conclude, that its moſt antient name was Elymais, derived from the antient name of Perſia, Elam, that in proceſs of time when Perſia was called Pharas, this city might be ſtiled Pharas-abad, and that the Greeks might tranſlate either of theſe appellations in their own language by the word Perſepolis; all which we ſubmit to the curious and inquiſitive reader.

fore, we ſhall content ourſelves with ſaying, that theſe ſtupendous monuments of antient magnificence are ſufficient to fill us with high ideas of the wiſdom and genius of the antient Perſians, before ſuperſtition and ſlavery took place (X).

The

(X) Beſides the tombs ſpoken of above, there are two near the ruins of the palace of Perſepolis, which Sir John Chardin ſays, appeared to him the moſt curious remnants of antiquity which he beheld there. They are about ſix hundred paces from the columns, and in order to reach them, there is a neceſſity of climbing three hundred paces up the rock. Theſe monuments are cut and hollowed into the rock. The one is in the north, over againſt the great ſtair-caſe of the palace, the front is 72 feet broad, and its height about 130. The plat-form is ſquare and like the landing-place of a ſtair-caſe; it is about 4 feet deep that is cut into the mountain; on each ſide there are ſix figures finely cut, and exactly reſembling thoſe in the proceſſion; in the wall of the palace there are four columns fronting the ſpectator, and exactly in the middle there appears a door, but it is only the figure of a door cut in the rock, and does not ſeem ever to have been deſigned for a paſſage into any cavity behind it. Over this there is another fine piece of workmanſhip full of figures; and on the ſummit there appears an altar with fire burning on it, and a reverend perſon holding a bow in his hand, kneeling on a kind of aſcent, over againſt it as if at his devotions. In the corner of the piece there is a round figure which ſeems to repreſent the ſun, and in the middle, as if in the air, there is a ſmall figure of the ſame perſon, whom we ſee praying below, as if he were aſcending into the heavens. The other tomb, which is an the eaſt ſide, differs not much from this which we have deſcribed. It has four columns, a falſe door, and has over it an altar with fire, and a prince or high-prieſt praying before it, with the other decorations mentioned before. Some inconſiderable differences there are in the architecture and in the diſpoſition of things in this ſecond tomb, but we do not think them of conſequence enough to be mentioned here. Sir John Chardin tells us, that the inhabitants of the country ſay, that Nembroth or Nimrod was buried in the firſt, and Dar-ab, i. e. Darius, in the ſecond; but he thinks the firſt fabulous. And as to Darius being interred here, he owns it is in ſome meaſure warranted by the account given us by Arrian that Alexander cauſed the body of that unfortunate prince to be embalmed, and to be ſent to his mother, that ſhe might cauſe

THE great perfection, which appears in theſe antient works and thoſe of Perſepolis, leaves us no room to doubt, that thoſe who were the authors of them, might, if they had ſo pleaſed, have left marks of their ſkill and genius in other parts of this empire alſo, or at leaſt that their ſucceſſors might have done ſomething in the ſame way. We have already put ourſelves under ſuch reſtrictions, as forbid a prolix proſecutions of this hint, and therefore we ſhall content ourſelves with remarking here, that Mr. Le Brun takes notice in his travels of ſome remains of antiquity, which he, with two Engliſh gentlemen, ſaw near a mountain a league and a half from Schiras, on the left of the plain. There ſtood here a moſque, called the moſque of the mother of Solomon, ſquare, and about twenty paces from one corner to the other, having three porticoes exactly reſembling thoſe at Perſepolis, the firſt on the eaſt, the ſecond on the north-weſt, and the third on the north-eaſt. They are eleven feet high, and have on each pilaſter the figure of a woman as big as the life, with ſomething in her hand, in the ſame attitude with the figures on the wall at Perſepolis. North-eaſt from this ruined moſque, the ſame author ſays, there are cauſe it to be interred in the tomb of his anceſtors. It is allowed, that the ſepulchres of the kings of Perſia were at Ecbatana in Media, and that, at the time Alexander ſent back Darius's body, that country was new conquered and in great diſorder. It is not impoſſible therefore, that his mother might cauſe him to be buried at Perſepolis. However, Sir John Chardin himſelf is of opinion, that the thing was otherwiſe, and that theſe tombs were actually cloſed up before the reign of Darius (94). It is the firm opinion of the preſent inhabitants of Perſia, that in theſe tombs, and alſo in thoſe deſcribed in the text, there are concealed great quantities of treaſure and valuable effects. It muſt be ſaid in favour of this vulgar notion, that it has antiquity on its ſide, ſince we know, that, when Alexander conquered this country, it was expected that mighty ſums would be found in the tomb of Cyrus (95). As on the other hand, are ſeen on the ſide of the rock nine ſmall figures, much damaged by time, and only half of them appearing above-ground; and on the north-weſt a ſtone of prodigious magnitude repreſenting a caſk or tun. All the ground thereabouts is covered with ſtones, and moſt of the pilaſters are out of their places, which could not poſſibly have happened but by an earthquake; the cornice, however, of the middle one is very little damaged: a quarter of a league farther, the ruins are ſeen of that wall, which antiently ſurrounded this moſque; and about a league from the moſque, the ſame gentleman tells us, that he ſaw ſeveral figures cut in the rock, divided into three tables. The firſt table contains three figures, one of which is repreſented leaning with its hand on a great ſword. The ſecond repreſents a man with ſomething not unlike a turban on his head. The third figure has a mitre on its head, and, like the firſt, leans its hand on the guard of a great ſword; they are very much broken and damaged, ſo that it is difficult to deſcribe them particularly [k]. For which hand, we know, that Joſephus (96) reports a mighty maſs of money to have been laid up in the ſepulchre of David. As we are writing here a note only, and not a diſſertation, we ſhall not expatiate further upon this ſubject, but confine ourſelves to theſe very tombs in the mountain of Nachs-Ruſtem. It is certain, that not only the common people, but people of diſtinction and learning, concur in believing that there are vaſt heaps of gold, ſilver, and other rich things, contained in theſe repoſitories of the dead, but at the ſame time they affirm this, they aſſert with equal confidence, that the paſſages within the tombs form a kind of labyrinth, out of which a man can hardly ever find his way, ſo that many have periſhed in ſearch of theſe ſuppoſed mountains of riches. Sir John Chardin, however, tells us a ſtory of one who actually found and bore away ſome of theſe ſhining ſpoils; he had it from the mouth of the bailiff of Mirkaſkoun, a little town in the neighbourhood of Perſepolis. This man informed him, that about two hundred years before, when this country was ſubject to a prince of its own, who reſided at Schiras, the farmer of his revenues in this part of the country, which reaſon we may ſuppoſe the author has omitted the deſcriptions of the other two tables. If we may be allowed to found any thing on the repreſentations given us in his prints by this accurate traveller; we may with ſome aſſurance, that the figures are neither ſo old, nor executed near ſo well as thoſe on the mountain of Nachs-ruſtem, which they reſemble much more than any thing which is to be ſeen at Perſepolis. Mr. Le Brun ſpeaks frequently of the traditions of the inhabitants relating to ſuch things as theſe; but there is no neceſſity of examining their accounts here, ſince we ſhall be obliged to give an ample account of theſe matters, when we ſpeak of the Perſian hiſtory, as has been written by oriental authors. In the mean time the reader will be pleaſed to obſerve, that the foregoing relation is a direct proof of the opinion we advanced, country, having diſſipated his effects, and not being in a condition to pay what was due from him to the royal treaſury, was under the greateſt dejection of mind, on the receipt of a meſſage from the grand-vizier, threatening him, in caſe he did not make a ſpeedy payment, with a cruel death, and with the ſelling his wife and children for ſlaves, in order to produce the ſum he was in ar ar. The poor man, diſtracted with fear, and knowing not whic ay to turn him, thought of laying violent hands on himſelf, but checking this thought on a ſudden, he ſaid in his mind, Why ſhould I deſtroy myſelf without attempting to throw off this load of misfortunes by ſome other means? in yon houſe of idols (ſo the Mohammedans call all places where there are figures in baſs-relief) every body agrees there are vaſt quantities of wealth concealed, why ſhould not I go look for it? If I ſucceed, I ſhall not only pay the king, but have wherewithal to live ſplendidly myſelf all the reſt of my days; and on the other hand, if I periſh, I periſh, death is the ſame thing in thoſe tombs or here. Having taken this reſolution, he provided himſelf with lights and with ſome proviſions, and then aſſayed to enter the tombs; in this exploit he was ſo lucky, that he fell into a path which led him to a large ſquare room full of pieces of gold, of which he took as many as he could carry away, and returned home on the fourth day. But as the ſum he brought back was not quite ſufficient to pay his debts, he determined to make another experiment, which proved as unfortunate as his firſt had been happy; for, by ſome means or other loſing his way, he periſhed in the mountain, and was never heard of more.

more. Many travellers have taken great pains themſelves, and where their ſpirits have failed, have hired others to attempt the finding out the rooms which are ſaid to be in this mountain, but moſt of them have toiled in vain, though not all; for Pietro della Valle, an author worthy of credit, affirms, that he ſaw a ſquare room, built up in the form of a tower cloſe on all ſides except a door which was almoſt at the top, and altogether inacceſſible; this he took to be a ſepulchre. Sir John Chardin could find nothing like it, but he declares, he does not doubt the fact, and tells us farther of his own knowledge, that theſe ſubterraneous paſſages are really very perplexed, frequently croſs each other, and are full of a moiſt vapour which quickly extinguiſhes lights (95).

SECT. II.

Of the Antiquity, Government, Cuſtoms, Arts, learning, and Trade of the Antient Perſians.

The origin of the Perſians.

THE Perſians were, without all doubt, a very antient nation. Their country was firſt peopled by Elam, or as Joſephus calls him[a] Elymus, the ſon of Shem; whence Perſia is conſtantly called by the ſacred writers Elam; nor does it appears, that it was known to the Jews before the captivity by any other name. The deſcendants of Elam ſettled firſt in that province, which from them was called Elymais, and by degrees, as their numbers increaſed, ſpread themſelves into Suſiana and other adjoining provinces; as appears from Daniel, who places Suſa, the metropolis of Suſiana, in the province of Elam[b] (A). All the Greek interpreters

(A) And I ſaw in a viſion, ſays the prophet, (and it came to paſs, when I ſaw that I was at Shuſham in the palace, which is in the province of Elam) and I ſaw in a viſion, and I was by the river Ulai. Shuſham is without doubt the city of Suſa in Suſiana, which ſtood on the river Eulæus, or, as the prophet ſtiles it, Ulai.

terpreters by Elam understand Persia, and in the Acts the Persians are called Elamites [c]. Whence it is probable, that they were descended from Elam, of whom both the country and inhabitants borrowed their name. How this name was changed into that of Persia we have shewn already.

Their government.

THE government of Persia was monarchical, and the crown hereditary. The kingdom of Elam seems to have been pretty powerful even in the time of Abraham; for Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, who was contemporary with that patriarch, is said in scripture to have invaded the Zumzummins and Emims, who were of a gigantic race, and to have taken and pillaged the cities of Sodom aud Gomorra; tho' he was at last overthrown by Abraham, who came to the rescue of Lot, whom the Elamite had taken prisoner [d]. In the time of Jeremiah Elam must have been a great and potent kingdom, as is plain from the prophecy, where he foretells the increase of Nebuchadnezzar's dominions, and particularly, that he should subdue Elam, a kingdom on the river Ulai, to the eastward of the Tigris (B).

The majesty of their kings

BUT to speak here of Persia, as the second of the four great empires (for of the kings who preceded Cyrus, we shall have occasion to give some account hereafter); the Persian monarchs were under no controul, but governed by their own arbitrary will and pleasure. They were revered by their subjects like deities on earth, none daring to appear before their throne, without prostrating themselves on the ground with a kind of adoration. Sperchies and Bulis both Lacedœmonians refused, as Justin informs us [e], to comply with this ceremony, as did also Conon the Athenian; and Ismenias the Theban declined it, as we read in Ælian [f], by letting his ring drop from his Finger, and then throwing

For I will cause* Elam to be dismayed before their enemies, and before them that seek their life; and I will bring evil upon them, even my fierce anger, saith the lord, and I will send the sword after them, till I have consumed them. And I will set my throne in Elam, and I will destroy from thence the king and his princes, saith the lord (1).

ing himself on the ground to take it up. Timagoras, as we read in Valerius Maximus [g], was put to death by the Athenians for paying this veneration to a Persian monarch. In the time of Apollonius none were allowed to appear before the king, who had not done the same honours to his image. While they were in the king's presence, they were to hold their hands, so long as their audience lasted, within their sleeves; for neglecting this ceremony Antosaces and Mitræus were put to death, as we read in Xenophon, by Cyrus the younger. None were suffered to enter the royal palace without the sovereign's leave, except the princes who slew Smerdis; all others, of what rank soever, before they set foot in the palace, were obliged to acquaint the king by a messenger that they desired to attend him, and wait his royal pleasure. What respect and obedience his vassals pay'd him we learn from Herodotus, who tells us, that Xerxes being once in danger by sea, many at the king's desire strove who should be the first in leaping over-board, to lighten the vessel, and save their prince's life, at the expence of their own [h]. They all lived in no less dread of the king's wrath, than of the anger of the gods; whence they lookt upon the incurring of his displeasure as the greatest misfortune that could befal them in life, and were ready, at the least intimation given them by their prince, to become their own executioners. The crown was hereditary, and bestowed on the eldest of the deceased king's lawful children. In long or dangerous expeditions, to avoid all contests, the heir apparent was named by the reigning king before he set out on his journey or march. The new king was crowned at Pasargada, or as Pliny calls it Pasagarda [i], by the priests, who bore a great sway in the court of Persia. This ceremony was performed in the temple of the goddess of war; where the king used first of all to cloath himself with the garment, which Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy, had wore before he was raised to the throne. Being thus attired, he used to eat some figs with a small quantity of turpentine, and drink a cup of sour milk, then * the tiara or crown was placed on his head by one of the grandees, in whose family that right was hereditary, and deemed, all over Persia, the greatest honour a subject could enjoy. The king's tiara was by a peculiar name called Cidaris, being a kind kind of turban riſing up with a ſharp point without bending; whereas the other Perſians wore turbans bending, in token of ſubjection, down to their foreheads. However, the deſcendants of thoſe, who with Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes ſlew the uſurping Mage, were allowed to uſe a tiara bending to the middle of their head, and not, as that of the other ſubjects, reaching down to their eye-brows. Round the tiara the king wore a purple and white band or diadem; for nothing elſe is meant by the word Diadem in the antient writers, but a band of this nature wreathed round the forehead [k]. This tiara with the purple and white band is the only enſign of royalty we find among the Perſian kings of the firſt dynaſty. The king's birth-day was kept as ſacred, and celebrated with public ſports and the utmoſt pomp and magnificence. His death was bewailed by ſhutting the tribunals of juſtice for five days, and that fire, which was worſhiped in private families as a houſe-hold-god, was on that occaſion alone extinguiſhed [l]. The king's abode was according to the ſeaſon, ſeven months at Babylon, three at Suſa (C), and two at Ecbatan [m]. Whence they are compared by Elian [n] to cranes, and by Ariſtotle to the Scythian Nomades, who, by often ſhifting their abode, always enjoyed a temperate ſeaſon. They likewiſe removed ſometimes to Paſargada, and ſometimes to Perſepolis, which at laſt became their ordinary reſidence. The king's court or palace had many gates, and each gate

(C) Suſa, called in ſcripture Shuſham, was the metropolis of the province Suſiana. It was built on the banks of the river Eulæus, called by Daniel Ulai, by Memnon, as ſome ſay, the ſon of Tithonus, who was ſlain by the Theſſalians in the Trojan war (2). Strabo (3) and Pauſanias (4) compare the walls of Suſa even with thoſe of Babylon. Caſſiodorus tells us, upon what authority we know not, and therefore give him no credit, that the walls of this city were cemented with gold. Polycletus, as we read in Strabo (5), would make us believe, that it had no walls, which is no leſs improbable, conſidering the kings of Perſia reſided there three months in the year, and that great part of the royal treaſures were lodged in it, as Diodorus informs us (6). It a body of guards, whoſe duty it was, not only to defend the king's perſon, but to give him notice of whatever they ſaw, or heard, done in any part of the kingdom; whence they are called, ſome the king's ears, others, as Ariſtole[n] informs us, the king's eyes. To theſe meſſengers were ſent from the moſt remote provinces of the empire, when any thing happened worthy of the king's knowledge; and beſides, they received immediate intelligence of any ſudden commotion by means of fires, which were always ready at ſmall diſtances from each other, and lighted when occaſion required; ſo that they could in one day receive notice of any tumult, rebellion, or invaſion, in what part ſoever it happened of that vaſt empire.

The king's palace was deemed holy, and reſpected as a temple. It was extremely magnificent, and furniſhed with utenſils of an ineſtimable value. The walls and roof of the rooms were all covered with ivory, ſilver, amber, or gold. The throne was of pure gold, ſupported by four pillars richly ſet with precious ſtones. The king's bed was likewiſe of gold, and Herodotus[o] mentions a plane-tree and vine of gold preſented to Darius by Pythius (D) a Lydian,

It was called Suſa from the many lilies which grew in that neighbourhood, ſays Stephanus, and in the Perſian language bore that name. It is alſo called Memnonia by Herodotus (7) and others from its founder Memnon. In ſcripture it is conſtantly named (8) the palace; but beſides the king's palace there was, without all doubt, a city, as is plain from all the prophane writers. The city was ſheltered by a high ridge of mountains from the northern winds, which rendered it very agreeable during the winter; but in ſummer the heat was ſo parching, that the inhabitants were forced to cover their houſes, as Strabo writes, with earth two cubits deep (9). Suſa was in antient times a wealthy and magnificent city; Alexander found in it 50000 talents of gold, beſides jewels of an ineſtimable value, and an immenſe quantity of gold and ſilver veſſels. Here Ahaſuerus kept his great feaſt, which laſted 183 days. It lies now in ruins, and is known, as Tavernier informs us, by the name of Schouſter or Suſter.

(D) Pythius, if we believe Herodotus (10), entertained at Celæne in Phrygia Xerxes and all his army, as he was marching againſt Greece, and moreover offered him towards the charges of the war two thouſand talents of ſilver, and three millions nine an, who after the kings of Perſia was accounted the richeſt man in the world. The body and branches of this vine, ſays Athenæus [p], were enriched with jewels of great value, and the cluſters of grapes were all precious ſtones. It hung over the king's head as he ſat on the throne. At his beds-head ſtood always a cheſt or coffer containing five thouſand talents, which was called the king's bolſter, and another at his feet with three thouſand talents [q], and joining to the king's palace were large gardens and parks ſtocked with all ſorts of game for his diverſion. Tully tells us out of Xenophon [r], that Cyrus planted and cultivated one of theſe delicious gardens with his own hand. Alexander enriched them with trees and plants out of Greece. The Perſian kings drank no other water but that of the river Choaſpes, which was carried about with them in ſilver veſſels whitherſoever they went (E). [s] They drank only Calybonian wine made at Damaſcus in Syria, and touched no bread but what was of the wheat of Aſſos in Phrygia, and their ſalt was brought from Egypt. The magnificence of their publick feaſts exceeds, as appears from holy writ [t], what we read of in hiſtories of other nations. Their table was daily ſerved with ſomewhat of the product of each nation nine hundred ninety-three thouſand pieces of gold, all bearing the ſtamp of his father Darius. Xerxes with no leſs generoſity not only refuſed the treaſures offered him, but ordered ſeven thouſand Darien pieces or Darics to be given to Pythius, as a reward of his affection and good will, nor did he leave Celæne till the ſum was paid.

(E) It is matter of diſpute among geographers, whether the Choaſpes and the Eulæus be one and the ſame, or two different rivers. Pliny (11) diſtinguiſhes them, and ſays, that they both riſe in Media, but that the Choaſpes diſcharges itſelf into the Paſitigris, and the Eulæus into the lake Characenus. Polycletus likewiſe, as we read in Strabo (12), ſuppoſes them to be two different ſtreams, though he makes them diſembogue themſelves into the ſame lake. On the other hand, Salmaſius (13) takes them to be one and the ſame river under different names; for the Choaſpes riſing in Media buries itſelf under ground, and again appears not far from Suſa; in Media he thinks it is called Cho-nation ſubject to them [u]. Among the priſoners taken by Parmenio at Damaſcus were, as Athenæus [w] informs us, 277 cooks, 29 who took care of the diſhes, 17 who miniſtered water, 70 who had in charge the wine, 40 employed about ointments, and 66 whoſe province it was to prepare garlands uſed, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, in banquets. During their repaſt their ears were feaſted with the harmony both of vocal and inſtrumental muſick, and 300 women, of the ſweeteſt and moſt melodious voices, were in conſtant attendance to divert the king at his unbending hours. It was likewiſe their province to lull him aſleep with the melody and variety of their notes, and recreate his mind as ſoon as he awaked in the morning [x]. Moſt of the Perſian king's were ſo diſſolved in pleaſures, that they ſcarce minded any thing beſide their own ſatisfaction. Xerxes was not aſhamed to propoſe, by a publick edict, an ample reward to any one that ſhould deviſe a new pleaſure [y]. The king ſeldom admitted others to his table, beſides his wife and mother; ſuch as received this honour were ſo placed as not to ſee, but only be ſeen by, the king; for they thought it was, in ſome degree, a degrading of their majeſty to appear ſubject to the ſame neceſſities with other mortals. This deſire of appearing above the level of other men was what confined them within their palaces, and ſcarce ever ſuffered them to appear abroad. Their luſt and voluptuouſneſs ſufficiently appears from the book of Eſther, and Tully [z] adds, that the Choaſpes, and in the province of Suſiana Eulæus. This ſeems agreeable to what we read in Ptolemy (14), who mentions two ſprings of the Eulæus (for he no where names the Choaſpes) one in Media and the other in Suſiana. Beſides, Herodotus tells us (15), that the Choaſpes waſhed the walls of Suſa, and that the Perſian kings drank no other water; whence it is manifeſt, that the Choapſes and Eulæus are one and the ſame river at leaſt at Suſa, and even Pliny (16) and the other writers, who diſtinguiſh them, place the city of Suſa on the banks of the Eulæus, and all the interpreters take the river Ulai mentioned by Daniel (17) to be the Eulæus. Nor is there any thing more common, than that the ſame river ſhould be known in different places by different names; thus the Danube was called by the Latines Danubius and Iſter, the Weſer Vierra and Viſurgis, the Po Padus and Eridanus, &c.

the revenues of whole provinces were employed on the attire of some of their favourite concubines, one city being obliged to supply them with ornaments for their hair, another for their necks, &c. Nay Socrates [a] mentions an embassador, who being sent into Persia spent a whole day in travelling through a country, which was called the Queen's Girdle, and another day before he reached the borders of a rich territory stiled the Queen's Head-dress.

The king's children.

THE king's children, more especially the eldest, were presently after their birth committed to the care of eunuchs. At seven years old they learned under experienced instructors to ride and hunt, which were looked upon as the most manly exercises: at the age of fourteen they were put under the discipline of four learned preceptors, of which one was to teach them prudence, another justice, the third temperance, and the fourth fortitude[b].

The king's guard

THE king's ordinary guard consisted mostly of Persians. Curtius mentions a guard which attended the king's person, consisting of 15000 men, who were called the king's relations; there was also a body of 10000 choice horse-men, all Persians, who accompanied him in all his expeditions, and were called immortal. His guards received no pay, but were very plentifully provided with all necessaries of life.

The manners of the Persians.

BUT the grandeur and magnificence of the Persian kings apeared no-where greater than on occasion of the public sacrifices, at which they often assisted, as we shall have occasion to take notice in the next section, as also of their funerals and other religious ceremonies in use among the Persians.

How they educated their children

NOW to say something of the customs and manners of the antient Persians, they had a particular care of the education of their children above any other nation. A son was not admitted to the presence of his father, but was brought up by women of the best characters, till he attained the age of five years, least if he should die before that time his father might be too much grieved at his death. At five years old the children of such as could afford it were commited to the tuition of learned masters or Mages, who carefully taught them, more by examples than precepts, the practice of justice, patience, sobriety, abstinence, and all other virtues. They took great pains to implant in their breasts an aversion to all manner of vice, especially to lying and contracting debts. They learnt also to ride, to shoot ſhoot with bows, and fight on horſe-back. This was their education till ſeventeen years of age, when the children of men of rank were admitted among the king's guards, and attended him at home when he went to hunt, or abroad in his warlike expeditions. They were brought up with ſuch an awful reſpect to their parents, that they never offered to ſit down in their preſence. Every father had power of life and death over his own children, but was reſtrained by the laws from exerciſing ſuch ſeverity for ſmall faults, or for one crime alone.

The miſcellaneous cuſtoms of the Perſians.

THE Perſians were antiently all trained up to military exerciſes, but more eſpecially to handle the bow, which they did with great dexterity, whence it is, that we find the bow of Elam mentioned by the prophet Jeremiah [c], and the quiver of Elam by Iſaiah [d], as the arms peculiar to this nation. From the age of five years to that of twenty they taught their ſons chiefly three things, as Herodotus informs us [e], to manage a horſe, to uſe with dexterity the bow, and to ſpeak truth. A numerous iſſue was looked upon by them as the greateſt bleſſing which the gods could beſtow, and ſuch as could ſhew a numerous offspring received yearly preſents from the king [f]. They celebrated their birth-days with great pomp and magnificence, furniſhing their tables on ſuch occaſions in a very plentiful manner, tho' at other times they lived very ſparingly, at leaſt under their firſt kings. In their diet they were very temperate, but were always inclined to drinking; they uſed even to debate the moſt important matters in their cups; but the maſter of the houſe, where they met to conſult, propoſed the ſame ſubject the next day before they taſted any liquor, when the reſolutions taken the day before were approved or rejected [g]. When they met they ſaluted with a kiſs on the mouth, if they were equal; on the cheek, if one was ſomewhat inferior to the other, but thoſe who were of a much lower rank uſed to proſtrate themſelves on the ground, when they met or accoſted their ſuperiors. They ſhewed moſt value for thoſe that lived next to them, and very little to ſuch as lived at a great diſtance, as if men were more or leſs worthy, in proportion as they lived at a greater or ſmaller diſtance from them [h]. No nation was ever more ready to adopt foreign cuſtoms. They no ſooner conquered the Medes, but they aſſumed their dreſs; in war they uſed the Egyptian

Egyptian armour after they had ſubdued that kingdom; and imitated the Greeks, as ſoon as they became acquainted with them, in the worſt of vices, as Herodotus himſelf owns[i]. They were indulged many wives, and beſides as many concubines as they were able to maintain, thoſe who had many children, being looked upon as heroes, of as great proweſs, as thoſe who had diſtinguiſh'd themſelves in military exploits. They bore ſuch reſpect to their parents that they thought it impoſſible a man ſhould ever put to death his father or mother, whence no puniſhments were inflicted by their laws on ſuch offenders, and if any one was indicted for committing ſo heinous a crime, he was always declared by the judges ſpurious or ſuppoſitious. To affirm a falſhood was accounted the utmoſt infamy, and next to that the being in debt, becauſe it expoſed a man to the neceſſity of lying. If any among them happened to be infected with a leproſy, or any other diſtemper of that nature, he was not permitted to ſtay within the city, nor to converſe with the others, having, as they believed, drawn this puniſhment upon himſelf by committing ſome offence againſt the ſun. All ſtrangers that were ſubject to this diſtemper were expelled the country. Theſe cuſtoms, and ſome others relating to their funerals, of which we ſhall ſpeak in the next ſection, we have learnt of Herodotus, who tells us, that he can with certainty affirm them to be true.

Their puniſhments

THE moſt ſevere puniſhment in uſe among the Perſians was that of ſhutting them up between two boats, which was done in the following manner. They made two boats on purpoſe ſo even, that the one was neither broader nor longer than the other, then they laid the offender in one of them on his back, and covered him with the other, his hands, feet, and head being left uncovered, and appearing thro' an opening made for that purpoſe. In this poſture he was ſupplied with victuals and drink by the executioners, who even forced him, by thruſting ſharp iron-tools into his eyes, to eat what was neceſſary to ſupport nature, leſt he ſhould ſtarve himſelf, and thereby put an end to his pain. On his face, that was placed full in the ſun, they poured honey, which inviting the flies and waſps, they tormented him no leſs than the ſwarms of worms that were bred by his excrements, and devoured his body to the very entrails. Under ſuch a complication of unrelenting torments the unhappy offender lived many days; for Plu-

Plutarch, who deſcribes this cruel manner of putting to death [k], tells us, that Mithridates, whom Artaxerxes condemned to this puniſhment for killing his brother Cyrus, lived ſeventeen days in the utmoſt agony, and that the uppermoſt boat being taken off at his death, they found his fleſh all conſumed, and ſwarms of worms gnawing his very bowels. Such as were convicted of high treaſon were condemned to have their head and right hand ſtruck off, which ſentence was, by order of Artaxerxes, executed even on the dead body of his brother Cyrus [l]. But by the ancient laws of Perſia the king was reſtrained from putting any man to death for a ſingle crime; and beſides, the judge was to examine narrowly into the actions of the delinquent, and if his faults were found to over-ballance his former ſervices, the king was allowed to puniſh him at pleaſure, if not, he was either pardoned, or puniſhed leſs ſeverely [m]. Poiſoners were preſſed to death between two ſtones, which puniſhment we find inflicted upon Gigis, a woman greatly favoured by Paryſatis, mother to Artaxerxes, for having conſpired with her to poiſon queen Statira [n].

The Perſians were beyond any other people jealous of their wives and concubines. It was death to touch any of the king's women, to ſpeak to them, or even to come near them or their coaches as they travelled. They were allowed to marry their own ſiſters and daughters; thus we are told, that Artaxerxes married two of his daughters, Ameſtris and Atoſſa, though he had promiſed them to others. Minutius Felix [o] reproaches them with marrying, or criminally converſing with, their mothers; and Euſebius quotes a ſaying of Bardeſanes, which ſhews, that they were indulged by law to marry their ſiſters, daughters, and mothers. This inceſtuous cuſtom they obſerved alſo in other countries, namely in Egypt, Phrygia, and Galatia, as Euſebius witneſſes [p], where they were on that account abhorred by the inhabitants, and nick-named Maguſſæi, or addicted to magick [q]. They were the firſt that introduced thoſe amphibious animals called Eunuchs, which Petronius Arbiter [r] and Seneca [s] impute to their inſatiable lechery.

Their money.

THE first that caused gold and silver to be coined in Persia was Darius the son of Cyaxares, or as he called in scripture Darius the Mede, the founder of the Medo-Persian monarchy (F). In his reign were coined the famous pieces of gold called Darics, which for many ages were preferred, being of pure gold, to all other coins throughout the east. They were stamped on one side with an archer, clothed in a long robe, and crowned with a spiked crown, holding a bow in his left hand, and an arrow in his right; on the other side was the effigies of Darius [t]. To these pieces alluded Agesilaus, when finding himself obliged to quit Asia in order to suppress the tumults, which Artaxerxes had by dint of gold stirred up in Greece, he said, that the king of Persia had driven him out of his dominions, with thirty thousand Archers [u]. The Darics were of the same weight and value with the Attic Stater. Darius seems to have learnt the art and use of money of the Lydians, for the Medes had no money before they conquered Lydia [w]; whereas Crœsus king of Lydia had coined innumerable pieces of gold, called Crœsei; As it was not reasonable that the coin of Lydia should continue current after the downfal of the kingdom, we may suppose, that Darius recoined the Crœsei with his own effigies, without altering their weight or value [x]. All these pieces of gold, that were afterwards coined of the same weight and value, by the succeeding kings, not only of the Persian, but also of the Macedonian, race, were called Darics from this Darius, in whose reign they were first coined (G).

(F) We are told by Suidas, Harpocration, and the scholiast of Aristophanes (18), that the first pieces of gold were coined not by Darius the father of Xerxes, but by a more antient Darius, who must necessarily have been Darius the son of Cyaxares, king of the Medes, since we know of no other Darius reigning so early in the east.

(G) In those parts of scripture that were wrote after the Babylonish captivity (19), these peices are mentioned by the name of Adarkonim, and by the Talmudists are called (20) Darkomoth, both from the Greek Δαρεικὸι, that is Darics, They were proba-

THERE was, it ſeems, no great learning among the Perſians before the time of Zoroaſtres, whom the Perſians called Zerduſht, or Zaratuſh, who flouriſh'd in the reign of Darius Hyſtaſpis, and was the greateſt mathematician and philoſopher of the age he lived in. The Mages, being inſtructed in the mathematicks, aſtronomy, and natural philoſophy, partly by him, and partly by Hyſtaſpes the father of Darius, were reputed above all others ſkilled in thoſe arts. Hyſtaſpes had travelled into India, and lived there ſometime among the Brachmans, in order to learn their myſteries and ſciences, for which they were famed at that time, and on his return communicated to the Mages what he had learnt, improving that ſect not only in religion, but in all natural knowledge[y]. But this ſubject ſhall be treated more at length in the following ſection, we ſhall only add here, that this knowledge was lockt up among the prieſts, and ſeldom communicated to any, except thoſe of the royal family, whom they were bound to inſtruct[z]. Their arts, ſciences &c.

THE poverty of the antient Perſians, and their contempt of riches, ſhews them to have been quite ſtrangers to trade and commerce, which are carried on with a proſpect of gain. Before the conqueſt of Lydia they had no money, nor any cloathing but ſkins; they uſed water for drink, and had neither wine nor any other thing, but what their barren country produced, as appears from the ſpeech of Sandanis diſſuading Crœſus from invading Perſia[a]. After they ſubdued Lydia, and were maſters of ſo many rich provinces, they very likely applied their minds to trade and navigation, to ſupply themſelves with thoſe commodities which their country wanted, and at the ſame time diſpoſe of their own productions. But, as we can advance nothing with reſpect to their trade, warranted by good authorities, we ſhall diſmiſs this ſubject, and haſten to their military diſcipline. Their trade and navigation.

THE Perſians learnt from their childhood to ride and handle their bow, as we have hinted above, and by the manly exerciſe of hunting inured themſelves to the toils of war[b]. They never parted with their ſwords, quivers, and Their ſoldiery.

and bows, even in time of peace, but when they went to repose, and had them even then always ready at hand [c]; which customs the Romans, who never used any weapons but in the field, look'd upon as unbecoming a civilized nation [d]. As soon as they were able to bear arms they were obliged to enter themselves in the list of soldiers, but received no pay till the age of twenty [e]. In time of war they were all bound, on pain of death, except such as were disabled by age, to appear under their respective colours, and attend the king in his expeditions [f] (H). They used no mercenaries in the time of Herodianus [g], nor maintained a standing army, but were all obliged, when occasion required, to repair to their colours, returning to their respective homes when the war was at an end, without any other pay or reward, but their share of the plunder.

In war they wore on the head a tiara, or head-piece, so thick that it was proof against all kinds of offensive arms; on the body a coat of mail wrought in likeness of scales, and embellished with sleeves of various colours; their

(H) Herodotus tells us, that while Darius was marching from Susa with his forces against the Scythians, OEobazus, a noble Persian, who had three sons in his army, begged, that one of his sons might be left at home to comfort him in his old age. The king received him with great demonstrations of kindness, and told him, that he would grant him more than he asked, for he designed to leave him all his sons. This answer gave the old man great joy, for he did not doubt, but the king would be as good as his word. OEobazus was scarce departed, when Darius commanded the officers appointed for such purposes to put all his sons to death, and sent their dead mangled bodies home to their father's house (21). We have another still more dreadful instance of the Persian severity on such occasions, Pythius the Lydian, as we have hinted above, entertained with great magnificence Xerxes and all his army, and offered him two thousand talents of silver, and three millions nine hundred ninety three thousand pieces of gold to defray the expences of the war which he was carrying on against Greece. The king was so taken with his zeal and affection, that he promised to grant him whatever he should ask. Pythius had then no request to make; but some time after being frightened with an

their thighs were defended with cuiſſes; their ſhields, or rather targets, were of wicker, their javelins ſhort, their bows of an uncommon length, their arrows of reeds; they wore ſhort ſwords (I) hanging from a belt on the right ſide [h]. Their horſes were likewiſe covered with armour or thick hides, as we read in Xenophon [i], Curtius, and Ammianus Marcellinus, &c. They were ſure markſmen, and quicker than any other nation in diſcharging, eſpecially on their flight, which was peculiar to them and the Parthians; however, in the time of Procopius, their arrows did but ſmall execution, which he aſcribes to the ſlackneſs of their bows; whereas no ſhield or armour was proof againſt the Roman arrows [k]. The number of their dead they knew only when the campaign was at an end, and in the following manner. Before they took the field they paſſed before the king or commander in chief, each man throwing an arrow into a baſket; theſe baſkets were ſealed up with the royal ſignet till they returned from the campaign, when they paſs'd muſter in the ſame manner, every one taking an arrow out of the ſame baſkets; when they were all paſt, the remaining arrows were counted, and from their number they reckoned the number of their dead. This antient cuſtom continued even in the time of Procopius [l]. They wore over their armour great-coats an eclipſe of the ſun, and confiding in the merit of his liberal offer and the king's unlimited promiſe, entreated him to diſcharge the eldeſt of his five ſons who were all in his army, that he might have ſome body to take care of himſelf in his old age and of his eſtate. He had no ſooner uttered this requeſt, but the king tranſported with rage, and forgetful both of his own promiſe and the former merits of Pythius, commanded the body of his eldeſt ſon to be cut aſunder, and one part laid on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that the army might paſs between both (22). So heinous a crime it was, according to the Perſian diſcipline, to except one's ſelf from the ſervice, or even aſk an exemption for others.

(I) They were rather daggers than ſwords; for Joſephus (24) compares them to the poignards uſed by ruffians, and Darius, finding in his firſt engagement with Alexander, that the length of coats of purple, but the king's was white, by which badge he was known and often aimed at by the enemies [l]. They excelled all nations in horsemanship, being accustomed thereunto from their very infancy; among them it was disreputable ever to appear in publick but on horseback; on horse-back they transacted all their private and publick affairs, held their assemblies, visited their friends, &c [m]. This custom in process of time began to degenerate into luxury, the Persians striving to out-do each other in the richness of their caparisons, their very horses, as Dionysius expresses it [n], champing the purest gold. They fought not only on horse-back, but likewise from chariots drawn by four, six, and sometimes eight, horses [o]. They were the first, if we believe Xenophon [p], that introduced the use of chariots armed with scythes (I). When they went on any expedition, their wives, mothers, children, &c. followed the camp [q], which custom was observed amongst all the eastern nations; their pretence, they thought, inspired them with courage, since they were to lose at once whatever was dear to them in the world, if they did not behave as they ought. Their provisions and baggage were carried on camels, the soldiers being loaded with no other burden but that of their armour [r]. In what manner they marched we learn from

But Diodorus tells us out of Ctesias, that Semiramis, in the war which she waged with the Bactrians, had in her army 700 chariots armed with scythes (27), and seems to make the Assyrian kings the first inventors of them. Whence it is plain, both from Xenophon and Diodorus, that Hesychius was mistaken, when he ascribed this contrivance to the Macedonians.

from Herodotus, who deſcribes the march of Xerxes's Army thus [s]. The baggage, whether carried by ſervants or beaſts of burden, appeared in the front, and was followed by men of all nations, formed into a body without diſtinction. Between theſe and the reſt of the army was left an interval, that they might not mix with that part where the king was. Before him marched a thouſand horſe-men, and the like number of ſpear-men with their ſpears pointing downwards. After theſe came ten great horſes, bred in the plains of Media called the Niſean plains (K), capariſoned with rich furniture, being conſecrated to Jupiter. The chariot of that god immediately followed, drawn by eight white horſes, the driver on foot, holding the reins, no mortal being allowed to mount the ſeat. After Jupiter appeared the king in a chariot drawn by Niſean horſes: a thouſand choſen ſpear-men, all Perſians, marched next to the king, and were followed by another body of horſe, conſiſting of a thouſand choſen men of the ſame nation. After the horſe ten thouſand Perſian foot advanced, and of theſe two thouſand armed with javelins, which, inſtead of the common ornaments, were embelliſhed with pomegranates of gold. The other nine thouſand had pomegranates of ſilver. The ten thouſand foot were followed by ten thouſand Perſian horſe, and at the diſtance of two ſtades. The reſt of the forces advanced promiſcuouſly. They computed the number of their forces in the following manner. Ten thouſand men were crowded into as narrow a piece of ground as they poſſibly could, and a kind of furrow being drawn round them, they cauſed the like number to enter the ground, and continued ſo doing till the whole army was computed [t]. When they intended to make war upon any nation they ſent heralds or embaſſadors to demand of them earth and water; that is, to command them to ſubmit and acknowledge the king of Perſia as the ſovereign lord of their Country [u] (L). This manner of declaring war they borrowed of the Medes, as Plutarch informs us, and the Medes ſeem to have imitated in that, as in many other things, the Aſſyrians, who, as appears from the book of Judith [w], uſed in that manner to require an entire ſubmiſſion. In time of action the king was always in the center [x], and uſed to encourage his men with a ſpeech [y], the ſignal was given with the ſound of trumpets, and followed by an univerſal ſhout of the whole army [z]. The watch-word was in uſe even among them, for Xenophon, ſpeaking of Cyrus, tells us, that his was, Jupiter our leader and protector [a]. The royal royal banner was a ſpread-eagle of gold, carried on the point of a long ſpear [b]. They reckoned thoſe happy who died in the field, and inflicted exemplary puniſhments on ſuch as abandoned their poſts, or fled from their colours [c]. They uſed no ſtratagems, nor cared for any advantages that were not owing to their valour [d], or, as Ammianus Marcellinus expreſſes it, thought it unfair and baſe to ſteal a victory [e]. They never fought in the night, unleſs attacked by the enemy, nor marched before the riſing of the ſun [f]. Duels or ſingle combats were in uſe among them, as is plain from the ſtories of Darius [g] and Polydamas [h]. This is what we have been able to gather, from unqueſtionable authorities, relating to the military diſcipline of the antient Perſians.

(L) Some have erroneouſly imagined, that by this demand nothing elſe was meant, but that thoſe to whom it was directed ſhould furniſh the Perſian army with ſuch a quantity of proviſions. But the contrray is plain from all the antients, eſpecially from Herodotus, who tells us, that Darius diſpatched a meſſenger to Indathyrſus king of Scythia, commanding him to own the king of Perſia for his ſovereign. and to preſent him with earth and water in token of his ſubmiſſion. To this meſſage the Scythian returned anſwer, that he acknowledged no other lords but Jupiter his progenitor and Veſta queen of the Scythians, and that, inſtead of preſenting him with earth and water, he would ſend him ſuch a preſent as he deſerved, and perhaps might make him repent of his inſolence in aſſuming the title of his maſter. And accordingly he ſent him ſome time after a meſſenger to preſent him on his part with a bird, a mouſe, a frog, and five arrows, which Darius would fain have interpreſited as a tacit ſubmiſſion, and a giving him poſſeſſion of the land and water; for, ſaid he, the mouſe is bred in the earth, and lives on the ſame food as man; a frog lives in the water; a bird may be compared to a horſe, and by the arrows, they ſeem to deliver their whole force into my hands. But Gobryas was of opinion, that the king of Scythia gave them to underſtand by ſuch a preſent, that unleſs the Perſians could aſcend into the air like a bird, or conceal themſelves in the earth like mice, or plunge themſelves into the fens like frogs, they ſhould inevitably periſh by thoſe arrows (29).

As to their laws, they are greatly commended by Xenophon, who prefers them to thoſe of any other nation whatſoever [i], and obſerves, that other law-givers only appointed puniſhments for crimes committed, but did not take ſufficient care to prevent men from committing them; whereas the main deſign of the Perſian laws was, to inſpire men with a love for virtue and abhorrency of vice, ſo as to avoid the one and purſue the other, without regarding either puniſhments or rewards. To attain this end, parents were not by their laws allowed to give their children what education they pleaſed; but were obliged to ſend them to publick ſchools, where they were educated with great care, and never ſuffered, till they had attained the age of ſeventeen, to return home to their parents. Theſe ſchools were not under the care of common mercenary maſters, but governed by men of the firſt quality and beſt characters, who taught them by their example the practice of all virtues; for theſe ſchools were not deſigned for learning of ſciences, but practiſing of virtue. The youths were allowed no other food but bread and creſſes, no other drink but water [k], at leaſt from the age of ſeven to ſeventeen. Thoſe who had not been educated in theſe ſchools were excluded from all honours and preferments l (M). There were particular laws againſt ingratitude, and whoever had done any one a good office, if he did not meet with a ſuitable return, could bring an action againſt the ungrateful perſon, who, upon conviction was puniſhed with great ſeverity m (N). When any one went to give advice to the king, either of his own accord, or by the prince's order, in propoſing his opinion he ſtood upon an ingot of gold, which he was rewarded with, if his advice was found wholſome, if otherwiſe, he was publickly whipt n.

BEFORE we cloſe this ſection, we ſhall add ſome particulars, relating to the Perſian kings, gathered from the beſt authors. The kings of Perſia were above all others the moſt arbitrary and abſolute, and looked upon their ſubjects, however diſtinguiſh'd by birth or fortune, as the meaneſt of ſlaves. None, their own children not excepted, durſt addreſs them with any other title, but that of Lord, great king, king of kings o; which high-ſounding titles they ſeem to have borrowed from the Aſſyrians; for Daniel p in ſpeaking to Nebuchadnezzar, gives him the title of king of kings. As the Perſians imitated in this the haughtineſs of the Aſſyrians, ſo did the Parthians that of

(M) Theſe ſchools the Perſians call Liberal markets; for they allowed no publick place for buying or ſelling, as appears from Cyrus's anſwer to the Lacedemonians, telling them, that he was not afraid of thoſe who in the midſt of their cities have a place of publick reſort, where they cheat one another by mutual oaths; which words, adds Herodotus, (30) were levelled at all the Greeks, who in every city had ſome publick place for buying and ſelling, whereas the Perſians allow of no ſuch placs, nor any place at all of publick reſort.

(N) Seneca therefore was miſtaken when he ſaid, that laws againſt ingratitude were to be found among the Macedonians alone; excepta Macedonum gente, ſays he, non eſt in ulla data adverſus ingratos actio (31), that is, in no nation, except the Macedonian, ingratitude is actionable; where ſome read Medorum inſtead of Macedonum, but all the ancient copies have Macedonum.

of the Perſians [q], and continued this ſtile even to the time of the emperor Conſtantius, to whom Sapor king of Parthia wrote himſelf, king of kings, partaker of the ſtars, brother of the ſun and moon, &c. But to return to the Perſian kings, as they aſſumed high titles to themſelves, ſo they beſtowed no other on their ſubjects, by what dignity ſoever diſtinguiſhed, but that of ſlaves [r]; and treated them, not in words only, but in all other reſpects, as arrant ſlaves. To this ſpirit of ſlavery, which is inconſiſtent with true courage, Plato aſcribes the downfal of the Perſian monarchy [s]. This ſpirit of ſlavery prevailed to ſuch a degree among the Perſians, that even thoſe who were by the king's order publickly whipt, uſed to return him thanks for vouchſafing to remember them [t]. Whoever betrayed the leaſt reluctancy to put in execution the king's commands, how difficult ſoever, was ſure to forfeit his head and right arm [u]. The cuſtom of adoring their kings, and putting them on the ſame level with the gods, is by Juſtin [w] fathered upon Cyrus the great. None durſt appear before the king without proſtrating themſelves on the ground; nay, they were all obliged, at what diſtance ſoever the king appeared, to pay him that adoration. Nor did they exact it only of their own vaſſals, but alſo of foreign miniſters and embaſſadors, the captain of the guard being charged to enquire of thoſe, who aſked admittance to the king, whether they were ready to adore him; if they refuſed to comply with that ceremony, they were told, that the king's ears were open to ſuch only as were willing to pay him that homage, and obliged to tranſact the buſineſs they were charged with, by means of the king's ſervants or eunuchs [x]. Nor did their pride and ambition ſtop here; they ſometimes ordered the ſame reverence to be paid to their favourites, as appears from the hiſtory of Haman and Mordecai [y]; nay, even to their ſtatues and images, for Philoſtratus acquaints us, that in the time of Apollonius a golden ſtatue of the king was preſented to all thoſe that entered Babylon, and that ſuch only as adored it were admitted within the gates [z]. (O) Q. Curtius tells us (32), that when Alexander marched his army thro' a certain province called Gabaza, one of his ſoldiers arrived at the place, where they were to encamp, ſo benumbed with the exceſſive cold of the ſeaſon and climate, that he had almoſt loſt the uſe of both his limbs and ſenſes. The king, who had likewiſe ſuffered greatly by the cold, and was then ſitting by a fire which they had kindled in the open fields, no ſooner ſaw the ſoldier in that pitiful condition, but ſtarting up, and with his own hands pulling off his armour, placed him in the chair where himſelf was ſitting. The ſoldier by degrees recovered, but was very near fainting away again when he found himſelf ſeated in the royal chair and the king ſtanding by him. But Alexander encouraged him to lay aſide all fear, ſaying, Do not fear, O fellow ſoldier, but reflect how much happier is your condition under me, than that of the Perſians under their king; had you reſted in the Perſian king's chair, it had coſt you your life; to have reſted in mine has ſaved it. Hence it was, that Artabanus, as we read in Herodotus (339), tho' uncle to Xerxes, ſhewed ſo great reluctancy to comply with his orders, when he commanded him to put on the royal robes, ſit on the throne, and repoſe in his bed.

(P) Plutarch tells us (34), that one Tiribazus, who was very familiar with Artaxerxes, whom he uſed to divert with his wit and humour, having one day begged of him an old gown, obtained what he demanded, but with this condition, that he ſhould not wear it, that being contrary to the laws of Perſia. Tiribazus, not minding the king's prohibition or the laws of the realm, ſoon after appeared in it at court, which the Perſians reſenting as an affront againſt the majeſty of their king, were for puniſhing him according to the rigor of the law. But Artaxerxes ſaved him by telling them, that he had commanded Tiribazus to appear in that garb as his fool.

(Q) In one of theſe litters Themiſtocles, who was deſirous to have a private conference with Axtaxerxes, was conveyed to the king's apartment, without being obſerved by the Perſians, who began to be jealous of him (35).

the game before the king (R), were all capital crimes [b]. Such as betrayed any secret, which they had been trusted with by the king, or gave intelligence to the enemies of his designs, were punished with great severity; whence Alexander, as his historian tells us [c], could never have any notice before-hand of their designs, the captives chusing rather to suffer death than betray the designs of their prince. No-body, of what rank soever, appeared before the king without a present, which custom prevails among the orientals to this day. When he went on his progress or marched out with his army, all the inhabitants of the countries or provinces through which he passed were obliged to declare their vassalage by some present or other; even the inhabitants of the villages and fields flocked to him with their donatives, some offering sheep, oxen, corn, wine, &c. others milk, cheese, dates, &c. every one according to his ability [d] (S).

How they administered justice.

The Persian kings frequently heard causes themselves, both civil and criminal, and though transcendently vitious in other respects were nevertheless very tender in point of justice and equity. After hearing the merits of the cause with great attention, they took several days to consider and advise with such as were conversant in their laws, before they gave sentence [e]. When they sat on life and death, they not only considered the crime of which the delinquent was impeached, but all the actions, whether good or bad, of his whole life, and condemned or cleared him according as his crimes or deserts prevailed

(R) This law was abrogated, as we read in Plutarch, by Artaxerxes Macrochir (36) or Longimanus.

(S) We read in Plutarch (37) and Ælian (38) of one Sineta a Persian, who meeting by chance Artaxerxes at a great distance from his poor cottage, and having nothing else to present him with, ran to the river Cyrus, and filling both his hands with water, made an offering of that to the king, which was by him graciously received.

ed[f] (T). Their humanity and good nature even towards thoſe, who, according to the laws, deſerved death, is very remarkable. Thus Artaxerxes Longimanus ordered, that the turbans of the condemned perſons ſhould be ſtruck off inſtead of their heads, that the ſtrings, with which they tied them, ſhould be cut inſtead of their ears, and their garments whipt inſtead of their perſons[g]. Beſide the king there were ſeveral other judges, all men of unblemiſhed characters, and well ſkilled in the laws of the kingdom. Theſe were called royal judges, adminiſtered juſtice at ſtated times in different provinces, and ſome of them attended the king whither-ſoever he went[h]. The king often adviſed with them, and in matters concerning himſelf referred the whole to their judgment[i]. They were nominated by the king, who, as that employment was for life, took great care to prefer ſuch only as were famed for their integrity (U).

(T) To this purpoſe Herodotus tells us (39), that Darius having pronounced ſentence of death againſt a corrupt judge, and afterwards finding that his former deſerts over-ballanced his preſent crime, ordered him to be taken down from the croſs and ſet at liberty. This does not agree with what we read in Diodorus Siculus, who tells us, that the ſentence of death, once pronounced, could not be repealed even by the king himſelf; for after relating how Darius pronounced ſentence of death againſt Charidemus, he adds, that the king immediately repented, as if he had been over-haſty in a matter of the utmoſt conſequence, but it was not in his power to undo what he had done (40). Perhaps he means nothing elſe but that the king could not reſtore him to life again; for, as both he (41) and Xenophon (42) inform us, the ſentence was no ſooner pronounced, but the criminal was hurried away to execution.

(U) Artaxerxes raiſed one to that dignity, as Ælian (43) informs us, who was not a Perſian but a Mede by birth, for having condemned his own ſon to death, according to the power which parents had in thoſe days over their children. And Cambyſes

THE Perſian kings had ſeveral wives, beſides what number of concubines they pleaſed. Darius maintained as many as the days of the year [k]. Artaxerexes had by his concubines 115 children [l]. The concubines were introduced to the king, each in their turn [m], whence ſome have concluded, that the antient Perſian year conſiſted of 360 days, ſeeing that ſeveral of the Perſian monarchs had the like number of concubines, who went to their kings in conſtant courſes [n] (W). Their concubines.

WE ſhall end this ſection with ſome account of their revenues. Each province had its peculiar treaſure and treaſurer, as is plain from all the antient writers, both ſacred and profane; and from the great ſums, which Alexander found in ſeveral particular provinces or cities, we may judge of the immenſe treaſures they poſſeſſed. In the city of Damaſcus he found 2600 talents, and ſilver Their revenues.

byſes being informed, that one of the judges had received a bribe, cauſed him upon conviction to be flayed alive, and having covered the ſeat, on which he pronounced the unjuſt ſentence, with his ſkin, appointed his ſon in his room, ordering him to ſit in the ſame chair when he pronounced ſentence (44). Theſe judges, according to Joſephus (45) and Zonaras (46), were ſeven in number, which they gather from the commiſſion of Artaxerxes to Ezra, who was ſent of the king and his ſeven counſellors (47).

(W) This conjecture is not altogether groundleſs: but we cannot help thinking it ſomewhat ſtrange, that the ſame writer ſhould alledge the authority of Q. Curtius to prove, that the antient Perſian year contained but 360 days, when that author tells us, in expreſs terms, that the Perſian year conſiſted of 365 days; his words are, Magos trecenti & ſextaginta quinque juvenes ſequebantur—diebus totius anni pares numero; quippe Perſis quoque in totidem dies deſcriptus eſt annus (48); that is, the Mages were followed by 365 youths, anſwering in number to the days of the year; for among the Perſians too the year is divided into 365 days. But Curtius in this, as in many other particulars, was certainly miſtaken, ſince Herodotus, whoſe authority silver uncoined to the value of 500 more; in Arbela 4000 talents, in Susa 40,000 and 9000 Darics, in Persepolis 120,000, in Pasargada 6000, in Ecbatan 180,000[o]. These immense sums arose from the tributes which each province was yearly obliged to pay according to the assessment of Darius Hystaspes. For, during the reigns of Cyrus and his son Cambyses, no tributes were imposed, the people voluntarily contributing for the maintenance of the king and his army, what they thought fit; from the imposing of these taxes, and other things of the like nature, the Persians gave Darius the nickname of Merchant. The sum total of the king's revenues, according to the computation of Herodotus[p], amounted to 14560 Euboic talents[q], beside other smaller sums. These revenues were gathered from the provinces of Asia only, but in process of time the islands and several provinces of Europe, with Egypt, Syria, &c. were likewise taxed, which encreased the king's revenues to such a degree, that, if we believe Justin[r], Alexander, after the conquest of Persia, received yearly from his subjects the sum of 300,000 talents. The Persian kings preserved their treasures in the following manner; they caused the gold and silver to be melted down and poured into earthen vessels, which they broke, when occasion required, and took such a quantity as seemed necessary[s]. The lands of the Persians were free from all taxes, but other provinces, besides money, were obliged to contribute considerably, each something of their proper product, towards the maintenance of the king, and, in time of war, of his army[t]. Thus the provinces of Cyrene and Barca were, besides the ordinary taxes, assessed at such a quantity of corn as was sufficient to supply 120,000 men; the Satrapæ of Babylon maintained the king and his court

The Ethiopians and adjoining people made a preſent every third year of two Chœnixes (X) of gold, two hundred bundles of ebony, five Ethiopian children, and twenty elephants teeth of the largeſt ſize. The Colchians or Colchi preſented the king every fifth year with a hundred boys, and the like number of young women; the Arabians with a quantity of frankincenſe, anſwering the weight of 1000 talents, &c. SECT. III.

Of the religion of the Perſians.

THERE is hardly any ſubject, which hath employed the pens of authors ancient or modern, that deſerves to be treated with greater accuracy, or to be read with more attention, than this which we are now about to diſcuſs. The religion of the Perſians, if we may credit the moſt learned and induſtrious writers[a], is venerable from its antiquity, and worthy of admiration from its having ſubſiſted now ſome thouſand years, in as great or greater purity, than any other religion known to us at this day. But the accounts, which are ſtill extant of the religion of the ancient Perſians, are far from correſponding exactly, and the deſcriptions, which modern travellers have given us of thoſe who who profeſs this religion in Perſia and India, even in our time, differ ſo widely, though not indeed in eſſential articles, that it requires no ſmall degree of patience to ſeparate the ore from the droſs, and to preſent the reader with what is worthy of being known and believed among heaps of fables and miſrepreſentations (A).

If

(A) The accounts, we have of the Perſian religion, are, as we have ſtated them above, of two ſorts; firſt, ſuch as have been collected from books; and theſe again may be divided into two claſſes, one extracted from the Greek and Latin writers, the other from Oriental hiſtorians; the ſecond conſiſts of what travellers deliver from their own knowledge, concerning the doctrines and practices of the preſent Perſians, who themſelves affirm, and are allowed by others, to practiſe the religion of their anceſtors with little or no variation. As to ſuch as have drawn their materials from books, they have been, as we ſhall frequently have occaſion to ſhew, prodigiouſly miſled in their opinions, confidently enough delivered on this ſubject. For as to the Greek writers, ſuch as Herodotus, Strabo, &c. they delivered what they had from others, and that likewiſe under this diſadvantage, that being polytheiſts themſelves, they of courſe conceived, that other nations had variety of gods as well as their own, and therefore reported, that the Perſians worſhipped the fire, becauſe they prayed before it; the air, becauſe in their devotions they lifted up their eyes towards it; and the ſun, becauſe they profeſſed to reverence it (1); nor was this all, they forged, for the ſake of making their hiſtories uniform, ſuch ſacrifices and other religious rites, as ſeemed to them correſpondent with the notions which they had framed of the Perſian religion, and attributed them to the Perſians. Thus Herodotus, ſpeaking of the paſſage of Xerxes into Greece, relates impoſſible things of the Magi, with as much boldneſs as if he had been eye-witneſs of them. "The country (ſays he) that lies about the "mountain Pangæus is called Phillis, on the weſt ſide extend-"ing to the river Angites, which falls into the Strymon itſelf. "At their arrival the Magi offered a ſacrifice of white horſes "to this river; and after they had thrown them into the ſtream "with a compoſition of various drugs, the army broke up, and "marched to the nine Ways of the Edonians, where they found "bridges prepared for their paſſage over the Strymon. But be-"ing informed that this place was called by the name of the "Nine Ways, they took nine of the ſons and daughters of the "inhabitants, and buried them alive, as the manner of the "Perſians is. And I have heard, that Ameſtris, the wife of "Xerxes,

If we had ſtill any conſiderable collection of the antient Perſian records, we ſhould doubtleſs find in them what would ſatisfy us as to the primitive doctrines of their wiſe men; but as theſe are either moſt of them long ſince deſtroyed, or at leaſt are hidden from us, we muſt be content to follow ſuch lights as yet remain, and where we cannot make the reader underſtand things as clearly as we would, it is our duty to make them, however, as clear as we can. This is certain, that the Perſians have preſerved the worſhip of one God, and other eſſential articles of true religion [b], through a long courſe of ages, without ſuffering themſelves to be drawn over by fraud, or ſubmitting through force, to any new faith, though they have often changed their maſters; a thing ſingular, and in ſome ſort commendable, if we conſider how much they have been depreſſed, ſince the death of Yezdegherd, the laſt king of their own religion, and the opprobrious treatment they have met with from the Mohammedans, who are wont to call them and chriſtians, with like contempt, infidels. Though the principles of the former, as well as the latter, are far more reaſonable than the ill connected legends of the Arabian impoſtor; and though the modern Perſians (taking that proper name in a religious not a civil ſenſe) are unanimouſly acknowledged to be as honeſt, as charitable,

" teen children of the beſt families in Perſia to be interred alive,

" neath the earth (2)" We have ſhewn in the text, that the Perſians were indeed reverencers of water as well as fire, but that they ſacrificed to it, or threw any thing into a running ſtream, is a flat contradiction to this very notion of theirs, which conſiſted in preſerving the purity of thoſe elements, and not in polluting them with blood and dead carcaſſes; and in reſpect to ſacrifices, Herodotus himſelf in another place acknowledges as much (3), Q. Curtius with like hardineſs deſcribes the chariot of Darius, in which he appeared in the field againſt Alexander; " it was adorned (ſays he) with images of their gods in ſilver

" upon it were two images of gold, the one repreſenting Ninus, " the other Belus, of a cubit ſtature each; between them was " an eagle of gold diſplaying her wings over both, &c (4)." All this is downright fiction; Ninus and Belus were never worſhipped by the Perſians; they were not wont to erect images, or to worſhip them; what makes it probable, that Curtius was the inventor of this whole ſtory, is this; that Arrian (5), an author of great accuracy, and who wrote from excellent materials, ſays not one word of all this; nor indeed does any other ancient hiſtorian: but Curtius was ſo great a rhetorician that he could not write plainly, but, on the contrary, loaded all his deſcriptions with ornaments, without any regard to probability or truth. As to the relations of travellers, we need not wonder that they differ about the religious opinions, rites, and ceremonies of the Perſians, or as ſome call them Perſees, ſince they very ſeldom agree exactly, even in their deſcriptions of leſs intricate things than theſe. As for Henry Lord, whoſe ſmall treatiſe in relation to theſe people has been received as a kind of oracle, merely becauſe he ventured to talk very authoritatively therein; it is ſcarce poſſible to determine from what he ſays, whether they are idolators or no; he calls them ſo, it is true, and ſpeaks of their worſhipping the fire in an idolatrous manner; yet the better part of his book, which conſiſts of what he heard from one of their prieſts, contains nothing which can juſtify his opinion (6). On the whole, we have thought it neceſſary to peruſe, and ſhall on occaſion make uſe of, what-ever is related by Herbert, Ovington, Tavernier, Thevenot, Chardin, or other travellers concerning the Perſees, their tenets, and cuſtoms; but it is our happineſs to follow a more capable guide than any of theſe; the very learned and judicious doctor Thomas Hyde, who, from the mighty ſtores of various learning which he poſſeſſed, as well as from the curious obſervations he in his travels had made, compoſed his valuable hiſtory of the religion of the antient Perſians, wherein every thing he lays down is ſupported by antient monuments, or by the expreſs authority of that law which this people profeſſed to have received from Zerduſht, a compendium of whoſe writings contained in the book Sad-der, the Enchiridion of the modern Perſees, is annexed to the doctor's treatiſe (7).

(B) Since the introduction of the Mohammedan religion into Perſia, the antient inhabitants have been expoſed to various perſecutions on account of their religion; for the Mohammedans being generally ſpeaking bigots, they are not content with giving theſe unhappy men always ill language, but on every occaſion are ſtirring up their princes to oppreſs and deſtroy, under colour of religion, theſe relicts of the ancient Perſians. It is true, the Mohammedan Perſians have in all ages had among them ſome men of learning and genius; yet few or none have ever enquired thoroughly into the doctrine of theſe poor people; on the contrary, they are as ready as any to load them with opprobrious names, and ſuch as they no way deſerve; thus they call them Noguſha, i. e. Zabian, or deſerter of the true faith; Ghebri, i. e. infidel; this word is as differently ſpelt as it is differently pronounced, the moſt uſual way of writing it is Ghaur; they likewiſe ſtile an ancient Perſian Ateſh-pereſt, i. e. fire worſhipper Philiv or Caliv, i. e. fool or madman; the moſt gentle term they make uſe of is Mogh, that is, Magian, but then they frequently ſay that a Mogh is Ateſh pereſt and Zindik, that is a fire worſhipper and a Sadducee; for among other calumnies with which they load theſe poor men, that of denying a future ſtate is one; however, though they may amongſt themſelves deſtroy their good name, yet with ſtrangers their aſperſions do the Perſians no hurt; for they, looking on the innocence and integrity of theſe poor peoples lives, cannot avoid affording them both pity and eſteem: it would be an eaſy matter to ſupport all that has been advanced in this note, by quotations from the beſt accounts we have of Perſia and the Indies; but inſtead of fatiguing the reader, it may perhaps anſwer the ſame end, if we here ſet down the five precepts which theſe Perſians acknowledge as the rule of life, which every Behedin or Lay-man is bound to obey, as they are reported by Mr. Lord.

I. "To have ſhame ever with them, as a remedy againſt all "ſin; for a man would never oppreſs his inferiors, if he had any "ſhame; a man would never ſteal, if he had any ſhame; a man "would never bear falſe witneſs, if he had any ſhame; a man "would never be overcome with drink, if he had any ſhame. "But becauſe this is laid aſide, men are ready to commit any "of theſe, and therefore the Behedin or Lay-man muſt think "of ſhame.

II. "To have fear always preſent with them, and that every "time the eye twinkled or cloſed his lids together, they ſhould "ſtand in fear at thoſe times of their prayers, leſt they ſhould "not go to heaven; the thought of which ſhould make them "fear to commit ſin, for that God ſees what manner of ones "they are, that look up towards him.

III. "That

Origin of the Persian religion.

We have heretofore shewn, that the original inhabitants of Persia descended from Elam the son of Shem [c], and from those two patriarchs, it is most probable, they derived the true religion, which at first flourished amongst them with the utmost purity, but in process of time was corrupted by an intermixture of superstitious rites and heretical opinions, at such time as the rest of the oriental nations were overspread with that deluge of false religion, which generally goes under the name of Zabiism. From which some affirm they were thoroughly recovered by the patriarch Abraham, who, they say, undertook the reformation of their religion, and having freed it as well from the pernicious doctrines they had inbibed, as from the superfluous doctrines they had adopted, left it them once more pure, and in the same condition, wherein he transmitted it to his own descendants [d]. But if this were so, they were a second time corrupted and engaged, if not in idolatrous practices, yet in superstitious acts of reverence to the heavenly bodies, and in practices inconsistent with the true faith (C).

The Persians pretend to derive their religion from Abraham.

However

[c] Vol. 1. p. 459. [d] Hist. Relig. vet, Persar. c. ii. & iii. Connection of the old and New Testament, vol. 1. p. 313.

III. "That whensoever they are to do any thing, to think "whether the thing be good or bad that they go about, whether "commanded or forbidden in the Zundavastaw; if prohibited, "they must not do it; if allowed by the book of religion, they "may embrace and prosecute the same.

IV. "That whosoever of God's creatures they should "first behold in the morning, it should be a monitor to put them "in mind of their thanksgivings to God, that had given such "good things for mens service and use.

V. "That whensoever they pray by day they should turn "their faces towards the sun, and whensoever they prayed by "night they should incline towards the moon; for that they are "the two great lights of heaven, and God's two witnesses: most "contrary to Lucifer, who loveth darkness more than light."

(C) That the Persian religion, as well as other religions, receded by degrees from its first principles, and suffered by the introduction of some superstitions, cannot seem strange to any considerate person. The Persians themselves confess it, and acknowledge, that their famous law-giver Zerdusht came to restore their primitive doctrines, and to purge away those errors which time and the industry of Zabian heretics had introduced. In what these errors consisted, the superstitious ceremonies which attended them,

HOWEVER the ſplendor of their religion might be darkened with theſe ſpots, yet it was never ſo far obſcured as to admit any degree of compariſon between it and the worſhip of neighbouring nations (excepting the Jews); for the Perſians continued zealous adorers of one all-wiſe and omnipotent god, whom they held to be infinite and omnipreſent, ſo that they could not bear, that he ſhould be repreſented by either molten or graven images, or that the creator and lord of the univerſe ſhould be circumſcribed within the narrow bounds of temples[e]; on this account they overturned the ſtatues and places of public worſhip among the Greeks, as unworthy of the deity, and not from any ſacrilegious contempt of the gods of other countries. In the decline indeed of the antient Perſian empire, the worſhip of Venus was introduced by one of their princes; but it was condemned by the Magi[f], who remained firm to this great article of their faith, There is one God, and took care to tranſmit it religiouſly to their poſterity.

They were always zealous in the ſervice of one God.

THE only objection, to which the ancient and modern Perſians have rendered themſelves liable, flows from the reſpect which they have conſtantly paid to fire and to the ſun: yet if this matter be ſeriouſly and impartially conſidered, it will be found, that there is nothing of idolatry in this reſpect of theirs, but that they only worſhip God in the fire, and not fire as a God. That they ſhould have an extraordinary veneration for the element of fire, and make choice rather of it than any of the reſt, to be the ſymbol to them of the divine nature, will appear leſs extraordinary, if we conſider, that a never-dying fire was kept on the altar of burnt-offerings at Jeruſalem[g], that God revealed himſelf to Moſes by a flame in a buſh[h], and them, and the pains it coſt this reſtorer of magiſm to root theſe fooliſh ſuperſtitions out, will be delivered in the life of Zoroaſter or Zerduſht, which we ſhall give the reader at large in the hiſtory of the Perſians from the Oriental writers, under the reign of that monarch in whoſe days he flouriſhed; for to have inſerted ſo long a digreſſion here, muſt have rendered this chapter very prolix, and at the ſame time obliged us to frequent recapitulations in the ſubſequent hiſtory.

choſe to teſtify his preſence in the hoſt of Iſrael by a pillar of fire, which went before them in the night, and which appeared only as a column of ſmoke in the day [i]. As to their veneration of the ſun, it is founded in their belief, that he is the nobleſt creature of the Almighty viſible to us, and that his throne is placed therein. Nor need we wonder, either at the miſtakes of antient writers, or at the ſtories told us by ſome Mohammedan authors on this head, ſince it was very difficult for them to get a true knowledge of the religious cuſtoms and tenets of this people, becauſe they were forbidden by their legiſlator Zoroaſter or Zerduſht, as appears from the book Sad-der, to teach either their antient language, or its character, to ſtrangers, or to inſtruct them in their religion [k]. If any farther regard had been had to the ſun in ancient times, it would certainly have deſcended with the other parts of their religion to the modern Perſians; but that it never reached them, the learned and judicious doctor Hyde aſſures us; for an intimate friend of his being by him requeſted to enquire concerning the worſhip of Mithra, (ſo the Perſians call the ſun) he accordingly aſked ſome of the prieſts of the Perſians ſettled in India, at what ſeaſons, and with what ceremonies, they adored the ſun? They anſwered, That they never adored the ſun, or paid any ſort of divine honours to that luminary, to the moon, or to the planets, but only turned themſelves towards the ſun when praying, becauſe they looked on it to come neareſt to the nature of fire. The ſame excellent author obſerves, that among the precepts of Zoroaſter, his diſciples are directed to pay daily to the ſun certain Niyâiſh, i. e. Salutations, conſiſting only in words (and thoſe too addreſſed to God) without any mention of Preſtiſh, i. e. Worſhip, by bowing of the body. Yet if any cuſtom of this ſort prevails, it ought not to be interpreted as a mark of religious adoration; for the Perſian Mohammedans, who are zealous deteſters of that impiety, and the Armenians, who dwell in Perſia, are wont to pray in like manner, the latter making the ſign of the croſs, and bowing profoundly low at the ſight of the riſing ſun [l]. To ſay the truth, adoration, that is, proſtrating or or bowing of the body, was even among the Hebrews a civil, as well as a religious, rite, or to ſpeak more properly, the ſame word, viz. השתחויה Hiſhtahhavaah was uſed to expreſs this act of reverence, when applied to God or man. An eminent rabbin ſays, that this as an act of devotion was not to be performed out of the ſanctuary, that is, out of the temple [m]; it is forbid by the 2d commandment to be paid to idols; but as a civil rite, the Jews were at liberty thus to teſtify their reſpect to angels, and to perſons of very high dignity. On the whole therefore, there can be no more reaſon to ſuſpect theſe Perſians of idolatry on this account, than any other of the Oriental nations, ſince the ſun is no more than the Kibla of the Perſians, as the temple of Jeruſalem is to the Jews, and that of Mecca to the Mohammedans, who in this reſpect are ſo ſcrupulous, that they have tables to determine the bearing of Mecca [n] from whatever place they are in (D).

The Mithra of the Perſians never eſteemed a deity.

As to the notions which the Perſians have of the ſun, they are not, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, perfectly agreed in them; ſome believing the throne of God placed therein, and that it is the ſeat of paradiſe; others entertaining a different opinion as to paradiſe, but praying nevertheleſs towards the ſun, as a ſymbol of the deity on account of its purity. It is farther certain, that the Perſians never called Mithra a god, or aſcribed to it any name of the divinity; and ſo far from directing any petitions thereto

(D) It may ſeem ſtrange how ſo odd a notion as this of the peculiar ſanctity of one point of the compaſs ever eſtabliſhed itſelf in the world, and much more, that it is become an opinion ſo univerſally received as it is at preſent. If the inquiſitive reader would have a more exact account of this matter, than it is proper in ſuch a note as this to give him, he may have recourſe to the works of the learned Mr. John Gregory of Oxford (8), who, in treating of two texts of ſcripture which ſeem to have ſome relation to this point (9), hath ſhewn a conſummate knowledge in various kinds of literature, as well as a genius perfectly well turned for ſuch intricate and abſtruſe inquiries. For us it is ſufficient, that the fact is as we have ſtated it, ſince, whether it be right or wrong, the Perſians muſt be as much in the right, or as little in the wrong, as any other nation which hath fallen into this way of thinking.

thereto, they conſtantly begin and end the ejaculations pronounced before the ſun with the praiſes of the moſt high God, to whom alone their prayers are addreſſed [o]. As to the fire, before whom the Perſians worſhip, taking that word in an extended ſenſe, they acknowledge nothing of divinity therein, but, eſteeming it a ſymbol of the deity, they firſt proſtrate themſelves before it, and then ſtanding up they pray to God. Thus among the ruins of the ancient palace at Perſepolis there are ſeen many marble ſtatues of kings, ſtanding praying to God before the figures of the ſun and fire, which are alſo placed on the wall before them, only one figure is ſeen kneeling with the ſame ſymbols before it as the reſt. As the fire in the temple was reputed ſacred among the Jews, ſo the Perſians might from them take this cuſtom of praying before ſacred fires; which is the more likely, ſince it was the manner of God's choſen people to proſtrate themſelves before the altar, and then to offer up their petitions. It was alſo a cuſtom among the Perſians to tender oaths before the fire upon the altar; in which alſo they agreed with the Jews, as they did farther in offering victims thereby, and in preſerving it from being polluted by impure fuel, in which laſt caſe the Perſians went ſo far as to puniſh offenders with death. Their kings alſo and principal perſons were wont ſometimes to feed the ſacred fires with precious oils and rich aromatics, ſtiling theſe Epulæ ignis or fire dainties [p]; but ſtill all things done to or by fire were performed to the honour of God, and terminated ſolely in him; at leaſt, if we may credit the concurrent teſtimony of Perſic writers yet remaining, and the conſtant aſſeverations of thoſe who ſtill profeſs this religion (E).

(E) When we conſider the point in diſpute, which is plainly this, Whether the antient Perſians had rational or irrational notions of the deity or not? and what degree of evidence there is on each ſide, it may ſeem ſurprizing, that it is yet made a matter of diſpute among the learned. Herodotus, who elſewhere tells us ſtrange ſtories of the religious ceremonies of the Perſians on hear-ſay, ſpeaking expreſly on this head, ſays all that can be wiſhed or deſired in their favour; for he owns that the ancient Perſians had neither temples, altars, nor images, and therefore we

There is yet another point in which the Perſians are to be vindicated, before we can leave the learned reader ſatisfied, that they never were idolaters. It is this: they had amongſt them, after the time of Zoroaſter's reformation of their religion, certain caves, adorned not only with figures of the ſun, but of the planets and other heavenly bodies, which ſymbolical repreſentations were called Mithriac figures, and were afterwards introduced into other nations, where they became objects of idolatrous worſhip; but they were far from being ſo among the Perſians, who were a wiſe and well-inſtructed people; for with them they ſerved only as mathematical ſymbols

we ought rather to regard this than the other parts of his book, wherein he manifeſtly relates what other Greek writers, full of ſpleen againſt Xerxes and his ſucceſſors, had written of their inhuman ſacrifices, and other acts of religious cruelty (10). Xenophon's authority would be of great weight in the preſent caſe, if he had wrote deciſively, and ſpoken things of his own knowledge; but the high commendations he has given the Perſians, and the mighty character he hath afforded their laws, hath begot a doubt in the minds of the learned, whether he did not mingle his own ideas with the accounts he gives us of the cuſtoms and manners of the Perſians (11). Plutarch, in a paſſage hereafter more fully cited, ſpeaks very reſpectfully of Zoroaſter, and aſcribes nothing to him unworthy of a very wiſe man. There were ſome, he tells us, of the ancients who aſſerted two ſupreme beings, the one the author of all good, the other of all evil. Others who admitted but one God, the father of good, but who acknowledged there was a demon from whom all evil proceeded; this, ſays he, was the doctrine of Zoroaſter, who flouriſhed four thouſand years before the Trojan war (12). The ſame author then proceeds to a ſuccinct account of the doctrine of the Magi, which we ſhall have occaſion to inſert in our text. Dr. Hyde has produced an authentic relation of the ſentiments of the antient Perſians on this ſubject, as collected from their ſucceſſors the Perſees ſettled in India, an abſtract of which will likewiſe be inſerted in our text (13), and the curious reader may peruſe the whole of it in the treatiſe of the excellent author above-mentioned. In the ſame place may be found the teſtimony of Shariſtan, who wrote in Arabic an account of the Religions of the eaſt, and who, in ſpeaking of the faith of the Perſians, does them all the juſtice that can be (14); but what is of far greater conſequence to us, than for preſerving the true ſyſtem of the univerſe; for which end, and to no other, they were uſed, and perhaps invented, by Zoroaſter himſelf, as we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to prove at large, when we come to ſpeak of the life, doctrines, and writings of that famous man [q].

HAVING thus ſhewn in general the nature of the Perſian religion, and that it was far preferable to any of the ſyſtems received in other nations, either in the eaſt or in the weſt, we ſhall proceed to ſhew what the Perſians themſelves have taught concerning the eſtabliſhment of their religion, as well as what are the doctrines, as to eſſential points, univerſally received amongſt them.

THE great fame of Abraham, which from a concurrence of various cauſes had diffuſed itſelf throughout the whole eaſt, induced the Perſians, as well as the Zabeans, to aſcribe the ſyſtem of doctrines received by them to that venerable patriarch, ſtyling their faith at all times Kiſh-Abraham. They likewiſe aſcribe the books which they hold ſacred to this father of the faithful, and as much believe him to be the author of their Sofh or bible, as we believe the goſpel to have come to us from Chriſt, or the Mohammedans, that God revealed to Mohammed his Koran [r]. In attributing books to Abraham, they agree with the Jews and with the Mohammedans, the latter aſcribing to him no leſs than ten treatiſes, perhaps all with the like reaſon. The Perſians ſay farther, that Abraham, while he reſided amongſt them, dwelt in the city of Balch, which they from thence ſtyle the city of Abraham. But though it muſt be allowed, that the old Perſian religion agreed in many great points with the religion of Abraham, and though it ſhould be admitted, that his fame might even in his life-time be with very advantageous circumſtances publiſhed throughout all Perſia, yet it is ſo far from being evident than any authority of friends or enemies whatſoever, the book Sad-der, containing the canon of the Perſian faith, is not only extant among the Perſees, but even amongſt ourſelves, and every page therein affords us inſtances of Zoroaſter's wiſdom, and of the rectitude of the religion he eſtabliſhed, as to fundamental points, and eſpecially as to the belief of one infinitely wiſe, eternal, ſelf-exiſtent being (15).

[q] Hyde, c. iv. p. 118. Sect. v. of this Vol. [r] Hyde, c. ii. p. 28.

dent, that it is ſcarce probable, he went himſelf into that country, much leſs that he executed the office of a prophet there, and reſided at Balch. On the contrary it is far more credible, that this notion took riſe from the ſuggeſtion of Zoroaſter, who had his learning and his divinity out of the books of Moſes and other ſacred books among the Jews, and that the city of Balch received the appellation of the city of Abraham from Zoroaſter, on account of his making it the reſidence of the archimagus or high-prieſt of the religion of Abraham, and not from the patriarch's being ſuppoſed to live there at all in antient time [f].

THOUGH fire was held the ſymbol of the divinity among the Perſians, yet the other elements were alſo highly honoured by them, inſomuch, that the Greeks and other foreigners, who knew not their religious principles, called them Cultores elementorum or worſhippers of the elements, a flagrant calumny, ſince all the reſpect they paid them, aroſe from their conceiving them to be the firſt ſeeds of all things, wherefore they ſtudied, by every method poſſible, to preſerve each of them in its primitive purity. On this account they prevented, as much as they could, the air from being infected by ill ſmells; and, for their officiouſneſs on this head, Herodotus, according to his uſual cuſtom, repreſents them as believing the air a deity. They hold (ſays he) the whole expanſe to be Jupiter [t]. That they might in like manner preſerve the earth from impurities, they would not bury their dead therein, but ſuffered them to be devoured by birds and wild beaſts, that finding a tomb in their bowels they might not infect the air; in fine, the preſerving all the elements pure was by them eſteemed an act of high piety, and as ſuch meriting the divine favour, in this world and in the world to come; for in all things they were great affectors of cleanlineſs, and ſtudious, in an eſpecial manner, in avoiding whatever might pollute them. Fire and water, however, were in a peculiar manner the objects of their care, becauſe they were moſt liable to be contaminated, and hence the Greeks, miſtaking the degree of reverence they paid them, declared them, without ſcruple, worſhippers of thoſe elements, and tells us formal mal ſtories of the ſacrifices offered to both. It is very true, that kings often do extravagant things, and ſuch as are contrary to the civil and religious laws of the countries they govern; ſo that it is not impoſſible, that ſome of the Perſian princes might be guilty of what is laid to their charge, but it is not likely, becauſe the Perſians univerſally held, that whoever willfully polluted either fire or water deſerved death in this world, and everlaſting puniſhment in that to come, and that whoever threw the bones of dead creatures into waters were certainly damned. For theſe reaſons the Magi, where-ever they were, took care to have all the waters in their neighbourhood watched, aſſigning them keepers, whoſe ſole office it was to look carefully to this matter, and to ſee that no filthy thing was thrown or dropped into them, and for this they had ſtated and well-ſettled ſalaries. For abhorring, as they did, the repreſenting of the almighty lord of heaven and earth, by artificial images of ſtone or metal, they choſe to preſerve fire and water in their utmoſt purity, that they might ſerve for ſymbols of the divine nature, and put them in mind of the infinite purity of God. As they held the miniſtration of angels, ſo they believed, that one of theſe celeſtial guards was appointed to watch over the waters in general; this angel they called Ardiſûr or Arduiſûr, for whom a particular Niyâiſh or ſalutation was preſcribed, the title of which in their antient books runs thus, Hymn to Ardiſur, for the benefits received from the ſea, rivers, wells, and fountains. In this hymn they praiſed him for taking care of all theſe places, and prayed, that he might continue ſo to do, returning God thanks for the various uſes made of water, and the mighty advantages reſulting to mankind from his wiſe diſpoſition thereof throughout the earth; they were of opinion, that in paradiſe ſuch people were peculiarly bleſſed, as had been careful of defiling water, and had in this ſenſe preſerved a reſpect for that element during their lives, for which cauſe they recommended the care of this element, as well as fire, to their women, that is their private fires and the water uſed in their houſes; for it does not appear, that they ever admitted women to miniſter in religious matters, except in the myſteries of Venus, which, as we obſerved before, was a hereſy, and as ſuch deteſted by the orthodox magians. In their love to purity and their eſteem of water, the practice of the Jews, and the precepts in their law for corporal purification, may very well be urged in their defence, eſpecially if we conſider, that in waſhing the hands, and putting on the girdle, ſolemn forms of prayer were enjoined the antient Perſians, as indeed there were ſet ejaculations to be uſed in the performance of the moſt ordinary actions of human life [u].

With reſpect to the uſe they made of fire in their notional religion, the prieſts who attended it by no means deſerved the appellation of Igniarii Sacerdotes, i. e. fire-prieſts, for they were truly Sacerdotes Dei, prieſts of the almighty, who though, like the Jewiſh prieſts, they waited on, and took care to preſerve, the ſacred fire from being extinguiſhed; yet this was far from being their only duty; for theſe, as well as thoſe, read every day public prayers, and did other ſacerdotal offices, as we ſhall hereafter declare more largely. Yet ſuch has been the hard fate of theſe people, that, becauſe their principles were not known, and their ceremonies ill underſtood, they have been branded with the name of Ateſh-pereſt, i. e. fire-worſhippers, ſo dangerous a thing it is to carry to any exceſs even innocent ceremonies. They never confeſſed their ſins to any but to God, nor beſought a remiſſion of them from any but from him; yet they inclined to perform theſe publick acts of devotion before the ſymbol of the deity, that is, before fire, or before the ſun, as the witneſs of their actions; in like manner the Jews confeſſed their ſins to God in the temple, the fire flaming on the altar near them, ſo that there was nothing of idolatry in this, though it might not be altogether free from ſuperſtition (F).

In

(F) If we were to undertake a critical review of what modern authors have written about theſe people and their opinions, it would require a far larger treatiſe than this whole number; this is a bold aſſertion, but I will venture to give an inſtance of it, which I am poſitive will prove the truth of my obſervation. Mr. Tavernier has ſpent about fifteen pages in his account of theſe people, in which there are at leaſt fifty capital miſtakes, which any man may diſcover who is at all verſed in Oriental literature. In his ſection of the original and prophets of this ſect, he confounds Zerduſht with Abraham, in ſuch a manner, that it would coſt a great deal of time to determine what part of the ſtory belongs to the one, and what to the other. He tells us

In the moſt antient times the Perſians had no temples at all, but rear'd altars, whereon they preſerved their ſacred

us of a king, whom he calls Newbrout, probably Nimrod, and aſcribes to him things that no body ever heard of before; nay the very name he has given the prophet is ſufficient to ſhew, how much he was confuſed on this ſubject, and conſequently how little credit is due to what he relates of the religion of the Gaurs or Gubres, as he calls them. Their prophet's name, as ſet down by him, was Ebrahim zer-Atencht; he tells us of books he received from heaven, that they contain the religious precepts of theſe people, and that he himſelf has ſeen a great book which was attributed to him. But I muſt deſire the reader to take notice, that I do not arraign Mr. Tavernier's ſincerity as to facts which lay within the compaſs of his judgment; on the contrary, we are perſuaded that he wrote nothing which he did not take to be true, as appears by the following account of their worſhip of the fire, which is the title of one of his ſections: "The Gaurs render no ſuch honours to the fire as agree "with this term of worſhip, they are not idolaters, they ac- "knowledge one God the creator of the heaven and of the "earth, and him only they profeſs to worſhip". In the reſt of his ſections he ſpeaks diſtinctly enough of what he ſaw; but he relates what he heard in ſuch a manner, that a perſon, who knew as little of the matter as he, could not fail of being deceived (16). Sir John Chardin, whom we have often commended, and who, without all queſtion, was one of the moſt intelligent men that ever obliged the public with an account of his travels, ſpeaks very contemptibly of theſe people, and would have us believe there is no ſort of learning amongſt them, but a little aſtrology; he ſays, their prieſts talk confuſedly of their religion, and that they were not poſitive themſelves as to the place where their ſacred fire was kept (17). But though this gentleman was not ſo happy as to meet with intelligent perſons of this religion, others have; and the accounts they have written are clear and ſatisfactory, nay and ſupported by undeniable evidence. M. Le Brun, by the interpoſition of the Engliſh agent, had a converſation with one of their prieſts, from whom he learned many things exactly conformable to what we have delivered. It would therefore be needleſs to inſert that converſation here, but it may not perhaps be amiſs to give the anſwer of the prieſt to M. Le Brun's firſt queſtion, what he thought of the creation of the world and the power of God? He ſaid, he believed God to be the being of beings, a ſpirit of light, above the comprehenſion of human underſtandings, infinite, in all places, almighty, from whom cred fires, on the tops of mountains, and other ſolitary places [x]. It was Zoroaſter, who perſuaded them, for the ſake of preſerving theſe fires more conveniently, to erect over each of them a pyreum, or fire-temple, but this had no relation to Mithra or the ſun, towards whom they could better teſtify their reſpect in the open air, neither did it ſubvert their antient principle, that the lord of the univerſe ought not to be incloſed within walls, for their pyrea did not circumſcribe what they eſteemed an image or ſemblance of the divinity, but only the ſymbol of his purity, and as it were a ſhadow of his nature. The overturning therefore of the Greek temples by Xerxes, and other acts of a like nature, were perfectly conſiſtent with their reverence for fire, and their reſpect for the ſun. Of this though many Greek and Oriental writers were entirely ignorant, and were conſequently prone to miſrepreſent them, yet authors, of great candor and more extenſive knowledge, have acknowledged as much, and teſtify'd to the honour of the Perſians, that they worſhipped only one god, without repreſenting him by any image or picture whatſoever [y].

THE Perſians in early times acknowledged one eternal and omnipotent being, the creator and preſerver of all things; him they called Yezad, Izad, or Izud, alſo Ormuzd, whom nothing could be hid, and againſt whoſe will nothing could be done. This conference happened in the month of January 1707 (18). As to the pyrea or fire-temples, they were formerly frequent as pariſh churches in other countries; but ſince the deſtruction of the antient Perſians theſe ſtructures are by no means common. The Perſees content themſelves with ſaying their prayers before their common fires, and their prieſts officiate before them likewiſe. They have, however, fire-temples or fire-chapels ſtill in ſome places, and the chief of them is ſuppoſed to be in the province of Kirman, where there are more Gaurs than in any other part of Perſia. Antiently their temples were ſplendid, and were dedicated not only to the ſun, but to the reſt of the planets, in which, however, there was no more idolatry, than there is in our dedicating churches to this or that ſaint (19).

(18) Le Brun, tom. ii. p. 387. (19) Hyde Relig. veter. Perſ. c. xxix. p. 253.

Ormuzd, Hormuz, or Hormizda; joining this with the modern name they ſay Hormizda Chodâ, O ſupreme god. They acknowledge alſo an evil created being whom they ſtiled Ahariman, Ahreman, or Ahriman and in verſe Ahrimanan, which ſignifies amongſt them the devil. To ſhew their deteſtation of thiswicked being, his name in the antient Perſian books was thus wrote, Ahariman, to intimate, that as he was the implacable and perpetual enemy of mankind, ſo they maintained an everlaſting emnity againſt him and all his works. The modern Perſians call the devil Div [z].

SOME have aſſerted, that the antient Perſians held a co-eternity of theſe two principles, but writers, better acquainted with the true tenets of this nation, agree, that Ahariman was created out of darkneſs, and that Oromaſdes firſt ſubſiſted alone, that by him the light and darkneſs were created, that in the compoſition of this world good and evil are mixed together, and ſo ſhall continue till the end of all things, when each ſhall be ſeparated and reduced to its own ſphere. Plutarch, who was a very ingenious and a very inquiſitive man, hath given us a long account of the doctrines of Zoroaſter, very conformable to what has been already ſaid, and agreeing perfectly well with the religion of the antient patriarchs, except in a few ſtrokes of fable, which were either inſerted by the miſtake of the reporter of that abſtract, or were invented by Zerduſht, to account for thoſe things which ſurpaſs human underſtanding [a]. Some have endeavoured to account for the origin of the prince of darkneſs thus. Oromaſdes, ſay they, ſaid once within his mind, how ſhall my power appear if there be nothing to oppoſe me? this reflection called Ahriman into being, who thenceforward oppoſed all the deſigns of God, and thereby in ſpite of himſelf contributes to his glory. The ſouls of man, according to them, were at firſt unbodied ſpirits, but the almighty, reſolving to make uſe of them in warring againſt Ahriman, clothed them with fleſh, promiſing them, that the light ſhould never forſake them till Ahriman and all his Servants were ſubdued; after which the reſurrection of the dead is to follow with the ſeparation of the light from the darkneſs, and the coming of

of the kingdom of peace. To ſay the truth, the notions they have of the beginning of things, the ſtate of our firſt parents, the attempts made on them by the prince of darkneſs, the laſt judgment, the ſalvation of the good and the puniſhment of the bad, differ very little from what is delivered to us in the ſcripture on theſe heads. Only they have a long account of the war between God and the author of evil, which they ſay ended in a complete victory gained over the latter and his adherents, who were conſtrained to ſurrender at diſcretion. That the almighty did not annihilate his enemies, becauſe without oppoſition his attributes could not have appeared with ſuch luſtre as they now do. That the world had exiſted three thouſand years before this deciſive battle, the whole of its duration being fixed to twelve thouſand. That after this defeat, God, by holding up three fingers, gave the evil one leave to chuſe which three thouſand years of the nine thouſand yet to come he would pleaſe to take, wherein to trouble and vex mankind; whereupon he choſe the middlemoſt. Before, ſay they, this power was given to Ahriman, man lived in a ſtate of innocence; but that ſince his fall, war, and all other evils, have been introduced; that theſe, however, ſhall in time paſs away, and man live again for a certain ſpace in peace and glory. They place the day of judgment at the end of twenty thouſand years; and as to the demand, they aſſert, that they ſhall be puniſhed according to the heinouſneſs of their crimes, two angels being appointed to be the inſpectors of their ſufferings: at laſt, however, even theſe are to be pardoned, but never to be admitted to the joys of the bleſſed, but to remain in a certain place by themſelves, and to wear in their foreheads a black mark, as the badge of that ſtate from whence through the mercy of God they were freed [b] (G).

(G) In the courſe of ages it is not to be wondered, that falſe notions crept into their religion in ſome places; as among the Magi of Cappadocia, who not only worſhipped with idolatrous circumſtances their ſacred fires, but alſo introduced images in their temples. But that hereſy, which of all others threatened the religion of Zoroaſter moſt was Manecheiſm; for Manes that arch-heretick reſided long in Perſia, and there broached his abſurd notion of two eternal ſelf-exiſtent beings, and by mingling

THE point in which the Perſians differ moſt from us is, as to the manner of God's creating the world, which, they ſay, happened not in ſix days, but in ſix ſeaſons, each ſeaſon containing many days; the firſt of theſe they ſtyle Mid-yuzeram, containing forty-two days; in this, they ſay, the heavens were created with all things belonging to them. The ſecond they ſtile Mid-yuſham, containing ſixty days, wherein the waters were created. The third is by them named Pitiſhahim, including ſeventy five days, in this the earth was made. The fourth they called Iyaſeram, including thirty days, wherein were made the trees. The fifth goes under the name of Midiyarim, containing eighty days, in which all living creatures received being. The laſt they ſtyle Hameſpitamidim, comprehending ſeventy-five days, wherein was made man [c].

IT is now time for us to ſpeak of the rites and ceremonies of the Perſees, antient and modern, in the exerciſe of their religion, and every thing relating thereto. They have a regular clergy, and are very zealous in aſſerting an uninterrupted ſucceſſion of perſons inſtructed in their ſacred myſteries, from the time of Zerduſht to this day. Their ordinary prieſts are obliged to live according to certain rules, much more ſevere than thoſe given to the laity, as the reader will perceive in the note of the next page.

Their

ling the doctrines of Magiiſm and Chriſtianity, made up a monſtrous ſyſtem of incredible doctrines, attended with very ridiculous practices (20). However, theſe notions were rooted out, as will be hereafter ſhewn, by the authority of the civil magiſtrate, ſo that the preſent Perſees have amongſt them none of theſe whimſical chimeras, but retain the doctrine of their anceſtors in all its purity, and are a religious, as well as a moſt inoffenſive, people, tenacious of their own principles, but complaiſant to other people, though very reſerved, from whence proceed the many miſtakes that have been made about them. When they do ſpeak they never fail to expreſs themſelves in ſuch a manner as fully purges all ſuſpicion of their being idolaters; but they cannot help ſhewing on ſuch occaſions an inveterate diſlike againſt two perſons celebrated by the greateſt part of mankind as heroes and conquerors, but looked on by them as murderers and robbers. Theſe are Alexander the Great and Mohammed, both capital enemies of their country and nation (21).

Their high-prieſts were under ſtill ſtricter obligations, and all of them were bound to diſcharge their ſacerdotal offices with mighty exactneſs and devotion [d]. As to their public worſhip, it was, and is ſtill, thus performed: in every pyreum, or fire-temple, there ſtood an alter, on which burnt the ſacred fire, which was always kept alive by the prieſt. When the people aſſembled in order to their devotion, the prieſt put on a white habit, and a mitre, with a gauſe or cloth paſſing before his mouth, that he might not breathe on the holy element: thus he read certain prayers out of the Liturgy, which he held in one hand, ſpeaking very ſoftly, and in a whiſpering ſort of tone, holding in his left hand certain ſmall twigs of a ſacred tree, which, as ſoon as the ſervice was over, he threw into the fire. At theſe times all who were preſent put up their prayers to God, for ſuch things as they ſtood in need of, and when prayers were finiſhed, the prieſt and people withdrew ſilently, and with all other tokens of awful reſpects. All theſe rites are ſtill obſerved. But to prevent, as far as poſſible, the people from falling into idolatry, the prieſt now informs them, when they are going from their devotions, of the reaſons why they worſhip before the fire, and all the obligations they are under to treat it with reverence. This exhortation runs uſually in theſe words: "Foraſmuch as fire was delivered to Zerduſht "by the almighty, as the ſymbol of his majeſty, where-"fore it was required that we ſhould eſteem it holy, and "reſpect it as an emanation from the fountain of light, "and that we ſhould love all things which reſemble it, "eſpecially the ſun and moon, the two great witneſſes of "God, the ſight of which ſhould put us in mind of his "Omniſcience; therefore let us, without ſuperſtition, "keep the command given us, ever more praiſing God "for the great uſefulneſs of this element, and beſeeching "him to make us always bear in mind the obligations "we are under to do our duty towards him, which is as "neceſſary to the health and happineſs of the mind, as "light and fire are to the eaſe and welfare of the "body" [e]. (H) Among the antient Magi there were three degrees of prieſts; ordinary prieſts, overſeers of theſe, and an archimagus like our archbiſhop, or rather a metropolitan, who was ac-

THEY keep yearly six festivals, each of five days continuance, in memory of the six seasons, wherein all things were created; after each of these feasts they keep a fast of five days in memory of God's resting five days, as they believe, at each of those seasons. As often as they eat either flesh, fowl, or fish, they carry a small part of it to the temple as an offering to God, beseeching him, that he would pardon them for taking away the lives of his creatures in order to their own subsistence. They have none of those out-of-the-way notions relating to cleanness and uncleanness in meats, which expose some religions to ridicule; but as they are a very compliant, as well as inoffensive, people, they abstain from swines-flesh, and from the flesh of kine, that they may neither offend the Mohammedans nor the Banians, among whom they are obliged to live. They eat alone, for the sake of purity and cleanliness; they likewise drink every man out of his own cup [f].

knowledged for the successor of Zoroaster, and held the supreme head of their church. These in the old Persian language were stiled Mugh, i. e. Magus, Mubad, i. e. superintendant, and Mubad Mubadan, or High-priest (22). Lord, in his account of the religion of the Persians, calls them by other names, viz. Daroos, Herboods, and Distecoos, the last he makes equivalent to Mubad Mubadan, and says there is never any more than one at a time; the chief of the clergy of the Persees. As to the duty of their priests, the same writer tells us that it is comprised in the eleven rules following, viz. 1. The observing of the rites prescribed in the liturgy of Zoroaster, because God is best pleased with that form of prayer which he has prescribed. 2. To keep his eyes from coveting that which is another's; for God having given to every man what seems meet for him in his eyes, to desire that which is another's, is not only shewing a dislike of God's providence, but is likewise affronting him, by challenging that for our due which he hath denied us. 3. To have a care always to speak the truth, for all truth cometh from God, all lies from the devil; all priests therefore should speak truth, because they are the servants of the God of truth, and as such are credited in what they say. 4. To keep close to his business, and not meddle with worldly matters, for it belongs to the layman to see the priest

When their children are initiated into their religion they ſend for a prieſt, and this is uſually done as ſoon as the child is born. The prieſt calculates its nativity; afterwards he aſks what name is to be given it. This being agreed on by the father and its relations, the prieſt telleth it to its mother, who then ſays, my child is called ſo or ſo, with which the ceremony ends at that time. The child is afterwards carried to the Pyreum, where the prieſt firſt pours ſome water into the rind of a holy tree, and thence into the mouth of the child, beſeeching God to cleanſe the tender infant from whatever ſeeds of corruption it may have received from its father, and from the impurities derived from its mother. At ſeven years of age the child is led to church to be confirmed there, the prieſt teaches him ſome prayers, and inſtructs him in the firſt principles of religion. Theſe are repeated daily, till he is well acquainted with the articles of his faith; then he is permitted to pray for the firſt time before the holy fire, after which the prieſt gives him water to drink, and a pomegranate leaf to chew; then he cauſes the lad to waſh his body with clean water, after which he puts on a linen caſſock next his ſkin, which deſcends below his waiſt, and is girt with a girdle of camel's hair, woven by the prieſt's prieſt wants nothing that is neceſſary, and to the prieſt not to deſire any thing which is ſuperfluous. 5. To get the book of the law by heart, that he may be always able to inſtruct the poor layman, and that he may ſee juſt cauſe to reverence his prieſt. 6. To keep himſelf pure and undefiled, becauſe God loves the pure and undefiled, and this way only one man can excel another. 7. To be ready to forgive all injuries, ſhewing himſelf a pattern of meekneſs, that he may be thought one come from God, for we offend God every day, yet he giveth us things that are good, though we deſerve that he ſhould pour on us evil for evil. 8. To teach the common people to pray according to the law, to go and pray with them for public benefits when they deſire it, and to perform conſtantly the known duties of his function. 9. To give licence for marriage to join the man and woman together, and to take care that parents do not marry their children without his approbation. 10. To ſpend the greateſt part of his time in the temple, that he may be ready to aſſiſt all who come to him, becauſe thereto God hath appointed him. 11. To believe no other law than that given by Zerduſht, to add nothing thereto, nor to take any thing from it, ſeeing to this end it was revealed (23).

own hand. Theſe ceremonies over, the prieſt bleſſes him, bids him be a true Perſee all the days of his life, to beware of falling into idolatry, or breaking any of the precepts given by Zerduſht [g] (I). Of their marriages we are told

(I) As to the high prieſt, he, over and above the duties enjoined the prieſts in general, is directed to obſerve the following thirteen precepts (24): 1. He muſt have a care of polluting himſelf in any manner, becauſe God hath choſen him to be holy. 2. In order to this he muſt do all things for himſelf, to preſerve himſelf from being contaminated by the uncleanneſs of others, as alſo to ſhew his humility in ſo high a ſtation. He is to take the layman's tythe, i. e. the tenth of all that he has, but not to his own uſe, for he is to conſider himſelf as the almoner of God, who makes uſe of him only to diſpenſe to the poor the tribute paid by the rich. 4. That this may appear to be fairly done, he muſt avoid all pomp and ſuperfluity, and at the year's end muſt give away the laſt farthing, ſince his revenue is ſettled, and always paid with good will. 5. His houſe muſt be near the temple, and he muſt give a good example to his flock, by ſtaying much at home, and by giving himſelf up to prayer. 6. As in his public, ſo in his private, life, he muſt be extremely frugal and temperate in all things. 7. He muſt not only be acquainted with the law, but with all the ſciences, ſeeing he is to inſtruct all others of his religion, clergy and laity. 8. He muſt keep a low diet, becauſe high eating or ſtrong liquors diſturb the faculties of the mind, and diſcompoſe that ſerenity of diſpoſition which ſhould be always found in the man of God. 9. He muſt fear only God, and hate nothing but ſin. 10. As he is ſupreme in all ſpiritual cauſes, he muſt reprove ſinners without any regard to their rank, and they muſt hear him patiently, ſince he ſpeaks not in his own cauſe but God's. 11. He muſt above all things ſtudy to diſtinguiſh truth from error. 12. Though, in conſequence of his high office, he may for his conſolation receive viſions and other manifeſtations from God, yet he is not to publiſh them, for that would but confound the people who are to adhere to the written law. 13. He muſt preſerve the ever living fire brought by Zerduſht from heaven, that it may endure through all ages, till the world ſhall be deſtroyed by that element (25).

It is very poſſible, that the reader in the peruſal of this ſection may incline to wiſh, that in ſome things we had delivered

told by a very intelligent author, that they have five sorts: First, that of children in their minority. Secondly, that of widowers with a second wife. Thirdly, of such persons as marry by their own choice. Fourthly, the marriage of the dead, which is occasioned by an opinion they have entertained, that married people are peculiarly happy in the other world; wherefore, when a young person dies in celibacy, they hire one to be married to him or her, which ceremony is performed a little after the burial. The last kind of marriage is where a person adopts either a son or a daughter, and then gives him or her in marriage, which is also founded on a religious opinion, that all men ought to leave heirs behind them, either natural or adopted. As to the ceremonies made use of on this occasion, they are very singular, but at the same time have nothing in them wild or irrational. The parties, designing to contract matrimony, are seated together on a bed, about midnight, opposite to them stand two priests, the one for the man, the other for the woman, holding rice in their hands, to intimate the fruitfulness which they wish the bridegroom. Things being in this situation, the bridegroom's priest lays his fore-finger on the woman's forehead, and says, Wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband? the woman assenting, her priest lays his fore-finger on the man's forehead, and asks the like question, which being answered in the affirmative, the parties then join hands, the man promises that he will provide her a suitable maintenance, the woman acknowledges that all she has is his; the priests then scatter rice over them, wishing that they may be fruitful, and beseeching God that they may have vered ourselves more copiously, and therefore it may not be amiss to inform him, that in treating of the Persian history, as delivered by oriental writers, we shall take occasion to retouch various points relating to the religion of the antient Persians, because much of their history depends upon them as to inconsiderable customs, such as wearing this or that colour, this or that kind of cap; these we have purposely omitted as deeming them not worthy of being mentioned in so great a work as this. Let us, however, note one thing, that their priests at confirmation sell the youth a girdle, which he is bound to keep all his life long, and to use it constantly, because when he lays it aside, he no longer enjoys the benefit of the priest's benediction. D. Hyde is of opinion, that the English saying, ungirt, unblest, has some allusion to this (26).

many ſons and daughters, that they may live in unity of mind, and arrive at a good old age, in poſſeſſion of all the joys of wedloc. The ceremony over, the woman's parents pay the dowry, and a feaſt of eight days is kept for joy of the marriage [h].

As to their burials two things are remarkable, firſt the place; ſecondly, the manner. Firſt, as to the place, they have a round tower erected, on the top of which the bodies of the dead are laid to be devoured by the fowls of the air, ſome affirm, that they have ſeparate towers for the good and for the bad; others, that men, women, and children, are placed on ſeveral towers, the reaſon of thus expoſing them we have elſewhere given, viz. the preſerveing the elements pure, for they conceive that by not intering the dead they avoid polluting the earth, and by leaving the corps unprotected from birds of pray, they provide in ſome meaſure againſt the infection of the air. However, this cuſtom was antiently eſteemed ſo barbarous by other nations, that one of the [i] apologiſts for the chriſtian faith, ſpeaking of the good effects it had on mens minds in reforming them from brutal and wicked habits, mentions this expreſly, that the Perſians, ſince they had received the chriſtian doctrines, no more expoſed the bodies of their dead, but afforded them a decent burial. Before we part with this ſubject, it may not be amiſs to obſerve what is practiſed among them, when a man is on his death-bed; a prieſt is in ſuch a caſe always ſent for, and he, drawing near the bed, prayeth thus in the ear of the ſick man; "O Almighty Lord, thou haſt commanded "that we ſhould not offend thee, this man hath offended; "thou haſt ordained that we ſhould do good, yet this "man hath done evil; thou haſt required that we ſhould "duly and exactly worſhip thee, which, however, this "man hath neglected. Now, O merciful God, at the "hour of death forgive him his offences, his miſdeeds; "and his neglects, and receive him to thyſelf!" When he is dead the prieſt comes near to him; but the corpes is put on an iron bier and carried to the place of interment, the bearers being forbid to ſpeak, as they go along, out of decency; and alſo becauſe in the grave there is an unbroken ſilence. The dead body being placed on the tower, the prieſt ſtanding at a diſtance performed the funeral funeral ſervice, which he concludes thus: "This our "brother, while he lived conſiſted of the four elements; "now he is dead, let each take his own; earth to earth, "air to air, water to water, fire to fire." They ſuppoſe, that the ſpirit wanders for three days after its departure from the body, and is in that ſpace purſued and tormented by the devil, till it is able to reach their ſacred fire, to which he cannot come. They therefore pray morning, noon, and night, during theſe three days, for the ſoul of their deceaſed brother, beſeeching God to blot out his ſins, and to cancel all his offences. On the fourth day, ſuppoſing his fate to be decided, they make a great feaſt, which cloſes the ceremonies on this occaſion[k].

UPON ſo copious a ſubject as this, it would have been an eaſy taſk to have taken up twice as much room as has been here employed about it, but the deſire we have of rendering the ſeveral parts of this work conſiſtent with each other, and not to introduce tedious diſſertations into a general hiſtory, induced us rather to run the hazard of being thought too brief, than, by a prolix account of ſo important a part of the Perſian hiſtory, to tire the reader's attention, and perplex what we intended to explain. The curious peruſer, however, may, from the pieces referred to in this account, collect at his leiſure an exact ſyſtem as well of the practical points as of the theoretical tenets of the Perſees, which would certainly prove an entertaining, as well as inſtructive, piece, tho' inconſiſtent with the deſign, in the execution of which we are now engaged.

SECT. IV.

The reigns of the kings of Perſia.

AS we know but very little of the ſtate of Perſia before Cyrus's time, we ſhall not pretend to give an account of the kings who preceded that prince. We have already ſhewn[a], that Elam or Perſia was governed in the earlieſt times by its own kings, and thoſe very powerful. Chedorlaomer, the firſt king of Elam mentioned in ſcripture, extended his conqueſts over many provinces of Aſia. For Bera king of Sodom, Birſha king and Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela or Zoar, were his tributaries [b]. Theſe five princes lived twelve years in ſubjection to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13th uniting their forces made an attempt towards the recovery of their former liberty. The king of Elam no ſooner heard that they were up in arms, but entering into an alliance with Amraphel king of Shinar, Ariech king of Ellaſar and Tidal king of nations, he marched out againſt them, and haveing firſt reduced the Rephaims, the Zuzims, the Emims, the Horites, the Amalekites, and the Amorites of Hazezontamar, at laſt he fell in upon the revolters, put their army to the rout, killed the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, and, having pillaged their cities, marched back towards Elam loaded with the ſpoils of the conquered nations. Lot, who, as Joſephus [c] informs us, aſſiſted the Sodomites, had the misfortune to be taken priſoner on this occaſion, and had been carried into captivity, had he not being timely reſcued by Abraham, who, purſuing the enemy with a ſmall body of choſen men, came up with them at Dan the fifth day after their victory, put them to flight, and returned in triumph with his brother and all his family, redeemed from the inſults of a victorious foe. By this overthrow Chedorlaomer loſt the ſovereignty of the Pentapolies, but retained his other conqueſts, which were very conſiderable. From the reign of this prince to that of Cyrus we know nothing to be relied on, but what we have already hinted at in the hiſtory of the Medes, viz. that the Elamites or Perſians were a great and powerful nation, that they were in all likelihood ſubdued by the Aſſyrians, but afterwards recovered their antient liberty, and were governed by princes of their own nation till the ninth year of Nebuchadnezzer, when they were again brought under ſubjection by that great warrior and his ally Cyaxares king of Media. While they lived in ſubjection to the Aſſyrians, Medes, and Babylonians, the throne was ſtill filled with natives of Perſia, though tributaries to thoſe greater powers. The only royal family we find upon record is, that of Achæmenes, which which muſt have been very conſpicuous, ſince Xerxes, when at the height of his glory, was proud to derive from thence his pedigree, which he does in the following manner [d].

Achæmenes.	Teiſpes.	Hyſtaſpes.
Cambyſes.	Ariaramne.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Arſames.	Xerxes.

Of this great family there were two branches; from the firſt was deſcended Cyrus the great, whoſe iſſue-mail failed in his two ſons Cambyſes and Smerdis. Some place the kings of this race in the following manner [e].

Perſes.	Cyrus.	Cambyſes.
Achæmenes.	Cambyſes.	Smerdis.
Darius.	Cyrus the Great.

They will have Perſes, of whom, ſay they, Perſia borrowed its name, to be the firſt of this family that reigned in Perſia. We are told, that Achæmenes was nurſed by an eagle [f]; and of this fabulous eagle the no leſs fabulous wolf of Romulus was perhaps a copy. Darius is mentioned by Herodotus [g], and ſuppoſed by ſome to have coined the famous Darics or Stateres Darici, which ſuppoſition is diſproved by Herodotus [h], telling us, that the Perſians had neither gold nor ſilver before the conqueſt of Lydia. Cyrus had two children, Cambyſes and Atoſſa; Atoſſa married Pharnaces king of Cappadocia [i], and Cambyſes Mandane, the ſo much celebrated daughter of Aſtyages king of Media, by whom he had Cyrus the Great (A) But as nothing occurs worthy of notice in the hiſtory of the Perſian kings before Cyrus, we ſhall proceed

ceed without dwelling on ſo barren a ſubject, to the reign of that great and glorious prince.

Cyrus. THE name of Cyrus is equally famous in ſacred and prophane hiſtory; in the latter his valour and conqueſts have rendered his memory immortal, as has in the former his kind treatment of the captive Hebrews, whom he reſtored to their antient ſtate, country, and temple, having been appointed for that by name [k] many years before he appeared in the world; an honour beſtowed upon none, but him and that excellent prince Joſiah [l] king of Judah. Profane hiſtorians are at no ſmall variance with each other touching the birth of this prince, his education and acceſſion to the crown. Herodotus and Xenephon are the only two origin authors, as we may call them, whom we can quote and follow, in what relates to the life and exploits of this prince; for other writers have copied after them, ſome adopting the accounts of the one, and ſome of the other. They are both very minute in their relations, and agree in ſome particulars, but widely differ in others. We ſhall in the firſt place hear Herodotus, the father of hiſtory as Tully calls him; but whether his accounts be genuine, or rather interwoven, and ſeaſoned to the Greek taſte, with ſeveral fabulous and ſurprizing incidents, is what we ſhall examine afterwards.

Account of the birth, education, &c. of Cyrus, according to Herodotus.

ASTYAGES, the laſt king of the Medes, being warned by a dream, that the ſon, who was to be born of his daughter Mandane, ſhould one day be lord of all Aſia, reſolved to marry her, not to a Mede worthy of her bed, but to a Perſian; and accordingly choſe one Cambyſes, ſprung from an antient family, but of a peaceable diſpoſition, and, as he thought, inferior in rank to a Mede, even of a midling condition. A year after they were married, Aſtyages was frightned by another dream portending anew, according to the interpretation of the Mages, the empire of Aſia to his grandſon (B). Hereupon Aſtyages ſends for his daughter then big with child, and upon her arrival in Media puts her under a guard, determined to deſtroy the child ſhe ſhould be delivered of; for the Ma-

ges

(B) His firſt dream was, that his daughter Mandane had voided ſo great a quantity of water as not only filled the metropolis of the kingdom, but overflowed all Aſia. In the other he ſaw a vine ſhooting from the womb of his daughter, and extending its branches over all Aſia.

ges had aſſured him, that the iſſue of his daughter was to fill his throne. Mandane, not long after her confinement, was brought to bed of a ſon, whom Aſtyages, mindful of the interpretation of the Mages, delivered to one Harpagus, enjoining him, as he tendered his own life, to take the new-born ſon of Mandane, to carry him to his houſe, and there diſpatch him with his own hands, in what manner he ſhould think beſt. Harpagus promiſed to put the king's orders in execution, and having received from the guards the infant richly dreſſed, went home under great concern, as ſeeing himſelf employed in ſo cruel and inhuman an office. He acquainted his wife as ſoon as he came home with what had paſſed between Aſtyages and himſelf, and reſolved not to execute the ſentence with his own hands, but to transfer his charge to another. With this deſign he immediately ſent for one of the king's herdſmen, who kept his cattle in paſtures lying at the foot of certain mountains, on the north of Ecbatan, towards the Caſpian ſea. The herdſman's name was Mitradates, and his wife's, in the language of the Medes, Spaco, which ſignifies a Bitch, and anſwers her Greek name Cyno. Mitradates, without delay, waited upon Harpagus, who commanded him, in the king's name, to take the infant and expoſe it in the moſt dangerous and abandoned part of the mountains, upon pain of dying in the moſt exquiſite tortures that could be invented. He added, that the king had charged him to ſee his orders put in execution. The herdſman not daring to make any remonſtrance againſt the king's commands, returned with the child to his cottage, where he found his wife juſt delivered of a ſon. During her husband's abſence, ſhe had been in great trouble and preplexity, on account of the meſſage from Harpagus, who had never before ſent for him; and therefore he no ſooner ſet his foot within the door, but ſhe aſked him in great ſurprize, why Harpagus had ſent for him in ſuch haſte? He told her that he had been in the city, where he had heard and ſeen ſuch things as grieved him beyond expreſſion; that when he arrived, the houſe of Harpagus was all in tears, and that as he went in, he was ſtruck with horror in ſeeing an infant, dreſſed in gold and the richeſt colours, panting and crying on the floor; that Harpagus had commanded him to carry away this child, and expoſe it on the mountains to the mercy of the wild beaſts, upon pain of incurring the king's diſpleaſure and undergoing the ſevereſt puniſhments that could be inflicted; that at firſt he had

ſuppoſed the unhappy infant to belong to ſome perſon of the family of Harpagus, but that he had been afterwards informed by the ſervant that attended him out of the city, and delivered the babe into his hands, that it was born of Mandane the king's daughter, and ſon to Cambyſes of Perſia, and that Aſtyages had commanded it ſhould be put to death [l].

HAVING thus ſpoke, he diſcloſed the child to his wife, who no ſooner ſaw it, but being raviſhed with the innocent ſmiles of the infant, ſhe embraced her huſband, and with many tears entreated him not to execute the orders he had received. But he remonſtrating the abſolute neceſſity he was under of obeying or forfeiting his own life, ſince the ſpies of Harpagus would without fail keep a watchful eye over him, and ſee whither he performed what had been ſo ſtrictly enjoyned him, ſhe ſuggeſted to him to take their own child that was ſtill-born, to expoſe it inſtead of the other, and bring up the ſon of Mandane as their own; for, by that means, ſaid ſhe, we ſhall ſufficiently conſult our own ſafety without injuring others; the dead child will be honoured with a royal ſepulchre, and the ſerviving infant be preſerved from an untimely death [m].

MITRADATES approved of this expedient and delivering the infant he was charged to deſtroy into his wife's hands, dreſſed the dead child in the rich apparel of the living, and carried it in the ſame baſket, in which he had brought the other, to the moſt unfrequented part of the mountains. Three days after, he acquainted Harpagus, that, if he pleaſed, he could ſhew him the dead body of the infant, and he accordingly diſpatched ſome of his friends, in whom he moſt confided, to ſee that the ſentence had been put in execution, and to inter the royal infant. Thus was Cyrus, for ſo was the infant afterwards called, delivered from the ſnares of his grandfather, and educated by the herdſman's wife as her own [n].

WHEN he attained to the age of ten years, as he was one day playing in the paſtures with other children of his age, he was choſen king by his companions, and in virtue of that dignity having diſtinguiſhed them into ſeveral orders and claſſes, the ſon of Artembares, a lord of eminent nent dignity among the Medes, who was one of his companions in the play, refuſed to obey his orders. Whereupon Cyrus commanded him to be immediately ſeized and whipt very ſeverely. The boy with many tears complained to his father of what he had ſuffered from the herdſman's ſon, and the father highly reſenting the affront, haſtened with his ſon to the king's palace, and ſhewing the prince in what a cruel and ignominious manner his ſon had been abuſed by the ſon of a ſlave, entreated him to avenge, by ſome very exemplary puniſhment the indignity offered to him and his whole family. Aſtyages promiſed to give him full ſatisfaction, and commanding both the herdſman and his ſon to be brought before him, aſked Cyrus how he, who was the ſon of ſo mean a man, had dared to abuſe the ſon of one of the chief lords in the kingdom? Cyrus replied that he had done no more than he had a right to do, for the boys of the neighbourhood having made him their king, becauſe they thought him the moſt worthy of that dignity, and performed what he, veſted with that character, had commanded, the ſon of Artembares alone had ſlighted his orders, and for his diſobedience ſuffered the puniſhment he deſerved. As the boy was pleading his cauſe with an eloquence far ſuperior to his years and education, Aſtyages took particular notice of his mein and features, and thinking that he reſembled himſelf, began to reflect on the time that his grandſon was expoſed, which he found to agree with the age of the herdſman's ſuppoſed ſon. Being perplexed with this thought, he diſmiſſed Artembares, aſſuring him, that his ſon ſhould have no cauſe to complain, and commanded his guards to conduct Cyrus into the palace. Being then in private with the herdſman, he aſked whoſe boy Cyrus was, and from whoſe hands he had him? Mitradates affirmed, that he was his own child, and that the boy's mother, who was ſtill living, would come, if he pleaſed, to atteſt it. But Aſtyages, giving no credit to what he averred, commanded his guards to ſeize him, whereupon he diſcovered, without reſerve, the whole matter, and implored the king's mercy [o].

ASTYAGES was not ſo much incenſed againſt the herdſman, as againſt his favourite Harpagus, whom he ordered the guards to bring without delay to the palace. Upon his arrival, the king in a violent paſſion aſked him in what manner manner he had put to death the son of his daughter Mandane. When Harpagus saw the herdsman, he thought he should but aggravate his crime, by attempting to elude the storm that threatned him, by any sort of falshood, and therefore openly confessed what he had done; adding, that he thought he had taken the most effectual means he could to put his orders in execution, and that he truly believed the child was dead, since the most trusty among his friends had assured him, that they had seen and interred the body [p].

Astyages, dissembling his resentment, acquainted Harpagus with what the herdsman had confessed, adding, that the child was still alive, and that he was very well pleased his orders had not been executed; for he had been under great concern ever since he issued that cruel command, and had not been able to bear the reproaches of his daughter. He then ordered Harpagus to send his son to wait on the young Cyrus, and to come himself that night to sup with him, since he intended to offer a sacrifice to the gods, in thanksgiving for the care they had taken of his grandson [q].

Harpagus, overjoyed at the king's speech, returned home, and acquainting his wife with what had passed, immediately sent his only son to attend Cyrus, as he had been commanded. His son, who was about 30 years old, no sooner entered the palace, but he was seized, barbarously murdered, and cut in pieces by order of Astyages, who gave directions that the mangled body, variously dressed and disguised, should be served up at supper. Harpagus and the rest of the guests repaired to the palace at the hour appointed; the others were splendidly entertained, but the table, where Harpagus supped, was served only with the flesh of his son. When he had done, the king asked him whether he had been pleased with his victuals; and Harpagus answering, that he had never tasted any thing more delicious, the officers appointed for that purpose brought in a basket containing the head, hands, and feet of his son, desiring him to uncover the basket and take what he liked best. He did as they desired, and beheld the remains of his only child, without betraying any sort of concern or resentment at so shocking a sight; such was the command he had of his passions. The king enquired whether he knew with what kind of meat he had been entertained?

Harpagus

[p] Idem, ibid. [q] Idem, ibid.

Harpagus replyed, he knew very well, and was always pleaſed with whatever his ſovereign thought fit to ordain. Having thus replyed, with a ſurprizing temper, he collected the mangled parts of his innocent ſon, and went home, as our author conjectures, to inter them [r]

ASTYAGES, having thus vented his rage upon the unfortunate Harpagus, began to conſider with himſelf what he ſhould do with Cyrus; and having again conſulted the Mages, the anſwer was, that if the boy lived, he muſt of neceſſity be king. Aſtyages then acquainted them, that he was ſtill alive, adding, as a very material circumſtance, that he had been choſen king by the boys of the neighbourhood where he lived, and performed all the parts of a real king with the utmoſt rigor and ſeverity. Hereupon the Mages replied, that the prediction of his reign was already accompliſhed, in the choice which the boys had made of him for their king, and that he would never reign a ſecond time; for dreams, ſaid they, often end in things of ſmall importance, and are filled by trifling events. They adviſed him therefore to diveſt himſelf of all fear, and ſend the boy to his parents in Perſia [s].

ASTYAGES, well pleaſed with this anſwer, called Cyrus, and owning how much he had been wanting in the affection, which he ought naturally to have had for him, by reaſon of an inſignificant dream, deſired him to get ready for a journey into Perſia, where he would find his real father and mother, in circumſtances very different from thoſe of the poor herdſman Mitradates and his wife Spaco [t].

THUS Aſtyages, after many kind expreſſions, diſmiſſed his young grandſon attended by ſeveral lords of the firſt rank. Upon his arrival at his father's houſe, he was received by his parents with a tenderneſs and joy, which it is more eaſy to conceive than expreſs. As they had long given him over for dead, they aſked him in what manner his life had been preſerved. He then acquainted them, that he had lived in an entire ignorance of his condition, and had been unacquainted with his true birth, believing himſelf the ſon of the king's herdſman, till thoſe, who attended him on his journey into Perſia, informed him of all that had paſſed. He related how he had been educated by the herdſman's wife, and frequently repeating the name of Cyno, commended her on all occaſions. And this this name his parents made use of, as our author informs us, to persuade the Persians, that the preservation of their son was in a very particular manner owing to the immortal gods, since he had been nourished, as they industriously spread abroad and was commonly believed, by a bitch [u].

When Cyrus attained to the age of manhood, and was become very popular in his own country, and famous in Media on account of his extraordinary parts, Harpagus, who had never forgot the inhuman murder of his son, began to court his friendship, with a design to join with him, who had been equally injured, in revenging so barbarous a treatment. At the same time, he solicited the leading men among the Medes, who were highly dissatisfied with the tyrannical government of Astyages, to take up arms, and redeem themselves and their unhappy country from the calamities they groaned under, by deposing Astyages, and advancing his grandson Cyrus to the throne. They all to a man shewed themselves disposed to second his designs; whereupon he thought it high time to discover his intentions to Cyrus, who was to act the chief part in this revolution. And accordingly, he acquainted him with them by a letter, which, as all the roads leading to Persia were guarded by the king's troops, he conveyed to him in the belly of a hare; the hare he delivered to one of his most trusty domestics, dressed in the habit of a hunter, enjoining him to desire Cyrus not to open the letter in the presence of any person whatsoever [w].

The messenger executed his orders, and Cyrus opening the hare with his own hands, found a letter, reminding him of the care which the gods had had of his preservation, against the wicked designs and barbarous attempts of his grandfather, and encouraging him to stir up the Persians to a revolt, and at the head of their forces to invade Media, where all the chief commanders were ready to join him, and determined, at all events, to advance him to the throne, instead of his unnatural grandfather. He took care to put him in mind of what he had suffered on his account, and how barbarously he had been punished for not executing the king's bloody orders. Cyrus having read the letter, began to consider what measures he should take to induce the Persians to revolt, and, after various schemes, fixed upon the following as the most proper. He feigned a letter from Astyages, appointing him comman-

commander in chief of all the Perſian forces; this he read in a general aſſembly of the nation, and in virtue of his new commiſſion commanded them all to attend him, every man with a hatchet. He was obeyed, and being all met in purſuance to his orders, he enjoined them to clear in one day a ſpot of ground, containing 18 or 20 furlongs, over-grown with thorns and briars. This laborious piece of work being performed, not without ſome reluctancy, he diſmiſſed them with orders to attend him again the next day. In the mean time, he cauſed all his father's flocks and herds to be killed and dreſſed, provided wine, and bought all the dainties Perſia could ſupply him with. They all aſſembled the next day, expecting to be employed as they had been the day before. But, contrary to their expectation, Cyrus ordered them to ſit down on the green turf, and entertained them with a great feaſt. When they had ſolaced themſelves with dainties, which to that time they had been ſtrangers to, the young prince aſked them, whether they would chuſe to live always in that manner, or as they had done the day before? They all anſwered readily, that as they preferred mirth and pleaſure to toil and labour, ſo they did the condition of the preſent day to that of the precedent. Upon this anſwer Cyrus acquainted them, that if they hearkened to his advice they ſhould enjoy theſe and far greater pleaſures, without any kind of ſervile labour; but, if they refuſed to follow him, they muſt undergo innumerable hardſhips, like thoſe they had complained of the day before. He then diſcloſed to them his true deſign of delivering his country from the Median bondage, and encouraged his countrymen to join him in ſo great and glorious an enterprize, by telling them, that ſome divine power had brought him into the world, and miraculouſly ſaved his life, that he might be one day the author of their happineſs. The Perſians, who had lived for many years, with the utmoſt reluctancy, in ſubjection to the Medes, declared him with one accord their leader, and proteſted, that they would ſtand by him in ſo good a cauſe, even at the expence of their lives.

In the mean time, Aſtyages, being informed of what was doing in Perſia, diſpatched a meſſenger to Cyrus, enjoining him to repair forthwith into Media; but Cyrus by the ſame meſſenger returned this reſolute anſwer, That he would come ſooner than Aſtyages deſired. Whereupon the king drew together all his forces, and forgetful of his cruelty towards Harpagus, appointed him general of the army. The two nations came to a general engagement; but the chief officers among the Medes paſſing over to Cyrus, with the bodies under their command, the reſt of the army was routed with great ſlaughter. When Aſtyages heard of this defeat, he flew into a violent paſſion, and vowing that Cyrus ſhould not long enjoy the pleaſure of his victory, he firſt cauſed the Mages, who had interpreted his dream, to be impaled, and then arming all the Medes, marched out himſelf at the head of them. Both armies came to a ſecond engagement, in which the Medes were again defeated, and the king himſelf taken priſoner. Aſtyages in this ſtate was reproached and inſulted by the revengeful Harpagus, who among other things aſked him, what he now thought of his tragical feaſt, when he compelled him to devour the fleſh of his own ſon, for which inhuman and barbarous action he had now fallen from the throne to a priſon. Aſtyages in return, fixing his eyes on Harpagus, aſked him whether he had been inſtrumental in bringing about this revolution. He anſwered, that is was chiefly owing to him, ſince he had the firſt encouraged Cyrus to this undertaking. Then, replyed Aſtyages, you are the weakeſt and moſt unjuſt of all men: the weakeſt, in giving the kingdom to another, when you might have ſeized on it yourſelf, ſince you have been able to effect this change; the moſt unjuſt, in inſlaving your country to revenge a private injury. For if you were determined to depoſe me and confer the kingdom for another without taking the power in your own hands, you might with more juſtice have advanced a Mede to that dignity than a Perſian. Whereas the Medes, who were before lords of Perſia, and noways concerned in the injury, are now by your means reduced to the condition of ſlaves, and the Perſians who were ſervants to the Medes, are now become their lords. In this manner, concludes our author, Aſtyages was deprived of the kingdom after he had reigned 35 years, and through his cruelty the Medes became ſubject to the Perſians, after they had ruled over all thoſe provinces of Aſia that lie on the other ſide of the Halys for the ſpace of 128 years, including the time of the Scythian dominion over that part of Aſia. As for Aſtyages, Cyrus kept him priſoner in his palace, till he died, without practiſing any farther ſeverity upon him [x].

[x] Herodot. ubi ſupra.

THIS is the account which Herodotus gives us, and every impartial and judicious reader must conclude to be an arrant romance, composed, perhaps, by some admirer of Cyrus, and adopted by our author as more agreeable to the depraved taste of his countrymen, who took more delight in surprizing, tho' fabulous, events, than in the relation of plain historical truths.

WHAT the same author relates of the death of this great hero, deserves, in our opinion, no more credit, than what he has told us of his birth, education, and advancement to the crown. This prince, according to him[y], invaded the Massagetes, and having in the first battle feigned a flight, left a great quantity of provisions, especially of wine, in the field. The barbarians did not fail to seize on the booty, and indulged themselves in drinking to such an excess, that they all fell asleep on the spot. In this condition Cyrus returned upon them, obtained an easy victory, and took a great many prisoners, among whom was Spargapises the son of queen Tomyris. This heroine, being informed of the defeat of her troops and captivity of her son, sent a herald to Cyrus, entreating him to release the young prince; which he refusing to do, Spargapises, preferring death to slavery, laid violent hands on himself. Whereupon his mother Tomyris, animated with an eager desire of revenge, gave the Persians battle a second time, which, says our author, was the most obstinate and bloody that ever was fought by the barbarians. many fell on both sides; but at last the Massagetes carrying the day, the greatest part of the Persian army was cut in pieces, and Cyrus himself killed in the field, after having reigned 29 years. Tomyris, having found his body among the slain, caused his head to be cut off, and thrown into a vessel filled with human blood, insulting the memory of the dead prince with these words, Glut thy self with the blood which thou hast so insatiably thirsted after.

WHAT the same historian relates of his childish revenge upon the river Gyndes (C), while he was on his march to besiege Babylon, is utterly repugnant to the idea we have of that wise and experienced commander. For he tells us, that one of the sacred horses of Cyrus being drowned in that river, the prince, highly reſenting ſuch an affront, immediately cauſed the Gyndes to be cut by his army into 360 channels; a work which employed his army the whole ſummer, and obliged him to poſtpone the ſiege of Babylon to the ſpring enſuing. Who can imagine, that a commander of ſo great experience and ſuch an extraordinary moderation, as Cyrus is, even by Herodotus himſelf, repreſented to have been, while he was marching to the conqueſt of Babylon, ſhould ſo idely waſte his time, and ſpend the ardour of his troops, in ſuch an unprofitable piece of work?

(C) The river Gyndes rises on the hills of Matiene, and passing through Dardania falls into the Tigris.

We ſhall now give what we look upon as the true hiſtory of Cyrus, being extracted out of Xenophon, whom we chuſe to follow in what concerns that great conqueror and excellent prince, ſeeing his accounts are far more agreeable to holy writ, the ſtandard of truth, than thoſe of Herodotus. We are told, for inſtance, in ſcripture, that the Babylonians were reduced by the united forces of the Medes and Perſians, and this is what we read in Xenophon: whereas Herodotus raiſes the Perſian empire on the ruins of that of the Medes, which is repugnant to ſcripture. It is true, that moſt of the ancients have choſen to follow Herodotus rather than Xenophon; but that we can eaſily account for. The relations of the former are interwoven with events far more ſtrange and ſurprizing, and conſequently more diverting and acceptable to the reader; whence they were preferred to thoſe of the latter, in which we find nothing calculated to raiſe admiration. This natural inclination in a writer to adopt ſuch accounts as he thinks will prove moſt agreeable to the reader, has been greatly countenanced by Plato [z], who, in giving a character of Xenophon's Cyropædia, tells us, that he rather deſcribed in that work what a worthy and juſt prince ought to be, than give us a true hiſtory of what that prince really was. From this paſſage Diogenes Laertius concludes [a], that Plato looked on the inſtitution of Cyrus as a fiction. Tully paſſes the ſame judgment on this performance, ſaying [b], that Xenophon's Cyrus was not intended for a true hiſtory, but to ſerve as a model of a juſt empire. Moſt of the modern critics have declared themſelves of the ſame opinion; and we muſt own, that as Xenophon was both a great commander and philoſopher he has woven into that hiſtory many of his own maxims of war and policy. But it does not follow from hence, that the ground-plot of the work, and the moſt material tranſactions he relates, may not be called a true hiſtory. That he intended it for ſuch, is plain; for in the very beginning of the work he acquaints us, that he had taken great care and pains to inform himſelf of Cyrus's birth, education, and character; and that it is really ſuch, its conformity with holy writ ſufficiently ſhews. Wherefore bating his military and political deſcants and digreſſions, the remaining part, bare matters of fact, is to be looked upon as a true hiſtory. He was eſteemed by the ancients [c] a writer of great judgment and penetration, and, having lived in the court of Cyrus the younger, had opportunities of being better informed of what he wrote concerning that great prince, than Herodotus could have; and as he confined himſelf to this ſubject alone, no doubt but he examined all matters relating to it, with more care and exactneſs than the other, who wrote of ſo many different ſubjects and nations. And theſe are the motives that have induced us to follow Xenophon in what relates to Cyrus, rather than Herodotus or thoſe who have copied after him (D).

The true hiſtory of Cyrus. Year of the Flood 2400. Before Chriſt, 599.

Cyrus was the ſon of Cambyſes, king of Perſia, and of Mandane, the daughter of Aſtyages king of the Medes (E). He was born a year after his uncle Cyaxares the brother of Mandane. He lived the firſt twelve years of his life with his parents in Perſia, where he was educated after the Perſian manner, and inured to hardſhips and ſuch exerciſes as might enable himto go through the toils and fatigues of war (F). When he was twelve years old his mother Mandane took him with her into Media to his grandfather

[c] See Diog. Laert. in vit Xenophon.

(D) Scaliger thinks, that the Cyropædia contains nothing but fables and fictions, if we except two or three events, which are related alſo by Herodotus; and Eraſmus will not even allow Xenophon to have given us an exact model of a juſt government, but rather to have drawn a cunning and deceitful prince: ſo fond are they of the ſurprizing incidents related by his antagoniſt Herodotus.

(E) Both Herodotus and Xenophon agree in this, viz. that the mother of Cyrus was Mandane daughter to Aſtyages; but Cteſias would have us believe, that Cyrus was no ways related to Aſtyages, or Aſtigas as he is pleaſed to call him.

(F) The name of Perſia at that time extended only to one province of that large empire, which was afterwards known by the Aſtyages, who, from the many things he had heard of that young prince, had a deſire to ſee him. During the time of his reſidence at this court, the ſweetneſs of his temper, his generous behaviour, and conſtant endeavour to oblige all, gained him the affections of the Medes, and ſuch an intereſt among the leading men of that nation, as did afterwards much contribute to the erecting of the great empire he founded [d].

When Cyrus was about ſixteen years of age, Evil-merodach, the ſon of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, being abroad on a hunting-match a little before his marriage, to ſhew his bravery, made an inroad into the territories of the Medes, which drew out Aſtyages with his forces to oppoſe the invader. On this occaſion Cyrus attending his grandfather firſt entered the ſchool of war, and behaved ſo well, that the victory, which the Medes gained over the Babylonians, was chiefly owing to his valour. The next year he returned to his father in Perſia, where he remained till he was forty years of age, when he was recalled to the aſſiſtance of his uncle Cyaxares [e].

Astyages king of the Medes was ſucceeded, as we have ſhewn in the hiſtory of that people, by his ſon Cyaxares brother to Mandane Cyrus's mother. This prince was ſcarce warm on his throne, when he was informed, that Nerigliſſar king of Babylon was preparing a powerful army to invade Media, that he had already engaged ſeveral princes on his ſide, and amongſt others Crœſus king of Lydia, and that he had diſpatched ambaſſadors into Cappadocia, Phrygia, Caria, paphlagonia, Cilicia, and even to the Indies, to inſtil jealouſies into the ſeveral princes of theſe countries, and to ſtir them up againſt the Medes and Perſians, as aſpiring to an univerſal monarchy. Cyaxares therefore called Cyrus out of Perſia to his aſſiſtance, and, upon his arrival with a body 30000 Perſians, appointed him commander in chief both of the Medes and Perſians [f] (G).

He

the name of Perſia. For the whole Perſian nation could at that time raiſe but 120,000 men (2). But after the conqueſts of Cyrus, it took in that vaſt tract, which extended eaſt and weſt from the Indus to the Tigris, and north and ſouth from the Caſpian ſea to the ocean.

(G) This army conſiſted of 30,000 men, all infantry, for the Perſians had yet no cavalry; but they were all choſen men, and raiſed

He had not been long in Media before Cyaxares had occaſion to employ him. The king of Armenia, who had hitherto lived in ſubjection to the Medes, looking upon them as ready to be ſwallowed up, by the powerful alliance formed againſt them, thought fit to lay hold of that opportunity and ſhake off the yoke. Accordingly he refuſed to pay the uſual tribute, and to ſend his quota of auxiliaries, which he was obliged to furniſh in time of war. As this was a matter of dangerous conſequence, and which might prompt other dependant ſtates to do the ſame, Cyrus thought it neceſſary to cruſh this revolt with the utmoſt expedition, and therefore marching immediately with a choſen body of horſe, and covering his deſign, as if he intended only to hunt on the hills of Armenia, he entered that country, before the inhabitantst had any intelligence of his march, ſurprized the king and all his family, and having obliged him to pay the uſual tribute and ſend his quota of auxiliaries, reſtored him to his kingdom, and returned in triumph to his army in Media [g].

Both parties had now been employed three years together in forming their alliances, and making preparations of war. In the beginning of the 4th year the confederate armies on both ſides took the field, and being come in ſight of each other, the Babylonians under Nerigliſſar their king encamped and fortified themſelves with ſtrong intrenchments, while the Medes and Perſians under the command of Cyrus covered themſelves with the neighbouring hills and villages. In this poſture they continued for ſome days, till at length the Babylonians leaving their raiſed after a particular manner. Firſt of all Cyrus choſe out of the nobility 201 officers: each of theſe was ordered to chuſe four more of the ſame rank which made a thouſand in all; and theſe were called ὁμότιμοι or men of the ſame dignity, and eminently diſtinguiſhed themſelves on all occaſions. Every one of theſe was ordered to raiſe among the people ten pike-men lightly armed, ten ſlingers, and ten bow-men; which amounted in the whole to 31000 men (3). From the year in which Cyrus, arriving in Media at the head of theſe troops, was veſted with the command of the confederate army, thoſe begin their computation, who will have this prince to have reigned thirty years. For from this time he was looked upon by all foreign nations as king of Perſia and Media, though the regal power was ſolely in Cyaxares, and Cyrus was only general of the united forces, intrenchments, and drawing themſelves up in battle-array, Cyrus advanced to attack them. On the ſide of the Aſſyrians, the bow-men and ſlingers made their diſcharge before the enemy was within reach. But the Perſians, animated by the preſence and example of Cyrus, immediately cloſed in with the enemy, and broke through their battalions. The Babylonians, notwithſtanding all the efforts uſed by Crœſus and their own king, were not able to ſtand ſo rude a ſhock, but immediately betook themſelves to a precipitous flight. At the ſame time the, cavalry of the Medes fell upon the enemies horſe, which was likewiſe put to the rout. Cyrus purſued them cloſe to their intrenchments, but, not thinking himſelf in a condition to force them, ſounded the retreat, In this battle Nerigliſſar king of the Babylonians was killed; whereupon Crœſus king of Lydia, as being in dignity next to him, took the command of the conquered army, and made as good a retreat as he could. But the next day Cyrus returned to the charge, drove the Babylonians from their camp, and with the aſſiſtance of the Hyrcanians, who had revolted to him the night before, took a great many priſoners and the baggage of the whole army [h]. Cyrus reſerved all the horſes that were taken for himſelf, in order to form a body of cavalry for the Perſian army, which hitherto they had wanted. The richeſt and moſt valuable part of the booty he ſet apart for Cyaxeres; and as for the priſoners, he allowed them to return home to their reſpective countries, without impoſing any other condition upon them, than that they ſhould deliver up their and engage no more againſt him and his allies [i].

Nerigliſſar killed.

THE death of Nerigliſſar was a great loſs to the Babylonians; for he was a prince of great courage, conduct, and wiſdom, the preparations he made for the war ſhewed his wiſdom, and his dying in it his valour. But nothing made the Babylonians more ſenſible of the loſs they had ſuffered, than the tyrannical government of his ſon and ſucceſſor Laboroſoarchod, who was in every thing quite the reverſe of his father, being addicted to all manner of wickedneſs, cruelty, and injuſtice. Two acts of his cruelty towards two Babylonian lords, Gobrias and Gadates, are particularly mentioned, as having provoked them to join Cyrus, and be very inſtrumental in the ſubverſion of the Babylonian empire. The only ſon of the former former he ſlew at a hunting match, to which he had invited him, for no other reaſon, but that he pierced with his dart a wild beaſt which the king had miſſed. The other he cauſed to be made an eunuch, becauſe one of his concubines had commended him as an handſome man. Theſe acts of tyranny drove the two noblemen, with the provinces they governed, over to Cyrus, and haſtened the conqueſt of Babylon. For Cyrus, encouraged hereby, determined to penetrate into the very heart of the enemy's country, and having taken poſſeſſion of the provinces, caſtles, and ſtrong-holds, which the two injured princes had been truſted with, he got a footing in Aſſyria, which greatly contributed to the reduction of Babylon itſelf. The king took the field againſt Gadates, but being met by Cyrus he was put to flight, and obliged to retire with great ſlaughter to his metropolis. Cyrus, having thus ſpent the ſummer in ravaging the enemy's country, and ſhewn himſelf twice before the walls of Babylon, in order to provoke the king to battle, marched back into Media, and on his march took three ſtrong-holds on the frontiers [k].

As ſoon as Cyrus was retired, Loboroſoarchod, being now in no dread of the enemy, gave looſe to all the wicked inclinations that were predominant in him, inſomuch, that his own ſubjects, not being able to bear any longer his tyrannical government, conſpired againſt him, and murdered him in the ninth month of his reign[l]. Nabonadius, who had the chief hand in the murder, was placed on the throne, and had he been left to himſelf, the Babylonians would not have bettered their condition by the change. But his mother, who was a woman of extraordinary parts, took the main burden of public affairs upon herſelf, and, while her ſon followed his pleaſures, did all that could be done by human prudence to preſerve the tottering empire. She perfected the works which Nebuchadnezzar had begun for the defence of Babylon, raiſed ſtrong fortifications on the ſide of the river, and cauſed a wonderful vault to be made under it, leading from the old palace to the new, 12 foot high and 15 wide. This ſhe did to maintain a communication between the two palaces, which were ſtrong fortreſſes and ſeparated by the river[m], that in caſe one of them ſhould be diſtreſſed by the

the enemy, or either of them taken, there might be relief from, or a ſafe retreat to, the other.

WHILE the queen was thus taking all poſſible precautions againſt the enemy, Cyaxares came to Cyrus's camp, and after ſeveral conſultations they determined to alter their method; and, inſtead of contenting themſelves only with ravaging the enemies territories, they thought it was neceſſary to employ their troops in taking of towns and fortreſſes, that ſo they might make themſelves maſters of the country, and diſtreſs the city of Babylon by intercepting their proviſions [n]. Accordingly they took many cities, and brought under ſubjection entire provinces, without meeting with any conſiderable reſiſtance from the Babylonians. The progreſs Cyrus made in thoſe conqueſts rouſed at laſt Nabonadius, who taking along with him great part of his treaſures, left Babylon and repaired to Crœſus king of Lydia, by whoſe aſſiſtance and intereſt he concluded a formidable alliance with the Egyptians, Greeks, Thracians, and all the nations of the Leſſer Aſia. Theſe various nations under the conduct of Crœſus, who was by the king of Babylon appointed chief commander of all his forces, aſſembled near the river Pactolus, and from thence advanced to Thymbra, which was the place appointed for the general rendezvous. Cyrus, being informed of theſe vaſt preparations by one of his intimate friends, who by his order had fled over to the enemy as a deſerter, put himſelf into a condition to oppoſe them; and having increaſed the number of his forces by new levies, he took leave of Cyaxares, who remained in Media with a third part of the troops, that the country might not be left entirely defenceleſs, and marched forwards to meet the confederate forces in their own territories, in order to conſume their forage, and diſconcert their meaſures, by the quickneſs of his march and boldneſs of his undertaking. After a long march he came up with the enemy at Thymbra, a city of Lydia, not far from Sardis, the metropolis of that country. Cyrus's army was 196000 ſtrong, horſe and foot, beſides theſe troops he had 300 chariots armed with ſcythes, each chariot drawn by four horſes abreaſt, covered with trappings that were proof againſt all ſorts of miſſive weapons: he had likewiſe a great number of other chariots of a larger ſize, upon each of which he placed a tower about 18 or 20 feet high, and in each tower was lodged lodged 20 archers. Theſe chariots were drawn by 16 oxen yoked abreaſt. There was moreover a conſiderable number of camels, each mounted by two Arabian archers, the one looking towards the head, and the other towards the hinder part of the camel. The army of Crœſus was twice as numerous as that of Cyrus, amounting in the whole to 420,000 men. Both armies were drawn up on an immenſe plain, which gave room for the extending of their wings to the right and left; and the deſign of Crœſus, upon which alone he founded his hopes of victory, was to ſurround and hem in the enemy's army. He placed the Egyptians, who alone made a body of 120,000 men and were the main ſtrength of the army, in the center [o].

Bartle of Thymbra. Year of the flood 2455. Before Chriſt 544.

WHEN the two armies were in ſight of each other, Crœſus, obſerving how much the front of his army exceeded that of Cyrus, made the center halt, and the two wings advance with a deſign to incloſe Cyrus's army, and begin the attack on both ſides at the ſame time. When the two detached bodies of the Lydian forces were ſufficiently extended, Crœſus gave the ſignal to the main body, which marched up to the front of the Perſian army, while the two wings attacked them in flank, ſo that Cyrus's army was hem'd in on all ſides, and, as our author expreſſes it, incloſed like a ſmall ſquare drawn within a great one [p].

THIS Motion did not at all alarm Cyrus, who, giving his troops the ſignal to face about, attacked in flank the enemies forces that were marching to fall upon his rear, and put them into great diſorder. In the ſame moment a ſquadron of camels was made to advance againſt the enemies other wing, conſiſting moſtly of cavalry. The horſes upon the approach of the camels were ſo frightened, that moſt of them threw their riders and trod them under foot, which occaſioned a great confuſion. While they were thus in diſorder, Artageſes, an officer of great experience, at the head of a ſmall body of horſe, charged them ſo briſkly, that they could never afterwards rally, and at the ſame time the chariots armed with ſcythes being furiouſly driven againſt them, they were entirely routed. Both the enemy's wings being put to flight, Cyrus commanded Abradates his chief favourite to fall upon the center with the chariots we have mentioned above. The firſt ranks, conſiſting moſtly of Lydians, not being able to ſtand ſo violent lent a charge, immediately gave way; but the Egyptians being covered with their bucklers, and marching ſo cloſe that the chariots had not room to penetrate their ranks, a great ſlaughter of the Perſians enſued. Abradates himſelf was killed, his chariot overturned, and moſt part of his men cut in pieces, after having ſignalized themſelves in a very extraordinary manner. Upon his death the Egyptians advancing boldly obliged the Perſian infantry to give way, and drove them back quite to their engines. There they met with a new ſhower of arrows and javelins diſcharged upon them from the towers, and at the ſame time the Perſian rear advancing ſword in hand obliged their archers and ſpear-men to return to the charge. In the mean time, Cyrus, having put to flight both the horſe and foot on the left of the Egyptians, puſhed on to the center, where he had the mortification to find his Perſians again giving ground, and judging that the only way to ſtop the Egyptians, who were purſuing them, would be to attack them in the rear, he did ſo, and at the ſame time the Perſian cavalry coming up to his aſſiſtance, the fight was renewed with great ſlaughter on both ſides, for the Egyptians facing about defended themſelves with incredible bravery. Cyrus himſelf was in great danger; for his horſe being killed under him, he fell in the midſt of the enemies, but being ſaved by the Perſians, who, alarmed at this danger, threw themſelves headlong upon thoſe that ſurrounded him, the battle became more bloody than ever. At length Cyrus admiring the valour of the Egyptians, and concerned to ſee ſuch brave men periſh, offered them honourable conditions, letting them know at the ſame time, that all their allies had abandoned them. They accepted the terms offered them, and, having agreed with Cyrus that they ſhould not be obliged to carry arms againſt Crœſus, in whoſe ſervice they had been engaged, ſurrendered themſelves to the conqueror, and from that time ſerved him with the utmoſt fidelity [q] (H).

This obſervation, and many others he makes in his

THE engagement laſted till night, when Crœſus retired with his troops to Sardis, and the other nations made the beſt of their way to their reſpective countries. Cyrus did not think fit to purſue them, but the next morning advanced towards Sardis. Crœſus hearing of his approach marched out with his Lydians, for the auxiliaries were already retired, to give him battle. Their principal ſtrength conſiſted in cavalry, which Cyrus being ſenſible of, made his camels advance againſt them, whoſe ſmell the horſes not being able to endure, they were immediately put in diſorder. However, the Lydians, who at that time were one of the moſt warlike nations of Aſia, diſmounting, fought on foot, but, after having kept their ground very obſtinately for ſome time, were forced to make their retreat to Sardis, where they were immediately cloſely beſieged by Cyrus[r] (I).

THE night after he inveſted the city he made himſelf maſter of the citadel, being conducted to it in the dead of the night by a Perſian ſlave, who had been a ſervant to the governor of that place. At break of day he entered the city, where he found no reſiſtance, the Lydians having diſperſed at the news of the citadel's being taken. Cyrus's firſt care was to ſave the town, which was the moſt wealthy of all Aſia, from being plundred. With this view he acquainted the inhabitants, that their lives Sardes taken his Cyropædia, in order to prove the truth of the things he advances, ſhew plainly, that he wrote that piece as a true hiſtory of Cyrus, at leaſt with reſpect to the ſubſtance of it, and greateſt part of the tranſactions.

(I) While Cyrus lay encamped before Sardis he performed the exequies of Abradates and Panthea his wife. Abradates was prince of Shuſham under the Babylonians, and had revolted to Cyrus, about two years before, being induced thereto by his wife, a woman of extraordinary beauty, whom Cyrus had taken priſoner in his firſt engagement with the Babylonians, and treated in a moſt obliging manner. This kind treatment drew over her huſband to Cyrus, and he being killed in the engagement with the Egyptians, as we have mentioned above, Panthea out of grief ſlew herſelf upon his dead body, and Cyrus cauſed them both to be interred with great pomp, and a ſtately monument to be erected over them near the river Pactolus, where it was to be ſeen many ages after (5).

should be spared, and neither their wives nor children touched, provided they brought him all their gold and silver. This condition they readily complied with, and Crœsus himself, who was taken and brought to Cyrus, set them an example by delivering his immense treasures up to the conqueror. Cyrus, touched with compassion at the king's misfortune, and admiring his constancy in so great a change, treated him with great clemency, suffering him to enjoy both the title and authority of king, under the sole restriction of not having power to make war. From that time he took him with him in all his expeditions, either out of esteem for that prince, or out of policy, that he might be more secure of his persons (K).

Cyrus

(K) The taking of Crœsus is differently related by Herodotus, and those who have copied after him (6). According to these, Crœsus being shut up in Sardis dispatched ambassadors to all his allies, intreating their assistance. But in the mean time Cyrus pressed the siege so vigorously, that he took the city, before any succours could arrive, and the king in it, whom he condemned to be burnt alive. And accordingly placed him on a great pile of wood, accompanied by fourteen young Lydians. The design of Cyrus in so doing was, according to Herodotus, to offer this sacrifice to some God as the first fruits of his victory, or to perform a vow, or perhaps to see, as he had heard of his piety towards the gods, whether any of them would save him from the fire. When Crœsus had ascended the pile, notwithstanding the weight of his misfortunes, he recollected the words of Solon, who had told him, no man could be called happy before his death. Revolving these words in his mind, he cried out with a great sigh three times, Solon, Solon, Solon. Which when Cyrus heard, he commanded his interpreter to ask him, whose assistance he implored. Upon this Crœsus acquainted him, that Solon, an Athenian philosopher, having formerly visited him, and viewed his immense treasures, had despised all, and plainly told him, instead of applauding his happiness, that he could not pronounce any man happy so long as he lived, because no man could foresee what might happen to him before his death; of the truth of which being now thoroughly convinced by his present calamity, he called upon the name of Solon. This raised in Cyrus such a sense of the uncertainty of all human felicity, and compassion for Crœsus, that he commanded the fire to be presently extinguished, and the unfortunate king taken down.

Accordingly

(6) Herodot. l. i. c. 85.

CYRUS after the conqueſt of Lydia continued in Leſſer Aſia, till he had ſubdued the ſeveral nations inhabiting that great continent, from the Ægean ſea to the Euphrates. From thence he marched into Syria and Arabia, and having brought thoſe nations likewiſe under ſubjection, he again entered Aſſyria, and marched towards Babylon, the only city in all the eaſt that now held out againſt him. Nabonadius, or, as, Herodotus calls him, Labynitus, hearing that he was advancing to his metropolis, marched out to give him battle, but being without much ado put to flight, he retreated to Babylon, where he was immediately blocked up and cloſely beſieged by Cyrus. The ſiege of this important place was no eaſy enterprize. The walls were of a prodigious height, the number of men to defend them very great, and the city ſtored with all ſorts of proviſions for twenty years. However, theſe difficulties did not diſcourage Cyrus from proſecuting his deſign. But deſpairing to take the place by ſtorm, he cauſed a line of circumvallation to be drawn quite round the city with a large and deep ditch, reckoning that if all communication with the country

Accordingly all endeavours were uſed to execute his orders, but the fire could not be maſtered. In this diſtreſs Crœſus being informed that Cyrus deſigned to ſave his life, but ſeeing his Perſians attempted in vain to extinguiſh the flame, burſt out into a flood of tears, and with a loud voice invoking Apollo, beſought that god to deliver him from the preſent danger, if any of his offerings had ever been agreeable to him. He had ſcarce ended his prayer when clouds were ſeen gathering in the air, which before was ſerene, and a violent ſtorm of rain enſuing quite extinguiſhed the flame. Cyrus underſtanding by this miraculous event that Crœſus was a pious prince and greatly favoured by the gods, not only ſpared his life, but allowed him a very honourable maintenance, and made uſe of him ever after as one of his chief councellors, and at his death recommended him to his ſon Cambyſes, as the perſon whoſe advice he would have him chiefly to follow.

The ſame writer tells us, that, upon the taking of the city of Sardis, a certain Perſian, not knowing Crœſus, advanced to kill him. As he, not caring to ſurvive that diſaſter, did not attempt to avoid the blow, his ſon, who was born dumb, ſeeing the ſoldier ready to ſtrike, was moved with ſuch fear and tenderneſs for the life of his father, that in that inſtant he cried out, Soldier ſpare the life of Crœſus. Theſe were the firſt words he ever uttered, but from that time he continued to ſpeak readily till his death (7).

country were cut off, the more people there was within the city, the ſooner they would be obliged to ſurrender. That his troops might not be over-fatigued, he divided his army into twelve bodies, and appointed each body its month for guarding the trenches. The beſieged, thinking themſelves out of all danger by reaſon of their high walls and magazines, inſulted Cyrus from the ramparts, and looked upon all the trouble he gave himſelf as ſo much unprofitable labour [t].

Cyrus, having ſpent two entire years before Babylon, without gaining any conſiderable advantage over the city, at laſt reſolved upon the following ſtratagem, which put him in poſſeſſion of the place. He was informed, that a great annual ſolemnity was to be kept in Babylon, and that the Babylonians on that occaſion were accuſtomed to ſpend the whole night in drinking and debauchery. This he thought a proper time to ſurpriſe them in, and accordingly ſent a ſtrong detachment to the head of the canal leading to the great lake, which we have elſewhere deſcribed [u], with orders, at an appointed time, to break down the great bank, which was between the lake and the canal, and to turn the whole current into the lake. At the ſame time, he poſted one body of troops at the place where the river entered into the city, and another where it came out, ordering them to march into the city by the bed of the river, as ſoon as they ſhould find it fordable. Towards the evening he opened the head of the trenches on both ſides of the river above the city, that the water might diſcharge itſelf into them. By this means, and the breaking down of the great dam, the river was ſoon drained. Then the two fore-mentioned bodies of troops according to their orders entered the channel, the one commanded by Gobrias, and the other by Gadates, and finding the gates all left open, by reaſon of the general diſorder of that riotous night, they penetrated into the very heart of the city without any oppoſition, and meeting at the palace, according to their agreement, ſurprized the guards, and cut them in pieces. Thoſe who were within the palace opening the gates to know the cauſe of this confuſion, the Perſians ruſhed in, took the palace and killed the king, who, ſword in hand came out to meet them. The king being killed killed, and thoſe who were about him put to flight, the reſt voluntarily ſubmitted, and Cyrus without any farther reſiſtance became maſter of the place, and concluded his conqueſts after a war of 21 years [w]. The taking of Babylon put an end to the Babylonian empire, and fulfilled the predictions, which the prophets Iſaiah, Jeremiah, and Daniel had uttered againſt that proud metropolis, and of which we have already given a particular account [x]. Babylon taken. Year of the flood 2461. Before Chriſt 538.

THE king of Babylon being killed, Darius the Mede is ſaid in ſcripture to have taken the kingdom [y]. By Darius the Mede is meant Cyaxares, king of the Medes and uncle to Cyrus, as we have fully proved in the hiſtory of Media. For Cyrus, as long as his uncle lived, held the empire with him in partnerſhip; nay, ſo far did he carry his complaiſance, that he let him enjoy the firſt rank. Cyrus having ſetled his affairs at Babylon, returned into Perſia to pay a viſit to his father and mother, who were ſtill alive [y], and after a ſhort ſtay there went back to Babylon together with Cyaxeres. On their arrival they concerted together the ſettling of the whole empire, and having divided it into 120 provinces, the government of theſe was given to ſuch as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves during the war.

THE civil government being thus ſettled, Cyrus ordered all his forces to joyn him at Babylon. On a general review he found, they conſiſted of 120,000 horſe, 2000 chariots armed with ſcythes, and 600,000 foot. Of theſe having diſtributed into gariſons ſuch a number as he judged neceſſary for the defence of the ſeveral parts of the empire, he marched with the remainder into Syria, where he ſetled the affairs of that province, and then reduced the other nations as far as the Red-Sea and the confines of Ethiopia [z]. In this interval of time Daniel was by order of Darius, who remained at Babylon, caſt into the lions den, as we have related in the hiſtory of Media.

ABOUT two years after the reduction of Babylon, Cyaxares dying, and alſo Cambyſes king of Perſia, Cyrus, returned to Babylon and took upon him the whole government of the empire [a], which he held for the ſpace of ſeven years (K). Year of the flood 2463. Before Chriſt 526.

(K) The reign of Cyrus is reckoned, from his firſt coming out of Perſia to the aſſiſtance of his uncle Cyaxares at the head

In the first of these seven years expired the 70 years of the Babylonish captivity, when Cyrus published the famous edict, whereby the Jews were allowed to return to Jerusalem. There is no doubt, but this edict was obtained by Daniel, who was in great credit and authority at court. That he might the more effectually induce the king to grant him that favour, he shewed him the prophecies of Isaiah [b], naming him 120 years before his birth, as one appointed by God to be a great conqueror, and king over many nations, and the restorer of his people, by ordering their temple to be rebuilt, and Jerusalem and Judea to be repossessed by their antient inhabitants.

Cyrus having issued out his decree for the restoring of the Jews to their country, and the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem, the captive Hebrews assembled out of the several provinces of the Babylonian empire, to the number of 4236 persons with their servants, who amounted to 7337 more, and set out for Judea. And thus was the state of Judah and Jerusalem again restored, after they had lain desolate 70 years (L). Cyrus restored at the same of the Persian army, to have lasted thirty years; from the taking of Babylon nine years, and from his being sole monarch of the whole empire, after the death of Cyaxares in Media and Cambyses in Persia, seven years. Tully (8) reckons by the first account, Ptolemy (9) by the second, and Xenophon (10) by the third. The first of these seven years is the first year of Cyrus mentioned by Ezra (11), wherein an end was put to the captivity of Judah, and liberty granted them to return to their country, the seventy years of captivity being then expired.

(L) It may not be improper in this place to insert the famous edict of Cyrus in favour of the Israelites; an edict, for which it may be presumed that God endowed him with so many heroic virtues, and blest him with a constant series of prosperity and victories.

In the first year of Cyrus, king of the Persians, that the word of the Lord might be accomplish'd, that he had promised by the mouth of Jeremy, the Lord raised up the spirit of Cyrus the king of the Persians; and he made proclamation through all his kingdom, and also by writing; saying, Thus saith Cyrus king of the Persians, the Lord of Israel the most high Lord, has made me king of the whole world, and commanded me to build him an house

ſame time to the Jews all the veſſels of the temple, which Nebuchadonoſor had brought from Jeruſalem, and lodged in the temple of his God Baal.

AFTER the return of the Jews, the Samaritans, their declared enemies, did all that lay in their power to prevent the building of the temple; and though they could not alter Cyrus's decree, yet they prevailed by bribes with the miniſters to obſtruct the execution of it; ſo that for ſeveral years the building went on but very ſlowly.

AND it ſeems to have been out of grief to ſee the pious intentions of Cyrus thus diſappointed, that in the third year of that prince Daniel gave himſelf up to mourning and faſting for three years together [c].

BUT to return to Cyrus. This prince, being equally beloved by his own natural ſubjects and thoſe of the conquered nations, peaceably enjoyed the fruits of his labours and victories. His new erected empire was bounded on the eaſt by the river Indus, on the north by the Caſpian and Euxine ſeas, on the weſt by the Ægean, and on the ſouth by Ethiopia and the ſea of Arabia. He kept his reſidence in the heart of theſe countries, ſpending the ſeven cold months at Babylon by reaſon of the warmth of that climate; three months at Suſa in the ſpring, and two months at Ecbatan during the heat of the ſummer [d].

HAVING ſpent ſeven years in this ſtate of tranquillity, and eſtabliſhed his empire with ſuch wiſdom, that upon the ſtrength of this foundation alone it ſtood above 200 years, notwithſtanding the raſh and impolitic proceedings of his ſucceſſors, he died in the 70th year of his age [e], equally regretted by all the nations of his vaſt-ſpreading dominions. He had reigned, from his firſt taking upon him the command of the Perſian and Median armies, thirty thirty years [f]; from the reduction of Babylon nine [g]; and from his being sole monarch of the east, after the death of his uncle Cyaxares, or Darius the Mede, seven years [h]. Authors are strangely at variance with each other as to the manner of his death. Xenophon's account, who makes him die in his bed as fortunately as he lived, amidst his friends and in his own country, seems to us by far the most probable. For all authors agree, that he was buried at Pasargada in Persia, where Xenophon says he died, and his monument was to be seen there in the time of Alexander the Great. Had he been slain in Scythia, as Herodotus and Justin relate, and his body mangled as they would have us believe, how could it ever have been rescued out of the hands of those enraged barbarians, and buried at Pasargada? Besides, it is by no means probable, that such a wise man, as Cyrus is represented to have been, and so far advanced in years, would have engaged in so rash an undertaking, as the Scythian expedition is described to have been by those who relate it. Neither can it be conceived, how after so great an overthrow the Persian empire could have subsisted, especially in the hands of such a successor as Cambyses was. For Herodotus tells, that he was killed, and his whole army, consisting of 200,000 men cut in pieces (M).

On

[f] Cic. ubi supra. [g] Ptol. in Can. [h] Cyropæd. l. viii. p. 232.

(M) Diodorus Siculus (13) tells us, that he was taken prisoner by Tomyris queen of the Massagetes, and by her orders crucified. Ctesias (14) says, that in a battle against the Derbicans, a people bordering upon Hyrcania, he was wounded in the thigh by a certain Indian, of which wound he died three days after. John Melela of Antioch, out of a forged book ascribed to Pythagoras, acquaints us, that he was slain in a sea-fight by the Samians.

Some writers tells us (15), that, after the reduction of Babylon, Cyrus, having a victorious army at his devotion, and Cyaxares being returned from Babylon into Media, revolted from Cyaxares, in conjunction with the Persians under him, who were incited thereunto by Harpagus a Mede, and Artabazus, who had assisted Cyrus in subduing Asia minor, and had been injured by Darius.

(13) Diodor. Sicul. l. ii. (14) Ctesias, l. xi. (15) Suidas in Aristarchos.

On his death-bed he appointed his ſon Cambyſes to ſucceed him, who accordingly took poſſeſſion of that vaſt empire: to his other ſon Smerdis he left ſeveral conſiderable governments. Cambyſes, known in ſcripture by the name of Ahaſuerus [i], was ſcarce well ſettled on the throne when he reſolved upon a war with the Egyptians. The occaſion of this war, as related by Herodotus, ſeems fabulous [k]. Cambyſes.

'Tis moſt likely, that Amaſis, who was then king of Egypt and had ſubmitted to Cyrus, upon the death of that great conqueror, refuſed to pay his ſucceſſor the ſame homage and tribute. But be that as it will, Cambyſes, in order to carry on the war with ſucceſs, made vaſt preparations both by ſea and land. The Cypriots and Phænicians furniſhed him with ſhips; and for his land-forces, he added to his own troops great numbers of auxiliaries, eſpecially of Greeks, Ionians, and Æolians, who were the main ſtrength of his army. But the greateſt help he had in this war was from Phanes of Halicarnaſſus, who, being commander of ſome Greek auxiliaries in the ſervice of Amaſis, took ſome diſguſt, and going over to Cambyſes made ſuch diſcourſes to him of the nature of the country, the ſtrength of the enemy, and the ſtate of affairs in Egypt, as greatly contributed to the ſucceſs of this expedition. 'Twas particularly by his advice, that Cambyſes contracted with an Arabian king, whoſe territories lay between the confines of Paleſtine and Egypt, to furniſh his army with water during his march through deſarts that parted thoſe two countries. The Arabian fulfilled his agreement by ſending many camels loaded with ſkins full of water, without which Cambyſes could never have marched his army that way [l].

Being thus prepared, he invaded Egypt in the fourth year of his reign. On his arrival upon the borders of that kingdom, he was informed, that Amaſis was juſt dead, rius. Harpagus was ſent by Cyaxares with an army againſt Cyrus; but in the heat of the battle revolted with great part of the army to Cyrus. Cyaxares raiſed a new army, and was again defeated near Paſargada in Perſia, and taken priſoner. By this victory, ſay they, the monarchy was tranſlated from the Medes to the Perſians. But this account we have already rejected, as not agreeing ſo well with holy writ, as that which we read in Xenophon.

dead, and that his ſon Pſammenitus, who had ſucceeded him, was drawing together a powerful army to prevent his penetrating into the kingdom. Before Cambyſes could open a paſſage into the country, it was neceſſary for him to take Peluſiam, which was the key of Egypt on that ſide. But as that was a ſtrong place, and in a condition to hold out a long time, Cambyſes had recourſe to the following ſtratagem, probably ſuggeſted to him by Phanes. Being informed, that the whole garriſon conſiſted of Egyptians, he placed in the front of his army a great number of cats, dogs, ſheep, and other annimals, that were looked upon as ſacred by that nation, and then attacked the city. The ſoldiers of the garriſon not daring to throw a dart, or ſhoot an arrow that way, through fear of killing ſome of thoſe animals, Cambyſes poſſeſſed himſelf of the place without oppoſition [m].

Cambyses had ſcarce taken poſſeſſion of this important place, when Pſammenitus at the head of a powerful army advanced to ſtop his further progreſs; whereupon a bloody battle enſued between the two armies. But before they engaged, the Greeks and Carians who ſerved under Pſammenitus, to ſhew their reſentment againſt Phanes, for introducing the Perſians into Egypt, brought his children into the camp, killed them in the ſight of their fathers, and in the preſence of the two armies drank their blood. The Perſians, enraged at ſo cruel a ſight, fell upon the Egyptian army with ſuch fury that they ſoon put them to flight, and cut the greateſt part of them in pieces. Thoſe who ſaved themſelves by flight retired to Memphis (N). Cambyſes purſued them cloſe, and arriving at Memphis,

(N) On occaſion of this battle Herodotus (16) takes notice of an extraordinary circumſtance, whereof he himſelf was an eye-witneſs. The bones of the Perſians and Egyptians were in his time ſtill to be ſeen in the place where the battle was fought, but ſeparated from each other. The ſkulls of the Egyptians, ſays he, were ſo hard, that they could hardly be broken by the violent blow of a large ſtone; whereas thoſe of the Perſians were ſo ſoft and weak, that they were broke with the leaſt blow of a pebble. This difference, as our author tells us, was owing to the Egyptian cuſtom of ſhaving the heads of their children early; by which means the bones were rendred thicker and ſtronger

(16) Herodot. l. iii. c. 12.

Memphis, ſent a herald into the city, on a veſſel of Mitylene, by the river Nile on which Memphis ſtood, to ſummon the inhabitants to a ſurrender. But the people tranſported with rage fell upon the herald, and tore him and all that were with him to pieces. But Cambyſes, after a ſhort ſiege having ſtormed the place, fully revenged their death, cauſing ten Egyptians of the firſt rank to be publicly executed for every one of thoſe they had ſlain, and the eldeſt ſon of Pſammenitus was one of the number. As for the king himſelf who was taken priſoner, Cambyſes was inclined to treat him kindly; for he not only ſpared his life, but appointed him an honourable maintenance: But he, not at all affected with this kind uſage, did all that lay in his power to raiſe new troubles, in hopes of recovering his crown; whereupon he was condemned to drink bull's blood, and thus ended his life after a reign of ſix months, and with him died the antient ſplendor and liberty of Egypt, for all that country immediately ſubmitted to the conqueror [n].

On the news of this ſucceſs, the Lybians, Cyrenians, and Barceans ſent embaſſadors with preſents to Cambyſes, declaring themſelves ready to ſubmit to him, and receive his forces in their ſtrong-holds. From Memphis he marched to the city of Sais, the burying place of the Egyptian kings. Here he cauſed the body of Amaſis to be inhumanly taken out of its tomb, and, after expoſing it to a thouſand indignities, ordered it to be thrown into the fire and burnt. The wrath, which this prince vented upon the dead body of Amaſis, ſhews the irreconcileable hatred he bore him. Whatever was the cauſe of that averſion, he ſeems to have been by it chiefly prompted to invade Egypt [o].

The next year, which was the ſixth of his reign, he reſolved upon three different expeditions, the firſt againſt the ger through the heat of the ſun, and the head preſerved from baldneſs, there being fewer people bald in Egypt, as Herodotus obſerves, than in any other country. As the heads of the Egyptians were ſtrengthened by this method, ſo thoſe of the Perſians were ſoftened by the contrary cuſtom. For they were not expoſed to the ſun, but always covered with caps and turbants. Our author adds, that he obſerved the ſame thing at Papremis in thoſe who, together with Achæmenes the ſon of Darius, were defeated by Inarus king of Lybia.

the Carthaginians, the ſecond againſt the Hammonians, and the third againſt the Ethiopians. But he was forced to drop the firſt project, by reaſon the Phœnicians, without whoſe help he could not carry on that war, refuſed to aſſiſt him againſt the Carthaginians, who were deſcended from them, Carthage being originally a Tyrian colony. But his heart being ſet on the other two expeditions, he ſent embaſſadors into Ethiopia, who under that character were to act as ſpies, and give him intelligence of the ſtate and ſtrength of the country. But the Ethiopians being well apprized of the errand on which they were come, treated them with great contempt. However, the Ethiopian king, in return for the preſents they brought him from Cambyſes, ſent him back his own bow, adviſing him to make war upon the Ethiopians, when the Perſians could as eaſily bend that bow as they could. Before he delivered the bow to the Perſian embaſſadors, he addreſſed them with this ſpeech. "'Tis not from any conſideration of my friendſhip that "the king of Perſia ſent you with theſe preſents; nei-"ther have you ſpoken truth, but are come into my king-"dom as ſpies. If your maſter were an honeſt man, he "would deſire no more than his own, and not attempt to "enſlave a people who had never done him any injury. "However, give him this bow from me, and let him "know, that the king of Ethiopia adviſes the king of "Perſia to make war upon the Ethiopians, when the "Perſians ſhall be able thus eaſily to bend ſo ſtrong a bow, "and in the mean time to thank the gods, that they have "never inſpired the Ethiopians with a deſire of extend-"ing their dominions beyond their own country. [c]"

Cambyses, being informed by his embaſſadors of all that had paſſed, flew into a violent paſſion, and ordered his army immediately to begin their march, without conſider-ing, that they were furniſhed neither with proviſions nor any other neceſſaries for ſuch an expedition. He left the Greek auxiliaries behind him to keep the new conquered countries in awe during his abſence, and with the whole body of his land-forces began his march. When he ar-rived at Thebes in the upper Egypt, he detached 50,000 men againſt the Hammonians, ordering them to ravage the whole country, and burn the oracle of Jupiter Ham-mon, while he with the reſt of his army ſhould march a-gainſt the Ethiopians. But before he had marched a fifth part part of the way, his proviſions were conſumed, and the army reduced to the neceſſity of eating their beaſts of burthen. Cambyſes notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, purſued his raſh attempt, and the ſoldiers fed upon herbs and graſs, ſo long as they found any in their way. But when they arrived in the ſandy deſarts, they were brought to ſuch extremities as to be obliged to devour one another, every tenth man, upon whom the lot fell, being doomed to ſerve as food for his companions, a food, ſays Seneca, more to be dreaded than famine itſelf [d]. The king ſtill perſiſted in his mad deſign, till at laſt being apprehenſive of the danger his own perſon was in, he gave over the enterprize, and retreated to Thebes, after having loſt great part of his army in this wild attempt [e]

As for that part of the army which was ſent againſt the Hammonians, they marched from Thebes, and by the help of their guides arrived at the city of Oaſis, inhabited by Samians, and ſeven days march diſtant from Thebes. Nobody doubts, as our author informs us [f], but they arrived at that place. But what was their fate afterwards is uncertain, for they never returned either to Egypt or their own country. The Hammonians informed Herodotus, that they marched from Oaſis, and that, after they had entered the ſandy deſart which lies beyond that city, a violent wind began to blow from the ſouth, at the time of their dinner, and raiſed the ſands to ſuch a degree, that the whole army was overwhelmed and buried alive.

CAMBYSES on his return to Thebes cauſed all the temples, which in that ſuperſtitious city were very rich and numerous, to be pillaged and burnt down to the ground. We may judge of the richneſs of thoſe temples from the remains ſaved from the flames, which amounted to the ſum of 300 talents of gold, and two thouſand three hundred talents of ſilver. He likewiſe carried away the famous circle of gold that encompaſſed the tomb of king Ozymandias, being 365 cubits in circumference, and on which were repreſented all the motions of the ſeveral conſtellations [g].

FROM Thebes Cambyſes marched back to Memphis, where he diſcharged the Greek mercenaries and ſent them to their reſpective countries. On his entry into the city, finding the citizens all in mirth and jollity becauſe their god Apis had then appeared among them, he was highly provoked provoked, as ſuppoſing that they rejoiced becauſe of his unſucceſsful expedition. He therefore called the magiſtrates to learn of them the cauſe of that public mirth. They gave him a true account of the whole matter; but he, not believing what they ſaid, cauſed them all to be put to death. He ſent afterwards for the prieſts, who made him the ſame anſwer, telling him, that it had been always their cuſtom when their god appeared amongſt them to celebrate his appearance, with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy they could expreſs. To this he replyed, that if their god was ſo kind and familiar as to ſhew himſelf to them, he would be acquainted with him, and therefore commanded the deity to be brought forwith before him.

THE chief god of the Egyptians was Oſiris, at Memphis called Apis. This god they worſhipped in the ſhape of a bull, and always kept in his temple a bull, to which they paid divine honours in his ſtead. He was to be the calf of a cow incapable of bearing another, and impregnated, as the Egyptians believed, by thunder. We have ſpoke elſewhere [i] of the marks which were to diſtinguiſh him from all others. When he died, another with the ſame marks was ſought for and put in his room. When this calf was brought to Cambyſes, who expected to ſee ſome deity, he flew into a violent paſſion, and drawing his dagger wounded the Apis in the thigh, and reproaching the prieſts for their ſtupidity in worſhipping a brute, ordered them ſeverely to be whipt, and all the Egyptians at Memphis, that ſhould be found celebrating the feaſt of Apis, to be ſlain. The Apis after he had languiſhed ſome time died of his wound in the temple, and was buried by the prieſts, who carefully concealed his death from Cambyſes [k].

THE Egyptians ſay, that after this ſacrilegious action, which was looked upon by them as the greateſt inſtance of impiety that ever was committed amongſt them, Cambyſes was immediately ſeized with lunacy and grew mad. But his actions ſhewed that he was ſo long before, of which he gave ſeveral inſtances. We find the following upon record,

HE had a brother by the ſame father and mother, called by Xenophon Tanaoxares, Smerdis by Herodotus, and by Juſtin Mergis. He attended Cambyſes on his Egyptian expedition; but being the only perſon in the army that could bend the bow, which the king of Ethiopia had ſent, within within two fingers breath, Cambyſes from hence conceived ſuch a jealouſy of him, that, being no longer able to bear him in the army, he ſent him back into Perſia. After his departure Cambyſes dreamed, that a meſſenger arriving from Perſia told him, that Smerdis was ſeated on the throne, and touched the heavens with his head. Whereupon, ſuſpecting that his brother aſpired to the crown, he diſpatched Prexaſpes, one of his confidents, into Perſia, with orders to put him to death, which he accordingly executed [1].

THIS murder was followed by another ſtill more criminal. Cambyſes had with him in the camp his youngeſt ſiſter, by name Meroe. As this princes was very beautiful, he fell violently in love with her, and was deſirous to marry her. But being convinced of the novelty of his deſign, he ſummoned all the royal judges of the Perſian nation, whoſe office it was to interpret the laws, to know whether there was any law allowing a brother to marry his ſiſter. The judges, being unwilling to authorize ſuch an inceſtuous marriage, and at the ſame time dreading the effects of the king's violent temper ſhould they contradict him, returned this crafty anſwer. That they truly knew of no law allowing a man to marry his own ſiſter, but they had a law which gave the king of Perſia liberty to do whatever he pleaſed. Upon this anſwer he ſolemnly married her, and thereby gave the firſt example of that inceſt, which was afterwards practiſed by moſt of his ſucceſſors, and by ſome of them carried ſo far as to marry their own daughters. This ſiſter he took with him in all his expeditions, and gave her name to an iſland in the Nile between Egypt and Ethiopia, which he conquered on his wild expedition againſt the Ethiopians. The occaſion and manner of her death is reported in the following manner. As Cambyſes was one day diverting himſelf in ſeeing a young dog and the whelp of a lion fighting, the dog being over-matched, another of the ſame litter breaking looſe came to his aſſiſtance, by which means the lion was maſtered. Whilſt the king was mightily pleaſed with this adventure, Meroe, who ſat by him, began to weep, and being obliged to tell her husband the cauſe of her grief, ſhe confeſſed that this accident put her in mind of the fate of her brother Smerdis, whom nobody had been ſo good-natured enough to aſſiſt. There needed needed no more than this to excite the rage of that brutal prince, who, notwithſtanding her being with child, gave her ſuch a blow with his foot on the belly, that ſhe miſcarried, and ſoon after died [m] (N).

He cauſed alſo ſeveral of the chief lords of his court to be buried alive, and daily ſacrificed ſome of them to his wild fury. He one day aſked Prexaſpes, who was his chief favourite, what the Perſians ſaid of him, and what character they gave him in their private converſations. Prexaſpes anſwered, that they highly applauded his actions in general, but thought him too much addicted to wine. I underſtand you, replied the king, they pretend that wine deprives me of my underſtanding, but whether this charge be true or not you ſhall be judge. Upon which he began to drink to a far greater exceſs than he had ever done before. Then ordering the ſon of Prexaſpes, who was his cup-bearer, to ſtand upright at the farther end of the room with his left hand upon his head; and turning to Prexaſpes, if I ſhoot, ſaid he, this arrow through the heart of thy ſon, the Perſians you muſt own have ſlandred me, but if I miſs, I ſhall willingly allow them to have ſpoke the truth. He had no ſooner uttered theſe words, than drawing his bow he ſhot the arrow through the body of the young man. Then commanding him to be opened, and finding the arrow had pierced his heart, he aſked the father with great joy, and in an inſulting manner, whether he had ever ſeen a man ſhoot with a more ſteady hand, and whether or no the Perſians had injured his character, by ſaying that wine deprived him of his reaſon? The unfortunate father, being under great apprehenſions for his own life, life, anſwered, that a god could not have ſhot more dexterouſly [n] (O).

(N) The Egyptians, as our author informs us (17) relate the matter in a different way. They ſay, that as Cambyſes and his ſiſter were at table, ſhe took a lettuce, and pulling the leaves aſunder, aſked her huſband, whether an intire lettuce was not more beautiful than one pulled in pieces. He anſwered, it was; whereupon Meroe reply'd, that he had repreſented the broken lettuce by diſmembering the houſe of Cyrus. Upon theſe words Cambyſes ſtruck her with his foot, which, as ſhe was big with child, occaſioned her death.

WHILE he was proceeding in this furious manner, Crœſus king of Lydia thought fit to lay before him the bad conſequences that might attend ſo tyrannical a government, which provoked him to ſuch a degree, that he ordered him to be put to death. But the officers, who received his orders, ſuſpended the execution of the ſentence and concealed Crœſus, thinking, that, if Cambyſes ſhould enquire for him and repent of his raſh reſolution, they ſhould be well rewarded for ſaving his life; but if they found, that Cambyſes neither altered his mind, nor deſired to ſee him, they might ſtill put him to death purſuant to their orders. The very next day he asked for Crœſus, which the officers hearing acquainted him, that the king of Lydia was ſtill alive. Cambyſes was tranſported with joy when he heard that his orders had not been put in execution, but at the ſame time commanded all thoſe who had ſaved him to be immediately put to death, becauſe they had not obeyed his orders [o].

CAMBYSES in the beginning of the 8th year of his reign left Egypt in order to return to Perſia. On his coming into Syria he met an herald ſent from Suſa to the army, to acquaint them, that Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus was proclaimed king, and command them all to acknowledge and obey him. This event was brought about in the following manner. Cambyſes, at his departure from Suſa on the Egyptian expedition, had left the adminiſtration of affairs during his abſence in the hands of Patizithes one of the chief of the Mages. This Patizithes had a brother who very much reſembled Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus, and was, perhaps on that account, called by the ſame name. As ſoon as he was fully aſſured of the death of that prince, which had been carefully concealed from moſt others, and at the ſame time informed, that Cambyſes indulged his tyrannical temper to ſuch a degree that he was grown inſupportable, portable, he placed his own brother on the throne, giving out that he was the true Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus, and immediately diſpatched heralds into all the parts of the empire to give notice of Smerdis's acceſſion to the crown, and require all the provinces to pay him their obedience. The herald who was diſpatched to Egypt, finding Cambyſes with his army at Ecbatan in Syria, placed himſelf in the midſt of the army, and openly proclaimed the orders of Patizithes. Cambyſes cauſed him to be ſeized, and having ſtrictly examined him in the preſence of Prexaſpes who had received the orders to kill his brother, he found that the true Smerdis was certainly dead, and that he who had uſurped the throne, was Smerdis the Mage. The mention of that name greatly affected Cambyſes, and revived in his memory the dream, in which he had ſeen a meſſenger who came to acquaint him, that Smerdis was ſeated on the throne. Reflecting how unjuſtly he had murdered his brother, he burſt out in a flood of tears, and immediately ordered his army to march, with a deſign to ſuppreſs the growing rebellion. But as he was mounting his horſe, his ſword ſlipt out of the ſcabbard, and wounded him in the thigh. But thus wounded he asked the name of the city, and being informed that the place was called Ecbatan, he ſaid in the preſence of all, fate has decreed that Cambyſes the ſon of Cyrus ſhall die in this place. For while he was in Egypt, having conſulted the oracle of Butus, which was very famous in that country, he was told, that he ſhould die in Ecbatan; which he underſtanding of Ecbatan in Media reſolved to ſave his life by avoiding that place; but what he thought to avoid in Media he found in Syria. And therefore being informed that the place, where he received the wound, was called Ecbatan, taking it for certain that he muſt die there, he aſſembled the chief Perſian lords that ſerved in the army, and having repreſented to them the true ſtate of the caſe, he earneſtly exhorted them never to ſubmit to the impoſtor, or ſuffer the ſovereignty to paſs again from the Perſians to the Medes, of which nation Smerdis the Mege was, but to uſe their utmuſt endeavours to place on the throne one of their own blood. But the Perſians, ſuſpecting all this was ſaid by him out of hatred to his brother, had no regard to it, and Cambyſes, dying a few days after of his wound which mortified, they quietly ſubmitted to the Perſon whom they found on the throne, ſuppoſing him to be the true Smerdis. To this deluſion

Prexaſpes

Prexaspes greatly contributed, by saying, that he had not killed Smerdis the son of Cyrus with his own hand [p].

Cambyses reigned seven years and five months. When he came first to the crown, the Samaritans begged of him that he would put a stop to the building of the temple at Jerusalem. And their application was not in vain, for though he had so much respect for the memory of his father, as not openly to revoke his decree, yet in a great measure he frustrated the design of it, by laying the Jews under such difficulties that they could not pursue the work [q].

This prince is called in scripture [r] Artaxerxes, by Herodotus Smerdis, by Æschylus Mardys, by Ctesias Spendates, and by Justin Oropastes. As soon as he had taken upon him the sovereignty, he granted to all his subjects an exemption from taxes and all military service for three years, and treated them with such benificence, that all the nations of Asia, the Persians only excepted, expressed great sorrow on the revolution that happened a few months after. And further to secure himself on the throne, he married Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, thinking that in case of a discovery he might hold the empire by her title. She had been before married to her brother Cambyses, who, upon the above-mentioned decision of the royal judges, having married one of his sisters, took to wife also the other. And the Mage pretending to be her brother married her upon the same footing. But the precautions, he made use of to prevent his being discovered, only encreased the suspicion that he was not the true Smerdis. He had married all his predecessors wives, and among the rest Phedyma the daughter of Otanes, a Persian nobleman of the first rank. Otanes to be fully satisfied in this matter sent a trusty messenger to his daughter, to know of her, whether the king was really Smerdis the son of Cyrus, or some other man. Phedyma returned answer, that, as she had never seen Smerdis the son of Cyrus, she could not satisfy his curiosity. Otanes by a second message desired her to enquire of Atossa, who could not but know her own brother, whether this were he or not. But his daughter let him know, that she was not allowed to speak with Atossa, or see any other of the women, because the king, whoever he was, had from the very beginning of his reign lodged his wives in distinct and separate apartments. This answer greatly increased increased the suspicion of Otanes, who thereupon sent a third message to his daughter, directing her, when she should be next invited to his bed, to take the opportunity, while he was asleep, of feeling whether he had ears or no; for Cyrus having formerly caused the ears of Smerdis the Mage to be cut off for a crime he had been guilty of, he told her, that, if the king had ears, she might be sure that he was Smerdis the son of Cyrus, but if otherwise, he could be no other than Smerdis the Mage, and therefore unworthy of possessing the crown or her person. Phedyma answered, that the danger was very great, because if the king had no ears and should surprize her endeavouring to find out such a truth, he would not fail putting her to death: nevertheless, in obedience to the commands of her father, she would make the attempt, and take upon her to satisfy his doubt. And accordingly the first time she went to the king, as soon as she perceived him fast asleep, she took the opportunity of making the trial, and finding he had no ears, early next morning acquainted her father therewith, whereby the imposture was discovered. Otanes upon this information imparted the whole affair to Gobryas and Aspathines, Persians of great distinction, and whose honour he could rely on. These three agreed among themselves, that each of them should name one of his most trusty friends to be admitted into the secret. Pursuant to this resolution, Otanes named Intaphernes, Gobryas Megabyzus, and Aspathines Hydarnes. In the mean time, Darius, the son of Hystaspes, arriving at Susa from Persia where his father was governor, they all agreed to make him privy to all their resolutions, which they did accordingly. Darius at their first meeting told them, that he thought no man in Persia but himself had known that Smerdis the son of Cyrus was really dead, and the crown usurped by a Mage, and therefore he was come with a design to kill the usurper, without imparting this design to any one, that the glory of such an action might be entirely his own. But since others were apprised of the imposture, he was of opinion, that the usurper should be dispatched with all expedition, delays being in such cases very dangerous, and the best-concerted designs easily disappointed. Otanes on the other hand was for putting off the execution of their design till some better opportunity offered, and not attempting the enterprise till they had increased their number. But Darius remonstrating the danger there was of being discovered and betrayed, if they let the present opportunity slip, ſlip, or imparted their deſign to others, and openly proteſting, that if they did not make the attempt that very day, he would prevent any one from accuſing him by diſcloſing the whole matter to the Mage, it was unanimouſly agreed, that they ſhould not ſeparate, under any pretence whatſoever, but immediately, upon the breaking up of their meeting, go to the palace, and either put the uſurper to death, or die in the attempt[r].

WHILE they were concerting their meaſures, the two Mages in order to remove all ſuſpicion engaged Prexaſpes in their intereſt, and with great promiſes prevailed upon him to give his word, and oblige himſelf by oath, never to diſcover the fraud they had put upon the Perſians. Prexaſpes, as we have related above, knew, that Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus was not living, having by the command of Cambyſes put him to death with his own hand. The Mages having engaged Prexaſpes to be ſilent, acquainted him farther, that having determined to aſſemble all the Perſians under the walls of the palace, they deſired he would aſcend a certain tower, and from thence publicly declare, that the king upon the throne was truly Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus. Prexaſpes having taken upon him this office, the Mages ſummoned the Perſians together, and commanded him to mount the tower, and from thence harangue the people. Prexaſpes began his diſcourſe with the genealogy of Cyrus, and then put the Perſians in mind of the great favours the nation had received from that prince. After having extolled Cyrus and his family, to the great aſtoniſhment of all, he ſincerely declared all that had paſſed, and told the people, that the apprehenſions of the danger he muſt inevitably run by publiſhing the impoſture had conſtrained him to conceal it ſo long; but now, not being able to act any longer ſuch a diſhonourable part, he acknowledged, that he had been compelled by Cambyſes to put his brother to death with his own hand, and that the perſon who poſſeſſed the throne was Smerdis the Mage. He then begged pardon of the gods and men for the crime he had committed by compulſion and againſt his will, and fulminating many imprecations againſt the Perſians, if they ſhould neglect to recover the ſovereignty and puniſh the uſurper, he threw himſelf headlong from the top of the tower, and died on the ſpot. 'Tis eaſy to

In the mean time, the conspirators, not knowing what had happened, were going to the palace determined to execute their design. On their way they were informed of what Prexaspes had said and done, which obliging them to retire and confer together, Otanes earnestly desired them anew to defer the enterprize. But Darius still insisting upon the immediate execution, and rejecting all proposals of delay (P), they fell in with his opinion and went directly to the palace. The guards respecting their dignity, and not suspecting persons of their rank and figure, permitted them to pass without asking them any questions. But as they came near the king's apartment, the eunuchs, who attended there to receive messages, refused them admittance, and threatened the guards for permitting them to pass. Upon this the seven Persians, encouraging each other, drew their swords, killed all that opposed their passage, and penetrated to the very room where the two Mages were consulting about the late affair of Prexaspes. They no sooner heard this tumult and uproar, but the one takeing up a bow and the other a javelin, the weapons that came first to hand in that confusion, they engaged the conspirators. He, who had the bow, soon found that weapon of no use in so close an action; but the other with his javelin wounded Aspathines in the thigh, and struck out the eye of Intaphernes. One of the brothers being killed, the other retired into a room, adjoining to the place where they fought, with a design to shut himself in; but was so closely pursued by Darius and Gobryas that they broke into the room with him. Gobryas having seized him held him fast in his arms, but, as it was quite dark in that place, Darius stood still, not knowing how to direct his blow, and fearing to strike lest he should kill his friend instead of the enemy; which Gobryas perceiving desired deſired him to ſtrike, though he ſhould kill them both. Upon this Darius reſolved to put all to the venture, and by good fortune killed the uſurper. Having thus diſpatched the two brothers; they cut off their heads, and leaving their two wounded companions to ſecure the palace, the other five, carrying the heads of the two Mages, with their hands all ſmeared with blood, marched out of the palace, expoſed the heads to the eyes of the people, and declared the whole impoſture. The Perſians being informed of what paſſed, were ſo enraged againſt the impoſtors, that they fell upon the whole ſect, and killed every Mage they met; and if night coming on had not put an end to the ſlaughter, not one of that order had been left alive. The day on which this happened was ever afterwards celebrated by the Perſians with the greateſt ſolemnity, called by the name of Magophonia, or the ſlaughter of the Mages. On that feſtival the Mages durſt not for many years after appear abroad, but were obliged to ſhut themſelves up in their houſes [t].

SMERDIS reigned only eight months, during which time a ſtop was put to the rebuilding of the temple at Jeruſalem. For aſſoon as he was ſeated on the throne, the Samaritans acquainted him, that the Jews were rebuilding their city and temple, that they had always been a rebellious and ſtubborn people, and that if he allowed them to finiſh that work they would without doubt withdraw their obedience from the king, whereby he would loſe all the provinces on that ſide of the Euphrates. For the truth of what they ſaid concerning the ungovernable temper of the Jews, they referred him to the records of his predeceſſors, which they deſired him to enquire into touching this matter. And accordingly Smerdis, upon theſe remonſtrances having cauſed the records to be carefully examined, and finding with what difficulty the Jews had been reduced by Nebuchadnezzar, iſſued an edict, forbidding them to proceed any farther in the work, they had begun, and charged the Samaritans to ſee it put in execution. Hereupon the work was laid aſide till the ſecond year of Darius Hyſtaſpis, that is for the ſpace of near two years [u] (Q).

But to return to the conſpirators; when the tumult and diſorders, which attend ſuch events, were appeaſed, they met to conſult among themſelves what form of government they ſhould introduce. Otanes was for a republic, Megabyzus ſpoke for an oligarchy, and Darius declared for monarchy. The opinion of the latter was, after a long debate, embraced by all except Otanes, who, finding his ſentiments over-ruled, told them, that ſince they were reſolved to ſet up a king he would not be their competitor for a dignity which he abhorred, and that being determined not to govern as a king he would not be governed by one, and therefore was willing to give up his right to the crown, on condition that neither he nor his poſterity ſhould be ſubject to the royal power. The other ſix granted him his demand; whereupon he immediately retired, and his deſcendants alone retained their liberty, which they enjoyed even in our author's days, being then no farther ſubject to the king than it ſuited their conveniency, and only obliged to conform to the cuſtoms and manners of the country [w].

Upon his departure the other ſix began to deliberate in what manner they ſhould proceed to the election of a new king. But in the firſt place they unanimouſly agreed, that whoſoever of them ſhould be choſen, he ſhould every year preſent Otanes and his poſterity with a Median veſt, a mark of great diſtinction among the Perſians, becauſe he had been the chief author of the enterprize. In the next place they determined, that the ſeven ſhould have full liberty to enter into all the apartments of the palace without being introduced; and that the king ſhould not be allowed to marry a woman out of any other family than of the ſeven conſpirators. Then taking the future election into conſideration, they thought fit to refer it to the Gods; and accordingly they all agreed to meet the next morning by the riſing of the ſun on horſe-back, at an appointed place in the ſuburbs of the city, and that he, whoſe horſe firſt neighed, ſhould be king; for the ſun being the chief deity ed between Cyrus and Darius, by whoſe decree the temple was finiſhed. But none reigning between Cyrus and Darius except Cambyſes and Smerdis, we muſt conclude, that none but Cambyſes and Smerdis could be the Ahaſuerus and Artaxerxes, who are ſaid in Ezra (20) to have put a ſtop to this work.

deity of the Perſians, they imagined by this method to refer the election to him. Oebares, who had the charge of Darius's horſes, hearing of this agreement, led a mare over-night to the place appointed, and brought to her his maſter's horſe. The next morning the ſix Perſians repairing to the place purſuant to their agreement, Darius's horſe remembering the mare immediately neighed, and his competitors diſmounting adored him as king [x].

THE Perſian empire being thus reſtored by the valour of theſe ſeven lords, they were raiſed by the new king to the higheſt dignities, and honoured with moſt ample privileges; in all public affairs they were the firſt to deliver their opinions; and ever afterwards the Perſian kings of this race had ſeven chief counſellors privileged in the ſame manner, and by whoſe advice all the public affairs of the kingdom were tranſacted. Under this character we find them often mentioned in ſcripture [y].

DARIUS was the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, a noble Perſian of the royal family of Achæmenes, who had attended Cyrus in all his wars, and was at that time governor of the province of Perſia. Darius is called in the writings of the modern Perſians Guſhtaſp, and his father Lohraſp, and are famous among the Perſians to this day. Darius, the better to eſtabliſh himſef on the throne, married the two Daughters of Cyrus, Atoſſa and Artyſtona. The former had been wife to her brother Cambyſes, and alſo to the Mage, but Artyſtona had not been married before, and proved the moſt favoured and beloved of all his wives; for to theſe he added Parmys the daughter of the true Smerdis, and Phedyma the daughter of Otanes, who detected the Mage. Having thus confirmed his power, he divided the whole empire into twenty ſatrapies or governments, and appointed a governor over each diviſion, ordering them to pay an annual tribute. Perſia alone was excepted from all manner of taxes; the Ethiopians and inhabitants of Colchis were enjoined to make only ſome preſents, and the Arabians to furniſh yearly ſuch a quantity of frankincenſe as was equal in weight to a thouſand talents. By this eſtabliſhment Darius received the yearly tribute of 14560 Euboic talents, beſides ſeveral other ſums of ſmall conſequence.

Darius. Year after the flood, 2477. Before Chriſt 522.

DARIUS in the very beginning of his reign put to death Intaphernes, one of the ſeven conſpirators, on the following

ing occaſion. Intaphernes went to the palace to confer with Darius; but attempting to enter, purſuant to the agreement above-mentioned, in virtue of which they were to have free acceſs to the king at all hours, except when he was alone with ſome of his wives, he was ſtopt by the door-keeper and a meſſenger, under colour that the king was in company with one of his wives. Intaphernes not believing them drew his ſcymetar, and having cut off both their noſes and ears, faſtened their heads in a bridle, and ſo left them. In this condition they went in, and ſhewing themſelves to the king, acquainted him with the cauſe of the ill uſage they had received. Darius apprehending that this attempt might have been concerted by the ſix, ſent for them, one after another, and aſked whether they approved the action. But finding that Intaphernes alone was guilty, he cauſed him to be ſeized with his children and family, leſt his relations, whom he ſuſpected, ſhould raiſe a rebellion. While they were under confinement, the wife of Intaphernes made ſuch loud complaints and lamentations at the gates of the palace, that Darius touched with compaſſion granted her the life of any one among her relations, leaving her the choice of the perſon. She after ſome deliberation choſe her brother. Which Darius hearing, aſked her, why ſhe had ſo little regard for her huſband and children, as to ſave the life of her brother rather than theirs. The woman readily anſwered, that ſhe could get another huſband, and have by him other children, if ſhe ſhould be deprived of thoſe ſhe had; but could never have another brother, her father and mother being already dead. The king was ſo well pleaſed with this anſwer, that he not only pardoned her brother, but ſaved alſo her eldeſt ſon. The others were all put to death with Intapherenes, without any regard to his late deſerts [z].

In the beginning of the ſecond year of Darius, the Jews reſumed the work of the temple, being exhorted thereto by the prophet Haggai [a]. Which the Samaritans underſtanding applied themſelves to Tatnai, whom Darius had appointed governor of Syria and Paleſtine, acquainting him, that the Jews were not authorized to purſue that work, which if perfected would encourage them to ſhake off the Perſian yoke. Upon theſe remonſtrances Tatnai accompanied by Setharboznai, who ſeems to have been governor of Samaria, went up to Jeruſalem, and after viewing ing the work enquired of the elders by what authority they had reſumed it. The elders produced the decree of Cyrus; whereupon the governor, who was a man of great juſtice and probity, wrote to the king, fairly ſtating the caſe, and deſiring that ſearch might be made into the archives for the decree of Cyrus, which the Jews produced to juſtify themſelves in what they were doing. The king, upon the receipt of this letter, ordered the archives of Babylon and Ecbatan to be carefully examined, and the decree being found in thoſe of the latter, for Cyrus was at Ecbatan in Media when he granted it, the king commanded it to be ſtrictly obſerved in every particular, and having ſent it to Tatnai and Setharboznai enjoined them to ſee it fully and effectually put in execution, decreeing, that whoſoever ſhould attempt to alter the edict, or prevent its being put in execution, ſhould have his houſe pulled down, and a gibbet being made of the timber of it, he ſhould be hanged thereon. On the publication of this decree at Jeruſalem, the work of the temple went on very ſucceſsfully, and the ſtate of the Jews in Judæa and Jeruſalem was entirely reſtored [b] (R).

ABOUT the beginning of the fifth Year of Darius, the Babylonians, not being able to live any longer in ſubjection to the Perſians, who not only loaded them with heavy taxes but had removed the imperial ſeat from Babylon, formerly the miſtreſs of the eaſt, to Suſa, and thereby greatly diminiſhed the ſplendor of that city, attempted to retrieve their antient grandeur, by ſetting up for themſelves againſt the Perſians, as they had done in former times againſt the Aſſyrians. With this view, taking advantage of the troubles that had happended, firſt on the death of Cambyſes, and afterwards on the murder of the uſurper Smerdis, they had privately ſtored their city with all manner of proviſions for many years, and at laſt broke out into an open rebellion, which drew Darius with all his forces to beſiege the city. The Babylonians, ſeeing themſelves ſhut up by ſo numerous and powerful an army, turned all their thoughts

(R) From the 19th year of Nebuchadnezzar, according to the Jewiſh account (which was the 17th according to the Babylonian computation) when Jeruſalem was deſtroyed, to the 4th year of Darius Hyſtaſpis, when the Jews were thoroughly reſtored, juſt ſeventy years paſſed according to the canon. to the supporting of a long siege, which they imagined would tire out the enemy's troops. To prevent the consumption of their provisions they took the most desperate and barbarous resolution, that ever was put in execution by any nation. They agreed among themselves to get rid of all unnecessary mouths, and therefore drawing together all the women, old men, and children, they strangled them without distinction, whether wives, fathers, mothers, or sisters, every one being allowed to save only the wife he liked best, and a maid-servant to do the work of the house[c].

Darius, having lain before Babylon a year and eight months, and being no less tired than his army with so tedious a siege, endeavoured by various stratagems and artifices to take the place, among others he made use of that which had succeeded so well with Cyrus. But all his efforts were rendered ineffectual by the unwearied vigilance of the Babylonians. When he was ready to break up the siege and return to Persia, Zopyrus, one of his chief commanders, put him in possession of the town by the following contrivance. He cut off his nose and ears, and, having mangled his body in a most cruel manner with stripes, fled to the Babylonians thus disfigured, feigning to have been so treated by Darius for advising him to raise the siege. The Babylonians, seeing a man of that distinction so barbarously used, believed all he said against Darius, and, assuring themselves of his fidelity, gave him the command of some forces. With these he sallied out, and having surrounded ten thousand Persians, which Darius by agreement had posted near the walls, he cut them all in pieces on the spot. A few days after in another sally he killed two thousand more; which so pleased the Babylonians, that he was appointed commander in chief of all their forces. Being vested with this command, he made a third sally, and put four thousand more Persians to the sword. Upon this success Zopyrus acquired such credit, that the guard of the city was entirely committed to his care. Not long after Darius, pursuant to the agreement they had made, advanced with the whole body of his army, and surrounded the city. The Babylonians mounting the walls made a vigorous defence; but in the mean time Zopyrus, opening the gates of Belus and Cissia, introduced the Persians, and delivered the city up to Darius, who without this stratagem could never have mastered it. Thus Babylon was taken.

taken a ſecond time, and Darius, being put in poſſeſſion of it, beat down the walls from 200 cubits high to 50; and of theſe walls only Strabo [d] is to be underſtood to ſpeak, where he tells us, that the walls of Babylon were only fifty cubits high. As for the inhabitants, after having impaled about three thouſand of the moſt guilty and active in the revolt, he pardoned the reſt. And becauſe the Babylonians had deſtroyed their women, he took care to furniſh them with wives, enjoining the neighbouring provinces to ſend 50000 women to Babylon, without which ſupply the place muſt ſoon have become depopulated. As for Zopyrus, he was deſervedly rewarded by Darius with the higheſt honours he could heap upon him during the whole courſe of his life. That prince frequently uſed to ſay, that he would willingly loſe twenty Babylons, rather than ſee Zopyrus ſo disfigured. Beſides many other ample rewards, he beſtowed upon him the revenues of Babylon for life, free from all charges and taxes, and could never after behold him without ſhedding many tears [e].

The Scythian expedition.

AFTER the reduction of Babylon, Darius undertook an expedition againſt the Scythians, inhabiting thoſe countries which lie between the Danube and the Tanais. His pretence for this war was, to revenge the calamities which they had brought upon Aſia, when they invaded that country about 120 years before, and held it in ſubjection for the ſpace of 28 years, as we have related in the hiſtory of Media. This he gave out as the motive inducing him to a war, to which his ambition alone and deſire of extending his conqueſts prompted him. Having made vaſt preparations for this expedition, and levied an army of 700,000 men, he marched to the Thracian Boſphorus, and having there paſſed over on a bridge of boats, he reduced all Thrace; from Thrace he advanced to the Iſter or Danube, where he had appointed his fleet to join him. Here he marched his army over another bridge of boats, and entered Scythia. The Scythians, after having conferred together about the meaſures they ſhould take to oppoſe ſo powerful an enemy, determined not to venture an engagement in the open field, but to withdraw themſelves from the frontiers in proportion as the Perſians advanced, laying waſte the country and filling up the wells and ſprings. Purſuant to this reſolution they met Darius on the frontiers, and finding him diſpoſed to give them battle, they retired, drawing him from country to country, till his army was quite tired with ſuch tedious and fatiguing marches. At laſt he began to be ſenſible of the danger he was in of periſhing with all his forces, and having reſolved to give over that raſh enterprize and retire home, he lighted in the night a great number of fires, and leaving the old men and ſick behind him in the camp, he marched off with all poſſible expedition in order to reach the Danube. The Scythians, perceiving the next morning that the enemy was decamped, detached a conſiderable body to the Danube, who, as they were well acquainted with the roads, arrived at the river before Darius. The Scythians had ſent expreſſes before-hand to perſuade the Ionians, whom Darius had left to guard the bridge, to break it down, and retire to their own country. Now they preſſed them to it more earneſtly, repreſenting to them, that, as the time preſcribed by Darius was expired, they were at liberty to return home, without breaking their word, or being wanting to their duty; for Darius had given them leave to break down the bridge, and withdraw to their own country, if he did not return at a prefixed time, which was already elapſed. Hereupon the Ionians began to conſult among themſelves, whether or no they ſhould comply with the requeſt of the Scythians. Miltiades, prince of the Cherſoneſus of Thrace, having the public intereſt more at heart than his own private advantage, was for embracing ſo favourable an opportunity of ſhaking off the Perſian yoke, breaking down the bridge, and thereby cutting off Darius's retreat. All the other commanders fell in with him, except Hiſtiæus prince of Miletus, who repreſented to the Ionian chiefs, that their power was linked with that of Darius, ſince it was under his protection that each of them was lord in his own city, and that the cities of Ionia would not fail to depoſe them and recover their liberty, if the Perſian power ſhould ſink or decline. This ſpeech made a deep impreſſion upon the Ionian generals, and private, intereſt prevailing over the public good, they determined to wait for Darius, but, in order to deceive the Scythians and prevent them from uſing any violence, they declared, that their deſign was to retire purſuant to their requeſt; and the better to impoſe upon the enemy, they began to break down the bridge, encouraging the Scythians to return back, meet Darius, and defeat him. They readily complied with the Ionians requeſt, but miſſed Darius who arrived ſafe at the bridge, repaſſed the Danube, and returned into Thrace.

Thrace. Here he left Megabyſus, one of his chief generals, with part of his army to complete the conqueſt of that country. With the reſt of his troops he repaſſed the Boſphorus, and took up his quarters at Sardis, where he ſpent the winter and the greateſt part of the year following to refreſh his army, which had ſuffered extremely in that raſh and unſucceſsful expedition [f].

MEGABYZUS having brought all Thrace under ſubjection, diſpatched ſeven Perſian noblemen, that ſerved under him, to Amyntas king of Macedon, enjoyning him to acknowledge Darius for his maſter by the delivery of earth and water. Amyntas not only complied with their requeſt, but received them into his houſe, and, having prepared a ſumptuous feaſt, entertained them with great magnificence. At the end of the entertainment, the Perſians, being heated with wine, deſired Amyntas to bring in his concubines, wives, and daughters. Though this was contrary to the cuſtom of the country, the king, fearing to diſpleaſe them, did as they required. But the Perſians not obſerving a due decency on that occaſion, the king's ſon, by name Alexander, being no longer able to ſee his mother and ſiſters treated in ſuch a manner, contrived to ſend them out of the room as if they were to return immediately, and at the ſame time had the precaution to get his father out of the company. In the mean time, he cauſed a like number of young men to be dreſſed like women, and armed with poniards under their garments. Theſe he brought into the room inſtead of the others, and when the Perſians began to uſe them as they had treated the women, they drew their poniards, fell upon the Perſians, and killed both the noblemen and their attendants. Great ſearch was made by Megabyzus for theſe noblemen, but Alexander having with large preſents bribed Bubares, who was ſent to enquire after them, their death was concealed, and the whole matter ſtifled [g].

THE Scythians, to be revenged on Darius for invading their country, having paſſed the Danube laid waſte all that part of Thrace which had ſubmitted to the Perſians, as far as the Helleſpont, and loaded with booty returned home without meeting with any oppoſition.

DARIUS, having ſufficiently refreſhed his troops after the Scythian expedition, began to think of extending his do- Conquers India.

minions eaſtwards, and in order to facilitate his deſign reſolved in the firſt place to make a diſcovery of thoſe countries. With this view he cauſed a fleet to be built and equipped at Caſpatyrus, a city on the river Indus. The command of this fleet he gave to Scylax, a Grecian of Caryandia a city of Caria, who was well verſed in maritime affairs. His orders were to ſail down the current, and make the beſt diſcoveries he could of the countries lying on either ſide of the river, till he arrived at the ſouthern ocean; from thence he was to ſteer his courſe weſtward, and that way return back to Perſia. Scylax, having exactly obſerved his inſtructions, and ſailed down the river Indus, entered the Red-Sea by the ſtraits of Babelmandel, and on the 30th month from his firſt ſetting out landed in Egypt, at the ſame place, from whence Necho king of Egypt formerly ſent out the Phænicians, who were in his ſervice, to ſail round the coaſt of African. From hence Scylax returned to Suſa, where he gave Darius a full account of his obſervations. Darius hereupon entered India at the head of a numerous army, and reducing that large country, made it the 20th province of the Perſian empire. Our author gives us no account of this important war; he only ſays, that Darius received from the provinces he conquered in this expedition an annual tribute of 360 talents of gold, according to the number of the days of the Perſian year at that time [h] (S).

The revolt of the Ionians.

DARIUS, after his return to Suſa from the Scythian expedition, had appointed his brother Artaphernes governor of Sardis, and given Otanes the government of Thrace and the adjacent countries along the ſea-coaſt, in the room of Megabyzus. In the mean time, a ſedition happening in Naxus, the chief Iſland of the Cyclades in the Ægean ſea, now called the Archipelago, the principal inhabitants, being over-powered by the populace, were baniſhed the iſland. In their diſtreſs they had recourſe to Ariſtagoras, beſeeching him to reſtore them to their country. Ariſtagoras at that time reſided at Miletus, and governed that city as deputy puty to Histiæus (T), to whom he was both nephew and son-in-law. When Aristagoras understood their case he resolved to improve the opportunity, and attempt to make himself master of Naxus. With this view he promised to give the exiles all the assistance he could. But not being powerful enough to accomplish his design himself, he communicated the matter to Artaphernes the king's brother, governor of Sardis, representing to him, that this was a fair opportunity of reducing Naxus; that if he were once master of that island, all the rest of the Cyclades might be easily

(T) Darius, on his return to Sardis after his unhappy expedition against the Scythians, being informed, that he owed his own safety and that of his whole army to Histiæus, who had prevailed upon the Ionians not to destroy the bridge on the Danube, sent for that prince, and desired him freely to ask what favour he pleased for the eminent service he had done him. Histiæus desired the king to grant him the Edonian Myrcinus, a territory upon the river Strymon in Thrace, with the liberty of building a city there. His request being granted, he returned to Miletus, and having there equipped a fleet he sailed for Thrace, took possession of the territory granted him, and began the intended city. Megabyzus, who was then governor of Thrace for Darius, being apprized how prejudicial that project might prove to the king's affairs, on his return to Sardis represented to Darius, that this new city stood upon a navigable river; that the country round about it afforded abundance of timber for the building of ships; that it was inhabited by several nations both Greek and Barbarians, which could furnish great numbers of men fit both for the sea and land service; that if once these nations should be governed by such a skilful and enterprizing prince as Histiæus, they might soon become so powerful both by sea and land, that the king of Persia would not be able to keep them in subjection, especially since they might be supplied with gold and silver from the mines, with which that country abounded, to carry on any enterprize. Darius, being by these remonstrances made sensible of the mistake he had committed, dispatched a messenger to Histiæus, enjoining him to repair to Sardis, in order to deliver his advice concerning matters of the utmost consequence. Having thus drawn him to Sardis, he took him with him to Susa, pretending, that he wanted such an able counsellor and faithful friend to be always about him, and telling him, that he should be able to find him something in Persia, which would make him ample amends both for Myrcinus and Miletus. Histiæus, finding himself under a necessity of complying, attended Darius to Susa, and left Aristagoras governor of Miletus in his absence. To this Aristagoras the banished Naxians applied for relief (21).

eaſily brought under ſubjection; that the iſle of Eubœa lying very near the other would be an eaſy conqueſt, and from thence the king would have a free paſſage into Greece. Artaphernes was ſo well pleaſed with theſe propoſals, that inſtead of the hundred ſhips, which Ariſtagoras demanded, he promiſed him two hundred, provided the king approved of the enterprize. And accordingly having obtained the king's conſent, he ſent the next ſpring to Miletus the number of ſhips which he had promiſed, under the command of Megabates a noble Perſian of the Achæmenian family. But his commiſſion being to obey the orders of Ariſtagoras, and the haughty Perſian not brooking to be under the command of an Ionian, a diſſention aroſe between the two generals, which was carried ſo far, that Megabates, to be revenged on Ariſtagoras, gave the Naxians ſecret intelligence of the deſign that was carrying on againſt them. Hereupon they made ſuch preparations for their defence, that the Perſians, after having ſpent four months in beſieging the chief town of the iſland, and conſumed all their proviſions, were obliged to retire. The project having thus miſcarried, Megabates threw all the blame upon Ariſtogoras, and his falſe accuſations being more favourably heard than the juſt defence of the other. Artaphernes condemned him to defray all the charges of the expedition, giving him to underſtand, that they would be exacted with the utmoſt rigor. As he was not able to pay ſo large a ſum, he foreſaw that this muſt end, not only in the loſs of his government, but his utter ruin. This deſperate ſituation made him entertain thoughts of revolting from the king, as the only expedient, whereby he could extricate himſelf from his preſent difficulties. No ſooner had he formed this deſign, but a meſſenger arrived from Hiſtiæus who confirmed him in it. (U). Hiſtiæus, after ſeveral years continuance at the Perſian court, being weary of the manners of that nation, and deſirous to return to his country, thought this the moſt likely means to

(U) Hiſtiæus being deſirous to impart his deſign to Ariſtagoras, and finding no other means, by reaſon all the paſſages leading into Ionia were guarded, ſhaved the hair of one of his ſervants in whoſe fidelity he moſt confided, and having imprinted the meſſage on his head, kept him at Suſa till his hair was grown again. He then diſpatched him to Miletus without any other inſtructions, than that upon his arrival he ſhould deſire Ariſtagoras to cut off his hair and look upon his head (22).

to accompliſh his deſire. For he flattered himſelf, that if any diſturbances ſhould ariſe in Ionia, he could prevail with Darius to ſend him thither to appeaſe them, as in effect it happened. Ariſtagoras, finding his own inclinations backed by the orders of Hiſtiæus, imparted his deſign to the leading men of Ionia, whom he found ready to come into his meaſures, and therefore, being now determined to revolt, applied himſelf wholly to make all manner of preparations for ſo great an undertaking [i].

THE next year, Ariſtagoras to engage the Ionians more reſolutely to ſtand by him, re-inſtated them in their liberty and all their former privileges. He began with Miletus, where he diveſted himſelf of his power, and gave it up into the hands of the people. He then undertook a journey through all Ionia, where by his example and credit he prevailed upon all the other petty princes, or, as the Greeks then called them, tyrants, to do the ſame. Having thus united them all into one common league, and of which he himſelf was declared the head, he openly revolted from the king, and made great preparations both by ſea and land for carrying on a war. To ſtrengthen himſelf the more againſt the Perſians, in the beginning of the following year he went to Lacedæmon to engage that city in his intereſt. But not being able to prevail upon Cleomenes(W), who was at that time king of Lacædemon, to ſend him any ſuccours, he proceeded to Athens, where he met with a much more favourable reception. For he had the

[i] Idem, l. v. c. 35, 36.

(W) Cleomenes having appointed him a time and place for an interview, Ariſtagoras repreſented to him, that the Lacedæmonians and Ionians were countrymen; that Sparta being the moſt powerful city of Greece, it would be much to their honour to concur with him in the deſign he had formed of reſtoring the Ionians to their antient liberty, that the Perſians, their common enemy, were not a warlike People, but extremely rich, and conſequently would become an eaſy prey to the Lacedæmonians; that, conſidering the preſent ſpirit and diſpoſition of the Ionians, it would not be difficult for them to carry their victorious arms even to Suſa, the metropolis of the Perſian empire, and the place of the king's reſidence. At the ſame time, he ſhewed him a deſcription of all the nations and cities, through which they were to paſs, engraved on a plate of braſs, which he had brought along with him. Cleomenes deſired three days time to conſider of the matter, which being expired, he aſked Ariſtagoras in how many days the good fortune to arrive there at a time, when the Athenians were disposed to close with any measures against the Persians, being highly exasperated against them on the following occasion. Hippias, the son of Pisistratus tyrant of Athens, having been banished about ten years before, and tried in vain several other ways to bring about his restoration, at length applied himself to Artaphernes at Sardis; and having insinuated himself into his favour, did all that lay in his power to stir him up against them. The Athenians having intelligence of this, sent ambassadors to Sardis, desiring Arthaphernes not to give ear to what any of their out-laws should insinuate to their disadvantage. The answer of Artaphernes to this embassy was, that if they desired to live in peace, they must recal Hippias. This haughty message incensed the Athenians to a great degree against the Persians, and Aristagoras, arriving there just at this juncture, easily obtained whatever he desired. The Athenians ordered a fleet of twenty ships to be immediately equipped and sent to the assistance of the Ionians.

days one might travel from the coast of Ionia to the city where the king resided, Aristagoras, though an artful man and far superior in all respects to Cleomenes, yet made a slip, as our author observes, in his answer to this demand; for as he designed to draw the Spartans into Asia, he ought to have lessened the distance from the coasts of Ionia to Susa; whereas he told him plainly, 'twas a journey of three months, which Cleomenes no sooner heard, than, interrupting him from proceeding in his discourse concerning the way, he commanded him to depart Sparta before sun-set, for advising the Spartans to take a march into Asia, not to be performed in less than three months after their landing. Cleomenes then withdrew; but Aristagoras, taking an olive-branch in his hand after the manner of suppliants, followed him home to his house, and endeavoured to prevail upon him by arguments of another nature, that is, by presents; but before he made any offer he desired him to bid his daughter Gorgo, a child about eight or nine years old, to withdraw; but Cleomenes telling him that he might speak freely without apprehending any thing from so young a child, Aristagoras began with the promise of ten talents, in case Cleomenes would comply with his request, and receiving a denial, proceeded gradually in his offers till he came to the sum of fifty talents, and then the girl cried out, Fly, father, fly, else this stranger will corrupt you. Cleomenes was so well pleased with the child's admonition, that he immediately retired into another apartment, and ordered Aristagoras that instant to depart his dominions (23).

THE Ionians having at last drawn together all their troops, and being reinforced with the twenty Athenian ships and five more from Eretria, a city in the island of Eubœa, they set sail for Ephesus, and having left their ships there, they marched by land to the city of Sardis, which they easily made themselves masters of. As most of the houses were built with reeds, an Ionian soldier having accidently set one of them on fire, and the flame spreading, the whole city was reduced to ashes; but the citadel, whither Artaphernes had retired, was preserved. After this accident, the Persians and Lydians drawing together their forces, and other troops coming full march to their assistance, the Ionians, who had not been able to force the citadel, judged it was high time for them to withdraw; and accordingly marched back with all possible expedition in order to reimbark at Ephesus. But, before he reached that place, they were overtaken by the enemy, and defeated with great slaughter. The Athenians, who escaped, immediately hoisted sail and returned home; nor could they ever afterwards be prevailed upon to concern themselves in this war. However, their having engaged thus far gave rise to that war, which was carried on afterwards for several generations by the two nations, and ended at last in the utter destruction of the Persian empire. For Darius, being informed of the burning of Sardis, and hearing that the Athenians had been concerned in that undertaking, determined from that time to make war upon Greece, and that he might never forget his resolution, he commanded one of his officers to cry every day to him with a loud voice, while he was at dinner, three times, Remember the Athenians. In the burning of Sardis the temple of Cybele, the chief goddess of that country, accidently taking fire, was entirely consumed. This accident served afterwards as a pretence to the Persians for burning all the temples of Greece. But the true motive which led them to this we shall have occasion to mention hereafter [k].

THE Ionians, though deserted by the Athenians, and considerably weakened by their late overthrow, did not lose courage, but pursued their point with great resolution. Their fleet sailed to the Hellespont and the Propontis, where they reduced the city of Byzantium, and most of the other Greek cities on those coasts. As they were sailing back they

they made a descent in Caria, and obliged the inhabitants to join them in this war. The people of Cyprus likewise entered into the same confederacy, and openly revolted from the Persians. The Persian generals in those quarters, finding that the revolt began to be universal, drew together what troops they had in Cilicia and the neighbouring provinces, and at the same time enjoined the Phœnicians to assist them with their whole naval power. The Ionians, as they were sailing to Cyprus, fell in with the Phœnician fleet, attacked, and dispersed them. But at the same time the Persian troops, that were landed in Cyprus, haveing gained a complete victory over the rebels, and killed in the engagement Onesilus, the son of Chersis, author of their revolt, the Ionians reaped no advantage from their victory by sea; for the whole island of Cyprus was again brought under subjection [1].

After the reduction of Cyprus, Daurises, Hymees, and Otanes, three Persian generals, and all sons-in-law to Darius, having divided their forces into three bodies, marched three different ways against the revolters. Daurises held his course to the Hellespont, and from thence, after possessing himself of the revolted cities, marched against the Carians, whom he overthrew in two successive battles; but in a third being drawn into an ambuscade he was slain with several other Persians of distinction, and his whole army cut in pieces. Hymees, after having taken the city of Cius in Mysia, reduced all the Ilian coast, but falling sick at Troas soon after died. Artaphernes and Otanes with the rest of the Persian generals, finding that Miletus was the center of the Ionian confederacy, resolved to march thither with all their forces, concluding, that, if they could carry that city, all the others would submit of their own accord. Pursuant to this resolution they entered Ionia and Æolia, where their main strength lay, and took the city of Clazomenæ in Ionia, and Cyma in Æolia, which was such a blow to the whole confederacy, that Aristagoras, not finding himself in a condition after that loss to make head against the enemy, resolved to abandon Miletus, and consult his own safety by retiring to some more distant place. Accordingly he embarked with such as were willing to follow him, and set sail for the river Strymon in Thrace, where he seized on the territory of Myrcinus

Myrcinus, which had been formerly given by Darius to Hiſtiæus. But as he was beſieging a place ſituated beyond thoſe limits, he was killed by the Thracians, and all his army cut in pieces. On his departure from Miletus, he left the government in the hands of Pythagoras an eminent citizen, who being informed, that Artaphernes and Otanes deſigned to bend all their force againſtMiletus, ſummoned a general aſſembly of the Ionians. In this meeting it was agreed, that they ſhould not attempt to bring an army into the field, but only to fortify and ſtore their city with all manner of proviſions for a ſiege, and to draw all their forces together to engage the Perſians at ſea, thinking themſelves, by reaſon of their ſkill in maritime affairs, moſt likely to have the advantage in a naval engagement. The place appointed for their general rendezvous was Lada, a ſmall iſland over-againſt Miletus, where accordingly they met with a fleet of 353 ſail. At the ſight of this fleet the Perſians, though double their number, avoided engaging, till by their emiſſaries they had ſecretly corrupted the greateſt part of the confederates, and engaged them to deſert the common cauſe. When they came to an engagement, the Samians, Leſbians, and ſeveral others, hoiſting ſail returned to their reſpective countries. As the remaining fleet of the confederates did not conſiſt of above 100 ſhips, they were quickly overpowered by the Perſians, and almoſt entirely deſtroyed. The city of Miletus was immediately beſieged both by ſea and land, and ſoon taken by the conquerors, who razed it to the ground, the ſixth year after the revolt of Ariſtagoras. All the other towns that had revolted returned, either by force or of their own accord, to their duty. Thoſe that ſtood out were treated as they had been threatened before-hand; the handſomeſt of their youths were made eunuchs, and their young women ſent into Perſia; their cities and temples were reduced to aſhes. Such were the calamities the Ionians drew upon themſelves, by ſ/conding the ambitious views of two enterprizing men, Ariſtagoras and Hiſtiæus[m].

THE latter had his ſhare in the general calamity; for, being taken by the Perſians and carried to Sardis, he was immediately crucified by order of Artaphernes, who haſtened his execution without conſulting Darius, leſt his affection for him ſhould incline him to pardon one, who, if he were again let looſe, would not fail to create new disturbances. It afterwards appeared, that Artaphernes's conjecture was well grounded; for when Histiæus's head was brought to Darius, he expressed great displeasure against the authors of his death, and caused his head to be honourably interred, as the remains of a person, to whom he professed infinite obligations. He was the most bold, restless, and enterprizing genius of his age; with him all means were good and lawful, that served to promote the end he had in view, acknowledging no other rule of his actions than his own interest and ambition, to which he sacrificed the good of his country and the lives of his nearest relations. But we shall have occasion to bring him again upon the scene, in the history of Ionia and the Greek colonies in Asia.

The Phœnician fleet having reduced all the islands on the coasts of Asia, Darius recalled all his other generals, and appointed Mardonius the son of Gobryas, a young Persian nobleman, who had lately married one of his daughters, to be commander in chief of all the forces quartered on the coaste of Asia, ordering him to invade Greece, and revenge on the Athenians and Eretrians the burning of Sardis. Mardonius, having rendezvoused his forces at the Hellespont, marched, pursuant to his orders, through Thrace into Macedonia, ordering his fleet first to reduce Thasus, and then to coast along the shore as he marched by land, that they might be at hand to act in concert with each other. On his arrival in Macedonia all the country, terrified at such a mighty army, submitted. But the fleet, in doubling the cape of mount Athos in order to gain the coast of Macedonia, was entirely dispersed by a violent storm, which destroyed upwards of 300 ships and 20,000 men. His land army met at the same time with a misfortune no less fatal; for being encamped in a place not sufficiently secured and fortified, the Bryges, a people of Thrace, attacking him in the night broke into the camp, slew a great number of his men, and wounded Mardonius himself, who, being disabled by these losses to prosecute his design either by sea or land, marched back into Asia, without reaping any advantage for his master, or glory for himself in this expedition [n].

Darius hearing of the ill success of Mardonius, and ascribing it to his want of experience, thought fit to recall him, and appoint two other generals in his room, Datis a Mede, and Artaphernes his own nephew, being the son of Artaphernes, the king's brother and late governor of Sardis. But before he would make any further attempts upon Greece, he judged it expedient first to sound the Greeks, and try how those different states stood affected to, or were averse from, the Persian government. With this view he sent heralds to all their cities to demand earth and water in token of submission. On the arrival of these heralds, many of the Greek cities, dreading the power of the Persians, complied with their demand; as did also the inhabitants of Ægina, a small island over-against, and not far from, Athens. But at Athens and Sparta they did not meet with so favourable a reception, being in one place thrown into a deep ditch, and in the other into a well, and bid fetch earth and water from thence. This they did in the heat of their passion, but when they came to a cooler temper they were ashamed of what they had done, looking upon it as a violation of the law of nations, and accordingly sent embassadors to the king of Persia at Susa, to offer him what satisfaction he pleased for the affront they had put upon his heralds. But Darius, declaring himself fully satisfied with that embassy, sent the embassadors back to their respective countries, though those of Sparta voluntarily offered themselves as victims, to expiate the crime which their countrymen had been guilty of [e].

Darius, being entirely bent upon the reduction of Greece, hastened the departure of his generals Datis and Artaphernes. Their instructions were to plunder the cities of Eretria and Athens, to burn down to the ground all their houses and temples, to make all the inhabitants of both places slaves and send them to Darius; for which purpose they went provided with a great number of chains and fetters. The two generals, having appointed their fleet to meet at Samos, set sail from thence with 600 ships and 500,000 men [p], steering their course to Naxus, which island they easily made themselves masters of, and having burnt the chief city and all temples both of this and the other islands in those seas, they stood directly for Eretria, a town in Eubœa, which they took after a siege of seven days by the treachery of Euphorbus and Philagrus, two chief citizens. Having taken Eretria, pillaged the city, set fire to the temples in revenge for those that had been burnt at Sardis, and enslaved the inhabitants pursuant to their orders, they ſailed to Attica. Hippias the ſon of Piſiſtratus, who, as we have ſaid above, had fled to the Perſians, conducted them, after they had landed, to the plains of Marathon. Hence they ſent heralds to Athens, acquainting the citizens with the fate of Eretria, in hopes that this news would frighten them into an immediate ſurrender. The Athenians had ſent to Lacedæmon to deſire ſuccours againſt the common enemy, which the Lacedæmonians granted, but they could not ſet out till ſome days after, by reaſon of an antient and ſuperſtitious cuſtom, which obtained at Sparta, and did not allow them to begin a march before the full moon. Not one of their other allies offered to aſſiſt them, ſuch a terror had the Perſian armies ſtruck into the cities of Greece. The inhabitants of Platæa alone furniſhed them with a thouſand men. In this extremity the Athenians were obliged to arm their ſlaves, which was contrary to their practice on all other occaſions.

THE Perſian army commanded by Datis conſiſted of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horſe, that of the Athenians amounted in the whole but to 10,000 men. It was commanded by ten generals, one of which was Miltiades, whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention often in the hiſtory of Greece. Theſe ten generals were to have the command of the army, each for one day in his turn. When the army was aſſembled a diſpute aroſe among them, whether they ſhould venture an engagement in the field, or only fortify and defend the city. They were all for the latter opinion, except Miltiades, who declared, that the only way to raiſe the courage of their own troops, and ſtrike a terror into the enemy, was, to advance boldly and attack them with intrepidity. Ariſtides, convinced by the ſpeech of Miltiades, embraced his opinion, and brought over to it ſome of the other commanders. Callimachus likewiſe, who had been very ſanguine at firſt againſt ſuch a raſh enterprize, fell in at laſt with Miltiades, and a reſolution was taken to engage the enemy in the open field. All the commanders, who were for venturing a battle, when their turn came to command the army, yielded that honour to Miltiades, all ſentiments of jealouſy giving way to the public good; but though he accepted the power, yet he would not hazard an engagement before his own day. As ſoon as that came, he endeavoured to gain the advantage of the ground to make up what he wanted in ſtrength and

number. He drew up his army at the foot of a mountain, that the enemy might not ſurround them, or fall upon his rear. He covered his flanks with large trees, which he cauſed to be cut down for that purpoſe, and to render the Perſian cavalry uſeleſs. The Athenian forces were ſo drawn up that they were equal in front to the Perſians; but becauſe they had not a ſufficient number of men in the center, that part was extremely weak, the main ſtrength of the army conſiſting in the wings. All things being thus diſpoſed, and the ſacrifice, according to the cuſtom of the Greeks, performed, Miltiades, without waiting the motions of the Perſians, commanded the ſignal for the battle to be given, when the Athenians fell upon the enemy, with ſuch courage and reſolution as can hardly be expreſſed. The Perſians ſeeing the Athenians advance imputed their reſolution to folly and deſpair, being not only few in number, but entirely deſtitute of horſe, and without ſtirring prepared themſelves to receive them. After a long and obſtinate fight, the Perſians and Sacæ broke the center of the Athenians, having made their greateſt efforts againſt that part. The center was commanded by Ariſtides and Themiſtocles, who with great intrepidity made head againſt the whole Perſian army, till, being borne down by their numbers and quite over-powered, they were obliged to give ground. But the Athenians and Platæans, who were in the two wings, having defeated the wings of the enemy, came up to the relief of their center, juſt as they were betaking themſelves to a precipitous flight, after having maintained a running fight for ſome hours. At their arrival the ſcale was quickly turned, for attacking the enemy in flank they ſoon put them in diſorder, and obliged them with great ſlaughter to fly to their fleet, whither they purſued them, took ſeven of their ſhips, and burnt a great many more. In this action ſeveral Athenians of great diſtinction were ſlain, and amongſt others Callimachus and Staſileus, two of the chief commanders, with only 200 private men, whereas the Perſians left 6000 dead in the field of battle, and beſides a great many were killed in the flight, burnt in their ſhips, and drowned in the ſea, as they attempted to ſave themſelves on board their veſſels. Hippias was killed in the battle, that ungrateful citizen, who, in order to recover the unjuſt dominion uſurped by his father Piſiſtratus, had put himſelf at the head of thoſe who were come with a deſign to reduce to aſhes that city to which he owed his birth.

birth [q]. Immediately after the battle, an Athenian soldier, stained all over with blood, hastened to Athens to acquaint his fellow-citizens with the good success of their army at Marathon. When he arrived at the public palace where the magistrates were assembled, he was so spent, that, having uttered these words, Rejoyce, rejoyce, the victory is ours, he fell down dead at their feet [r]. The Persians were so sure of the victory, that they had brought marble along with them to Marathon in order to erect a trophy there. This marble the Athenians seized, and caused a statue to be formed of it by the famous Phidias in honour of the goddess Nemesis, whose province it was to punish unjust actions [s] (X).

(X) Justin tells us (24), that the Persians lost on this occasion, what by the sword, what by ship-wreck 200,000 men; but we chuse to follow Herodotus, who flourished very near those times, and acquaints us, that in the battle were killed 6300 Persians and 192 Athenians. The whole Persian army, according to Valerius Maximus (25), consisted of 300,000 men. Plutarch seems to insinuate the same (26). Justin (27) and Orosius say, that they were in all 600,000 men. Emilius Probus (28) tells us, that they were 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse. Of the Athenians there were 10,000, and 1000 Platæans, say Justin and Orosius; but Probus assures us, that the Athenians with their auxilliaries were in all but 10,000. This ever memorable victory was gained, if we believe Plutarch (29), upon the 6th day of Boedromion the third month in the Attic calendar, after the summer solstice, Phænippus being at that time prætor at Athens, that is in the third year of the 72d olympiad, four years before the death of Darius, as we read in Severus Sulpitius (30), and ten years before Xerxes passed over into Greece, as Thucydides informs us (31). Most authors tells us, that Hippias was slain in this battle; but Suidas says, that he escaped and died afterwards in the island of Lemnos. Themistocles, who became afterwards so famous, on this occasion first entered the school of war. We cannot omit in this place the glorious behaviour of one Cynegyrus an Athenian soldier, who having first his right and then his left hand cut off, while he was endeavouring to prevent one of the enemies ships from putting off, took hold of it at last with h s teeth.

AFTER this defeat the Perſian fleet, inſtead of ſailing by the iſlands in order to return to Aſia, doubled the cape of Sunium with a deſign to ſurpriſe Athens before the return of the army. But the Athenian troops being appriſed of their deſign, decamped from the plains of Marathon, and marched with ſuch expedition, that they arrived at Athens before the enemy's fleet, and by that means diſappointed their meaſures [t].

DATIS and Artaphernes arriving in Aſia, that they might ſeem to have reaped ſome advantage from this expedition, ſent the Eretrians captives to Suſa. Darius had expreſſed great indignation againſt the Eretrians before the reduction of their city, and charg'd them with the guilt of beginning the war; but finding they were now his priſoners and entirely in his power, he could not find in his heart to do them any harm, but gave them a village in the country of Ciſſia to inhabit, which was but a day's journey diſtant from Suſa [u]. Here Apollonius Tyaneus [w] found their deſcendants a great many ages after.

As ſoon as the day of the full moon was over, the Lacedæmonians began their march with two thouſand men, and arrived in three days on the confines of Attica, having marched in ſo ſhort a time 1200 Stades [x]; ſuch was their eagerneſs to be preſent at the battle: but a ſilly and ridiculous ſuperſtition prevented their having a ſhare in the moſt glorious action recorded in hiſtory; for the battle was fought a day before they arrived. However, they proceeded to Marathon, where they found the fields covered with dead bodies, and having congratulated the Athenians on the happy ſucceſs of the battle, they returned home [y].

DARIUS, upon the news of the unſucceſsful return of his army, was ſo far from being diſcouraged by ſuch a diſaſter, that he added the defeat at Marathon to the burning of Sardis, as a new motive ſpurring him on to purſue the war with more vigor. He therefore reſolved to head the army in perſon, and iſſued orders to all his ſubjects in the ſeveral provinces of the empire to attend him in this expedition. But after he had ſpent three years in making the neceſſary preparations, a new war broke out, occaſioned by the revolt of Egypt. This gave him no ſmall uneaſineſs; however, as he was wholly bent on this expedition againſt Greece, he reſolved not to lay that aſide, but at the ſame time to ſend part of his forces to reduce Egypt, and

and with the reſt to march in perſon againſt his old enemies the Greeks (Y). But when he had prepared all things for theſe two expeditions, a great conteſt aroſe between his ſons concerning the ſucceſſion. According to an ancient cuſtom among the Perſians the king was obliged, before he ſet out on any expedition, to name his ſucceſſor ; a cuſtom wiſely eſtabliſhed to prevent the many inconveniencies that attend an unſettled ſucceſſion. Darius thought himſelf the more obliged to comply with this cuſtom, as he was already advanced in years, and two of his ſons ſeemed to have a juſt right to the crown upon his demiſe. Darius had three ſons by the daughter of Gobryas his firſt wife, all born before he came to the crown, and four more by Atoſſa the daughter of Cyrus, all born after his ſucceſſion to the throne. Of the firſt Artabazanes was the eldeſt, of the latter Xerxes; and theſe two were competitors for the ſucceſſion. Artabazanes, or, as Juſtin calls him, Artamenes, urged, that he was the eldeſt ſon. and therefore, according to the cuſtom of all nations, ought to be preferred in the ſucceſſion to the younger. On the other hand, Xerxes alledged, that he was the ſon of Atoſſa daughter of Cyrus who had founded the Perſian monarchy, and claimed the kingdom in the right of his mother, it being more agreeable to juſtice, ſaid he, that the crown of Cyrus ſhould devole upon one, who was a deſcendant of Cyrus, than upon one that was not. Darius had not yet declared in favour of either, when Damaratus king of Sparta, being driven out of

(Y) Diodorus Siculus (32) ſeems to inſinuate, that Darius marched into Egypt to reduce the rebels, and that he ſucceeded in the enterprize. That hiſtorian relates, that upon Darius's deſiring to have his ſtatue placed before that of Seſoſtris, the chief prieſt of the Egyptians told him, that he had not equalled the glory of that conqueror, and that the king, no ways offended at the Egyptian prieſt's freedom, reply'd, that he would endeavour to ſurpaſs it. He adds further, that Darius had ſeveral conferences with the Egyptian prieſts upon matters of religion and government, and that having learnt of them with what gentleneſs their antient kings uſed to treat their ſubjects, he endeavoured, after his return into Perſia, to form himſelf upon their model. But Herodotus, more worthy of belief in this particular than Diodorus, only obſerves, that Darius reſolved to make war at the ſame time upon Egypt and Greece, and to invade Greece in perſon, while part of his troops were employed in the reduction of Egypt.

by his ſubjects, arrived at Suſa, and hearing of this diſpute ſecretly ſuggeſted to Xerxes another argument to ſupport his pretenſions; namely, that he was born after his father was inveſted to the royal dignity, whereas Artabazanes was only the ſon of Darius a private man; to whom therefore the crown belonged as the king's eldeſt ſon, and not to Artabazanes the eldeſt ſon of Darius. He further ſupported his argument by the example of the Lacedæmonians, who excluded from the crown the children that were born before their fathers acceſſion, if they had any to ſucceed born after their advancement to the throne. Theſe reaſons appeared ſo juſt to Darius, that he declared Xerxes heir apparent to his crown. Our author is of opinion, that Xerxes was named to the ſucceſſion, not ſo much by the ſtrength of this plea, as by the influence his mother Atoſſa had over the inclinations of Darius, who in this matter was entirely governed by her authority [z] (Z).

THE ſucceſſion being thus ſettled, and all things ready both for the Egyptian and Grecian expedition, Darius died in the ſecond year of the revolt of Egypt, after having reigned 36 years. This prince was endowed with many excellent qualities; his wiſdom, clemency, and juſtice are greatly commended by the antients. He had the honour to have his name recorded in holy writ [a], as a favourer of God's people, a reſtorer of the temple, and a promoter

(Z) Juſtin and Plutarch (33) place this diſpute after the deceaſe of Darius, and both take notice of the prudent conduct of the two brothers on ſo nice an occaſion. Artabazanes, according to them, was abſent when the king died, and Xerxes immediately took all the enſigns of royalty, exerciſing all the functions of the regal dignity. But upon his brother's returning home he quitted the diadem and tiara, went out to meet him, and ſhewed him all imaginable civility. They agreeed to make their uncle Artabanus the arbitrator of their difference, and to acquieſce, without any farther appeal, to his deciſion. During the whole time this diſpute laſted, all the demonſtrations of an entire and fraternal affection paſſed between the two competitors. And when it was decided, as the one did not inſult, ſo the other did not repine or expreſs any diſſatisfaction, at the ſentence, but immediately proſtrating himſelf before him, acknowledged him for his maſter, and placed him upon the throne with his own hand. He continued all his life firmly attached to his intereſt, and at laſt died in his ſervice in the battle of Salamis.

promoter of the true worſhip in Jeruſalem. His kindneſs towards the Iſraelites was rewarded with a numerous iſſue, a long reign, and great proſperity. For though the Scythian and Greek expeditions proved unſucceſsful, yet he was very fortunate in all his other undertakings, having not only reſtored and entirely ſettled the empire of Cyrus, which had been very much ſhaken by the unpolitic government of Cambyſes and uſurpation of Smerdis, but alſo added many great and rich provinces to that prince's conqueſts, namely, India, Thrace, Macedonia, and the iſlles of the Ionian ſea (A).

XERXES ſucceeding his father employed the firſt year of his reign in carrying on the preparations for the reduction of Egypt, which his father had begun. He confirmed, upon his firſt acceſſion to the crown, all the privileges granted by his father to the Jews, and particularly that, which aſſigned them the tribute of Samaria for furniſhing them victims to be offered in the temple [b].

IN the ſecond year of his reign he marched againſt the Egyptians, and having reduced the rebels, and brought the country to a worſe condition of ſlavery than what they had felt under his predeceſſors, he appointed his brother Achæmenes governor of that province, and returned to Suſa. Puffed up with this ſucceſs againſt the Egyptians, he determined

(A) the Jews (34) have a tradition, that the prophets Haggai, Zachariah, and Malachi, died in the laſt year of Darius, and that on their death the ſpirit of prophecy ceaſed among the Jews, which was the ſealing up of viſion and prophecy ſpoke of by Daniel (35). And miſled by the ſame tradition they tell us, that the kingdom of Perſia ended the ſame year; for they confound this Darius with the other who was conquered by Alexander, and will have the Perſian empire to have laſted only 52 years, which they reckon thus: Darius the Mede reigned one year, Cyrus three, Cambyſes, according to them the Ahaſuerus who married Eſther, 32 years. This laſt Darius they take to be the ſame with Artaxerxes, who ſent Ezra and Nehemiah to Jeruſalem, to reſtore the Jews to their antient ſtate. For they tell us, that Artaxerxes was a name common to the Perſian kings, as that of Pharaoh was to thoſe of Egypt. This ſhews how little they were acquainted with the Perſian hiſtory; and their countryman Joſephus ſeems to have been as much in the dark, with reſpect to Perſia, as they were.

termined to invade Greece. But before he engaged in an enterprize of that importance, he thought fit to aſſemble his council, and take the advice of the moſt illuſtrious perſons of his court. When they were aſſembled, he laid before them the deſign he had of invading Greece, and acquainted them with the motives that prompted him to that expedition (B). Mardonius, the ſame perſon who had been ſo unſucceſsful in the reign of Darius, hoping that the command of the army would be beſtowed upon him, not only approved of the king's determination, but extolled him above all the kings that had preceded him, and endeavoured to ſet forth the indiſpenſable neceſſity they all lay under of revenging the diſhonour done to the Perſian name at Sardis and Marathon, The reſt of the council, perceiving that the flattering diſcourſe of Mardonius pleaſed the king, durſt not venture to contradict it, but all kept ſilence for ſome time. At laſt Artabanus, the king's uncle, a prince venerable both for his age and prudence, addreſſing Xerxes, uſed all his endeavours to divert him from his preſent reſolution, and at the ſame time reproached Mardonius with want of ſincerity, and ſhewed how much he was to blame, for deſiring raſhly to engage the nation in a war, which nothing but his own ambitious and ſelf-intereſted views could tempt him to adviſe. He concluded with theſe words: "If a war be reſolved upon, let the "king remain in Perſia, and our children be depoſited in-"to his hands. Then go on with your expedition, at-"tended by the beſt forces he can chuſe, and in what "number you think fit. If the iſſue be favourable, I "am

He added, that this war had been reſolved on by his father Darius, that he meant only to execute his deſigns. He concluded his ſpeech with promiſing ample rewards to ſuch as ſhould diſtinguiſh themſelves in this expedition, and deſiring them to deliver their opinion in this matter with freedom (36),

" am willing to forfeit my own life and the lives of my " children. But on the contrary, if the event be ſuch as " I have foretold, then let your children ſuffer death, and " you alſo, if ever you return." Artabanus expreſſed his ſentiments in very reſpectful and inoffenſive terms; but nevertheleſs Xerxes was extremely offended, and replied with indignation, that if Artabanus were not his uncle he ſhould ſuffer that moment the due puniſhment for ſuch an audacious behaviour, and commanded him to ſtay at home among the women, whom he too much reſembled, while he marched, at the head of his troops, where his duty and glory called him. However, when the firſt emotion of his anger was paſt, he owned, that he had been to blame for treating his uncle with ſuch harſh language, and was not aſhamed to repair his fault, by openly confeſſing, that the heat of his youth and want of experience had made him treſpaſs againſt the regard, that was due to a prince ſo worthy of reſpect as Artabanus [c]. At the ſame time he declared, that he was ready to follow his advice, and lay aſide the deſign of invading Greece, notwithſtanding a phantom had appeared to him the night before in his ſleep, and warmly exhorted him to undertake the war (C). All the Perſians, who compoſed the council,

(C) Herodotus tells us, that Xerxes, reflecting in the night time on the opinion of Artabanus, was very much perplexed, and concluded at laſt, that a war with Greece could not turn to his advantage. Having thus altered his reſolution he fell aſleep, and ſaw in dream a man of an uncommon ſtature and beauty ſtanding by him, and uttering theſe words: Have you then changed your deſign of leading an army into Greece, after having ordered the Perſians to aſſemble their forces? You have not done well to alter your reſolution, nor will you find any man of your opinion. Reſume therefore without delay the enterprize you determined to undertake. The phantom, having pronounced theſe words, diſappeared; and the next morning Xerxes, neglecting his dream, ſummoned the council, and acquainted them, that he had altered his mind with regard to the Grecian expedition, and wiſhed them joy of the advantages of peace which they were to reap at home. But the night following the ſame phantom appeared again to Xerxes, telling him, that if he did not undertake without delay a war with Greece, he ſhould become little and contemptible in as ſhort a time as he had been raiſed to greatneſs and power. The king, terrified with this ſecond dream, ſent for Artabanus, acquainted him with what had happened

cil, were overjoyed to hear the king ſpeak in that manner, and proſtrating themſelves before him, ſtrove to outdo each other in extolling the prudence of his conduct. But he did not long continue in that mind; nay Artabanus himſelf, the only man who had openly diſapproved the expedition, whether frightened by a dream, or dreading the king's diſpleaſure, became a moſt ſanguine and zealous promoter of the war [d].

XERXES, being now reſolved to attack Greece, that he might omit nothing which could contribute to the ſucceſs of his undertaking, entered into an alliance with the Carthaginians, who were at that time the moſt powerful people of the weſt, whereby it was agreed, that, while the Perſians invaded Greece, the Carthaginians ſhould fall upon the Greek colonies in Sicily and Italy, that thereby they might be diverted from helping each other. The Carthaginians appointed Hamilcar their general, who not only raiſed what forces he could in Afric, but with the money ſent him by Xerxes hired a great many mercenaries in Spain, Gaul, and Italy; ſo that his army conſiſted of 300,000 men, beſides a proportionable number of ſhips for tranſporting his forces and the neceſſary proviſions [e]. And thus Xerxes, agreeable to the prophecy of Daniel [f], having by his ſtrength through his riches ſtirred all the nations of the then known world againſt the realm of Greece; that is, all the weſt under the command of Hamilcar, and all the eaſt under his own banners, ſet out from Suſa to enter upon this war in the fifth year of his reign, after having ſpent three years in making vaſt preparations throughout happened, and intreated him to put on the royal robes, to ſit on the throne, and paſs the night in his bed. Artabanus at firſt begged to be excuſed, as not deſerving the honour of ſitting in the king's throne; but being preſſed by Xerxes, who was perſwaded, that if the dream was from the gods Artabanus would ſee the ſame viſion, he at laſt complied with his deſire and cloathed himſelf with the royal robes. As he ſlept in the king's bed, the ſame phantom appeared to him, threatning him with the greateſt calamities, if he continued to oppoſe the king's intentions. This ſo terrified Artabanus, that he came over to the king's firſt opinion, believing, that there was ſomething divine in theſe repeated viſions, and the war againſt Greece was reſolved on (37).

out all the provinces of his wide-ſpreading empire. From Suſa he marched to Sardis, which was the place appointed for the general rendézvous of all his land-forces, while his navy advanced along the coaſts of Aſia Minor towards the Helleſpont.

Two things Xerxes commanded to be done before he came to the ſea ſide; the one was a paſſage to be cut through mount Athos. This mountain reaches a great way into the ſea in the form of a peninſula, and is joined to the land by an iſthmus twelve furlongs over. The ſea in this place is very tempeſtuous, and the Perſian fleet had formerly ſuffered ſhipwreck in doubling this promontory. To prevent the like diſaſter Xerxes cauſed a paſſage to be cut through the mountain broad enough to let two gallies, with three banks of oars each, paſs in front. By this means he ſevered from the continent the cities of Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyſus, and Cleone. Our author obſerves, that Xerxes undertook this enterprize only out of oſtentation, and to perpetuate the memory of his name, ſince he might, with far leſs trouble, have cauſed his fleet to be conveyed over the iſthmus, as was the practice in thoſe days [f] (D).

He

(D) This prince, believing that the very elements were under his command, wrote to mount Athos in the following terms; Athos, thou proud and aſpiring mountain, that lifteſt up thy head to the very ſkies, I adviſe thee not to be ſo audacious as to put rocks and ſtones, that cannot be cut, in the way of my workmen, if thou makeſt that oppoſition, I will cut thee entirely down, and throw thee headlong into the ſea (38). Our modern travellers tell us, that they can perceive no traces of this great work, and moſt of them are of Juvenal's opinion expreſſed in theſe words; Perforatus Athos, & quicquid Græcia mendax audet in hiſtoria. The directors of this enterpriſe were Bubaris, the ſon of Megabyzus, and Artacheus, the ſon of Arbæus, both Perſians. It was carried on in the following manner: All the forces on board the fleet were employed in the undertaking; they firſt drew a line before the city of Sana, ſituated at the foot of mount Athos towards the land, and then divided the ground among themſelves, each nation having their portion allotted them. When the trench was conſiderably ſunk, thoſe who were at the bottom continued to dig, delivering the earth to their companions ſtanding on ladders, who handed it to ſuch as ſtood

(38) Plutarch. de ira cohib. p.

He likewiſe commanded a bridge of boats to be lain over the Helleſpont, for the paſſing of his forces from Aſia into Europe. The ſea which ſeparates Seſtos and Abydus, where the bridge was built, is ſeven furlongs over. The work was carried on with great expedition by the Phœnicians and Egyptians, who had no ſooner finiſhed it, but a violent ſtorm ariſing broke it in pieces, and diſperſed or daſhed againſt the ſhore the veſſels of which it was compoſed; which when Xerxes heard, he fell into ſuch a violent tranſport of anger, that he commanded 300 ſtripes to be inflicted on the ſea, and a pair of fetters to be thrown into it, enjoining thoſe who were truſted with the execution of his orders to pronounce theſe words: "Thou ſalt "and bitter element, thy maſter has condemned thee to "this puniſhment for offending him without cauſe, and "is reſolved to paſs over thee in ſpite of thy billows and in-"ſolent reſiſtance." The extravagant folly and madneſs of this prince did not ſtop here; he commanded the heads of thoſe who had the direction of the work to be ſtruck off [g].

ſtood higher, till it was conveyed to thoſe that waited to receive it at the edge of the canal, and by them carried to another place. Our author obſerves, (39) that by digging perpendicularly, and making the bottom of equal breadth with the top, all the workmen, except the Phœnicians, had double the labour, by reaſon the earth fell down continually in great quantities from the upper parts. But the Phœnicians opened the ground, which was aſſigned to them, twice as large as others had done, and ſloaped the ground gradually till they came to the bottom. In a large meadow adjoining to this place there was a court of juſtice and a market, furniſhed with corn and other neceſſaries brought from Aſia. This work does not ſeem to us ſo very ſurprizing and incredible, as ſome would make it, when we conſider the number of hands and the time that were employed in perfecting it. For Herodotus tells us, that three whole years were ſpent in the undertaking, and an incredible number of workmen obliged to labour day and night in their turns. Beſides the canal was not cut through, as Juvenal ſeems to inſinuate, but behind mount Athos, where the iſthmus was but a mile and a half over, and broad enough only to let two gallies paſs in front.

(39) Idem, ibid. c. 34

In their room he appointed more experienced architects to build two other bridges, one for the army, and the other for the beaſts of burden and the baggage. When the whole work was completed, and the veſſels, which formed the bridges, ſecured againſt the violence of the wind and the current of the water, Xerxes departed from Sardis, where the army had wintered, and directed his march to Abydus. When he arrived at that city, he deſired to ſee all his forces together, and to that end aſcending a ſtately edifice of white ſtone, which the Abydenians had built on purpoſe to receive him in a manner ſuitable to his greatneſs, he had a free proſpect of the coaſt, ſeeing at one view both his fleet and land-forces. The ſea was covered with his ſhips, and the large plains of Abydus with his troops quite down to the ſhore. While he was thus ſurveying with his own eyes the vaſt extent of his power, and deeming himſelf the moſt happy of mortals, his joy being all on a ſudden turned into grief, he burſt out into a flood of tears, which Artabanus perceiving, aſked him, what had made him in a few moments paſs from an exceſs of joy to ſo great a grief? The king replied, that conſidering the ſhortneſs of human life he could not reſtrain his tears; for of all theſe numbers of men not one, ſaid he, will be alive a hundred years hence. Artabanus, who neglected no opportunity of inſtilling into the young prince's mind ſentiments of kindneſs towards his people, finding him touched with a ſenſe of tenderneſs and humanity, endeavoured to make him ſenſible of the obligation that is incumbent upon princes to alleviate the ſorrows and ſweeten the bitterneſs, which the lives of their ſubjects are liable to, ſince it is not in their power to prolong them. In the ſame converſation Xerxes aſked his uncle, whether, if he had not ſeen the viſion which made him change his mind, he would ſtill perſiſt in the ſame opinion and diſſuade him from making war upon Greece. Artabanus ſincerely owned, that he ſtill had his fears, and was very uneaſy concerning two things, the ſea and the land; the ſea, becauſe there were no ports capable of receiving and ſheltering ſuch a fleet, if a ſtorm ſhould ariſe; the land, becauſe no country could maintain ſo numerous an army. The king was very ſenſible of the ſtrength of his reaſoning, but, as it was now too late to go back, he made anſwer; that in great enterprizes men ought not to enter into ſo nice a diſcuſſion of all the inconveniencies that may attend them; that bold and daring undertakings, though ſubject to many evils and dangers, are preferable to inaction, however ſafe; that great ſucceſſes are no otherwiſe to be obtained than by venturing boldly; and that if his predeceſſors had obſerved ſuch ſcrupulous and timorous rules of politics, the Perſian empire would never have attained to ſo high a degree of glory and grandeur [h].

All things being now in readineſs, and a day appointed, for the paſſing over of the army, as ſoon as the firſt rays of the ſun began to appear, all ſorts of perfumes were burnt upon the bridge, and the way ſtrewed with myrtle. At the ſame time, Xerxes pouring a libation into the ſea, out of a golden cup, and addreſſing the ſun implored the aſſiſtance of that deity, begging, that he might meet with no impediment, ſo great as to hinder him from carrying his conquering arms to the utmoſt limits of Europe. This done he threw the cup into the Helleſpont, with a golden bowl and a Perſian ſcymetar, and the foot and horſe began to paſs over that bridge, which was next to the Euxine, while the carriges and beaſts of burden paſſed over the other, which was placed nearer the Ægean ſea. The bridges were boarded and covered over with earth, having rails on each ſide, that the horſes and cattle might not be frightened at the ſight of the ſea. The army ſpent ſeven days and ſeven nights in paſſing over, though they marched day and night without intermiſſion, and were by frequent blows obliged to quicken their pace. At the ſame time, the fleet made to the coaſt of Europe. After the whole army was paſſed, Xerxes advanced with his land-forces through the Thracian Cherſoneſus to Doriſcus, a city at the mouth of the river Hebrus in Thrace; but the fleet ſteered a quite different courſe, ſtanding to the weſtward for the promontory of Sarpedon, where they were commanded to attend farther orders. Xerxes, having encamped in the large plains of Doriſcus, and judging them convenient for reviewing and numbering his troops, diſpatched orders to his admirals to bring the fleet to the adjacent ſhore, that he might take an account both of his ſea and land-forces. His land-army upon the muſter was found to conſiſt of one million and ſeven hundred thouſand foot and fourſcore thouſand horſe, which, together with twenty thouſand men that conducted the camels and took care of the baggage, amounted to one million eight hundred thouſand men.

His fleet conſiſted of twelve hundred and ſeven large ſhips, and three thouſand gallies and tranſports; on board of all theſe veſſels there were found to be five hundred ſeventeen thouſand ſix hundred and ten men. So that the whole number of ſea and land-forces, which Xerxes led out of Aſia to invade Greece, amounted to two millions three hundred and ſeventeen thouſand ſix hundred and ten men. Our author tells us, that on his paſſing the Helleſpont to enter Europe, an inhabitant of that country cried out; O Jupiter, why art thou come to deſtroy Greece, in the ſhape of a Perſian and under the name of Xerxes, with all mankind following thee; whereas thy own power is ſufficient to do this without their aſſiſtance? After he had entered Europe, the nations on this ſide of the Helleſpont, that ſubmitted to him, added to his land-forces three hundred thouſand more, and two hundred and twenty ſhips to his fleet, on board of which were twenty-four-thouſand men. So that the whole number of his forces, when he arrived at Thermopylæ, was two millions ſix hundred and forty one thouſand ſix hundred and ten men, without including ſervants, eunuchs, women, ſutlers, and other people of that ſort, who were computed to equal the number of the forces: ſo that the whole multitude of perſons, that followed Xerxes in this expedition, amounted to five millions two hundred eighty three thouſand two hundred and twenty [f] (E). Among theſe millions of men there was

[f] Herodot. l. vii. c. 56—99—148—187.

(E) This is the computation of Herodotus, and with him agree Plutarch (40) and Iſocrates (41); but Diodorus Siculus (42), Pliny (43), Ælian (44), and others fall ſhort of this number, making the army, which Xerxes led againſt Greece, not much more numerous than that with which his father invaded Scythia. Theſe probably miſtook the one for the other. Herodotus is the moſt antient author that has written of this war, and lived in the very age wherein it happened; wherefore we have preferred his account to that of others, the rather, becauſe we find it to be the general opinion of all the antients, whether Greeks or Latins, that this was the greateſt army that was ever brought into the field, and the account of Herodotus beſt agrees with the verſes engraved on the monument of thoſe Greeks that were

was not one that could vie with Xerxes either in comelineſs or ſtature, or that ſeemed more worthy of that great empire. But this is a poor commendation when it is not accompanied with other qualifications. Accordingly Juſtin, after he has mentioned the number of his troops, emphatically concludes, but this vaſt body wanted a head. Beſides the ſubordinate generals of each nation, who commanded the troops of their reſpective countries, the whole army was under the command of ſix Perſian generals, viz. Mardonius the ſon of Gobryas, Triatatœchmes the ſon of Artabanus, Smerdones the ſon of Otanes, (the two latter were couſins to Xerxes), Maſiſtes the ſon of Darius by Atoſſa, Gergys the ſon of Ariazus, and Megabyzus the ſon of the celebrated Zopyrus. The ten thouſand Perſians, who were called the immortal band, obeyed no other commander but Hydarnes. The fleet was commanded by four Perſian admirals, and likewiſe the cavalry had their particular generals and commanders.

XERXES, having thus numbered his ſea and land-forces at Doriſcus, marched from thence through Thrace, Macedon, and Theſſaly towards Attica, ordering his fleet to follow him along the coaſt, and to regulate their motions according to the motions of the army. Where ever he were ſlain at Thermopylæ, where it is ſaid, that they fought againſt three millions, as we read the inſcription in Herodotus, or againſt two, as we find it in Diodorus Siculus (45). Joſephus (46) tells us, that his countrymen too bore a part in this expedition, and proves it from a paſſage out of Chœrilus (47), where it is ſaid, that Xerxes was attended by a people who uſed the Phænician language, and dwelt in the Solymæan land on hills near a great lake. As Jeruſalem was alſo called Solyma, and all the country thereabout was mountainous, and lay near the great lake Aſphaltites, commonly called the lake of Sodom, this deſcription ſeems plainly to ſuit the Jews. But Scaliger (48), Cunæus (49), and Bochart (50), underſtand thoſe verſes of the Solymi in Piſidia. However, Salmaſius (51) maintains the contrary opinion; and truly it is not at all likely, that when Xerxes obliged all the other nations to ſend their quotas of men, the Jews alone ſhould be exempted. Whether therefore thoſe mentioned by Chœrilus were Jews or not, it muſt be allowed, that they alſo bore part in this expedition.

came he found proviſions prepared before-hand, purſuant to the orders he had ſent, and each city was obliged to entertain him, which coſt immenſe ſums, and gave occaſion to the ſaying of a citizen of Abdera, after the king's departure, that his countrymen might thank the gods for Xerxes moderation in being ſatisfied with one meal a day [g].

In the mean time, Lacedæmon and Athens, the two moſt powerful cities of Greece, againſt which Xerxes was moſt exaſperated, having had intelligence of the enemy's preparations and motions, ſent embaſſadors to Argos, into Sicily, to the iſlands of Corcyra and Crete, to deſire ſuccours, and conclude a league againſt the common enemy. The people of Argos offered a very conſiderable number of troops, on condition they ſhould have an equal ſhare with the Lacedæmonians in the command. The latter conſented, that the king of Argos ſhould have the ſame authority as either of the kings of Sparta; but this offer did not ſatisfy the Argians, who thereupon ordered the embaſſadors to depart the territories of Argos before ſun-ſet. From Argos they proceeded to Sicily, where Gelo, the moſt powerful prince in all the Greek colonies, offered to aſſiſt them with a very numerous army and a mighty fleet, provided they appointed him commander in chief of all their forces both by ſea and land. This propoſal was rejected by the Athenian embaſſadors, who told him, that they did not want a general, but an army, and without preſſing him any further departed. The inhabitants of Corcyra, now Corfu, immediately put to ſea with a fleet of 60 ſhips, but advanced no farther than the coaſts of Laconia, where they waited the iſſue of an engagement, deſigned to ſide afterwards with the conqueror. The people of Crete, having conſulted the oracle to know what reſolution they ſhould take on this occaſion, abſolutely refuſed to enter into the league. Thus were the Lacedæmonians and Athenians abandoned by all thir countrymen, except the Theſpians and Platæans, who ſent ſmall bodies to their aſſiſtance. The firſt thing they took care of in ſo critical a conjuncture was, to put an end to all inteſtine diviſions and diſcords; and accordingly a peace was concluded between the Athenians and the people of Ægina, who were actually at war. In the next place they appointed a general, the Athenians chuſing Themiſtocles, and the Spartans conferring the ſupreme command of their forces upon Leonidas one of their kings. The only thing that now remained ed was, to determine in what place they ſhould meet the Perſians, in order to diſpute their entrance into Greece. After various propoſals and diſputes it was reſolved, that they ſhould ſend a body of four thouſand men to Thermopylæ, which is a narrow paſs, being but 25 foot broad, between the mountains that divide Theſſaly from Greece, and the only way through which the Perſians could enter Attica, and advance by land to Athens. The command of this ſmall body was given to Leonidas, a prince of extraordinary courage, who accordingly marched with all poſſible expedition to his poſt, determined either to ſtop the innumerable army of Xerxes with that handful of men, or die in the attempt. Such was alſo the reſolution of the 300 Spartans, who attended him, and had been all choſen by himſelf.

In the mean time, Xerxes, advancing near the ſtraits, was ſtrangely ſurprized to find that the Greeks were reſolved to diſpute his paſſage. For he had always flattered himſelf, that on his approach they would betake themſelves to flight, nor attempt to oppoſe his innumerable forces with ſo ſmall a body, their whole army conſiſting of but eleven thouſand two hundred men, and of theſe ſcarce four thouſand being employed to defend the paſs. He ſent out a ſcout on horſeback to view their numbers, and diſcover how they were encamped. The ſcout brought back word, that the Lacedæmonians were, ſome performing their military exerciſes, and others putting their hair in order; for their cuſtom was, as Damaratus (F), who was then in the Perſian camp, informed the king, to comb and put in order their hair when they were to expoſe their lives to the greateſt dangers. However, Xerxes, entertaining

(F) Damaratus was one of the two kings of Sparta, who, being baniſhed by the adverſe party, had ſought refuge at the Perſian court, where he was entertained with the greateſt marks of honour and diſtinction. As the courtiers were one day expreſſing their ſurprize, that a king ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be baniſhed, Damaratus told them, that at Sparta the laws were more powerful than the king. This prince was in great eſteem at the Perſian court, but neither the injuſtice of the Spartan citizens, nor the kind treatment of the Perſian king, could make him forget his country. He no ſooner knew that Xerxes deſigned to invade Greece, but he, ſecretly acquainted the Greeks with his reſolution, and on all occaſions ſpoke his ſentiments to the king with a noble freedom and dignity (52).

(52) Plutarch. in Apoph. Lacon. p. 220.

ſtill ſome hopes of their flight, waited four days, without undertaking any thing, on purpoſe to give them time to retreat. During this time he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to gain and corrupt Leonidas, promiſing to make him maſter of all Greece, if he would come over to his party. His offers being rejected by that public ſpirited prince with contempt and indignation, the king ordered him by a herald to deliver up his arms. Leonidas, in a ſtile and with a ſpirit truly Laconical, anſwered him in a few words; Come thy ſelf and take them [h]. Xerxes at this anſwer, tranſported with rage, commanded the Medes and Ciſſians to march againſt them, take them all alive, and bring them in fetters to him. The Medes, not able to ſtand the ſhock of the brave Greeks, ſoon betook themſelves to flight, and ſhewed, as our author obſerves, that Xerxes had many men but few ſoldiers. In their room Hydarnes was ordered to advance with that body which was called immortal, and conſiſted of ten thouſand choſen men. But when they came to cloſe with the Greeks, they ſucceeded no better than the Medes and Ciſſians, being obliged to retire with great ſlaughter. The next day, the Perſians, reflecting on the ſmall number of their enemies, and ſuppoſing ſo many of them to be wounded that they could not poſſibly maintain a ſecond fight, reſolved to make another attempt, but could not by any efforts make the Greeks give way; on the contrary, they were themſelves put to a ſhameful flight. The valour of the Greeks exerted itſelf on this occaſion in ſuch an extraordinary manner, that Xerxes is ſaid to have three times leaped out of his throne, apprehending the entire deſtruction of his army [i].

Xerxes, having loſt all hopes of forcing his way thro' troops that were determined to conquer or die, was extremely perplexed and doubtful what meaſures he ſhould take in this poſture of affairs; when one Ephialtes a Melian, in expectation of a great reward, came to him, and diſcovered a ſecret paſſage to the top of the hill, which overlooked and commanded the Spartan forces. The king immediately ordered Hydarnes thither with his ſelect body of ten thouſand Perſians, who marching all night arrived at break of day, and poſſeſſed themſelves of that advantegious poſt. The Phocians, who defended this paſs, being over-powered by the enemies numbers, retired with precipitation precipitation to the very top of the mountain, prepared to die gallantly. But Hydarnes, neglecting to purſue them, marched down the mountain with all poſſible expedition, in order to attack thoſe who defended the ſtraits in the rear. Leonidas, being now appriſed, that it was impoſſible to bear up againſt the enemy, obliged the reſt of his allies to retire, but ſtayed himſelf with the Theſpians, Thebans, and three hundred Lacedæmonians, all reſolved to die with their leader, who, being told by the oracle, that either Sparta ſhould be deſtroyed or the king loſe his life, determined, without the leaſt heſitation, to ſacrifice himſelf for his country. The Thebans indeed remained againſt their inclination, being detained by Leonidas as hoſtages, for they were ſuſpected to favour the Perſians. The Theſpians with their leader Demophilus could not by any means be prevailed upon to abandon Leonidas and the Spartans. The augur Megiſtias, who had foretold the event of this enterpriſe, being preſſed by Leonidas to retire, ſent home his only ſon, but remained himſelf and died by Leonidas. Thoſe who ſtayed did not feed themſelves with any hopes of conquering or eſcaping, but looked upon Thermopylæ as their graves. And when Leonidas, exhorting them to take ſome nouriſhment, ſaid, that they ſhould all ſup together with Pluto, with one accord they ſet up a ſhout of joy, as if they had been invited to a banquet[k].

Xerxes, after pouring out a libation at the riſing of the ſun, began to move with the whole body of his army, as he had been adviſed by Ephialtes. Upon their approach, Leonidas advanced to the broadeſt part of the paſſage, and fell upon the enemy with ſuch undaunted courage and reſolution, that the Perſian officers were obliged to ſtand behind the diviſions they commanded, in order to prevent the flight of their men, who, not being able to ſtand ſo violent a ſhock, would, without that precaution, have immediately turned their backs. Great numbers of the enemies falling into the ſea were drowned, others were trampled under-feet by their own men, and a great many killed by the Greeks, who, knowing they could not avoid death, upon the arrival of thoſe who were advancing to fall upon the rear, exerted their utmoſt efforts. In this action fell the brave Leonidas, which Abrocomes and Hyparanthas, and two of the brothers of Xerxes obſerving, serving, advanced with great resolution to seize his body and carry it in triumph to Xerxes. But the Lacedæmonians, more eager to defend it than their own lives, repulsed the enemy four times, killed both the brothers of Xerxes with many other commanders of distinction, and rescued the body of their beloved general out of the enemies hands. But in the mean time, the army, that was led by the treacherous Ephialtes, advancing to attack their rear, they retired to the narrowest place of the passage, and drawing all together, except the Thebans, posted themselves on a rising ground. In this place they made head against the Persians, who poured in upon them on all sides, till at length not vanquished, but oppressed and overwhelmed by numbers, they all fell, except one who escaped to Sparta, where he was treated as a coward and a traytor to his country, every one avoiding his company, and giving him the ignominious nick-name of Aristodemus the run-away (G); but

(G) Some say, as our author informs us (53), that Eurytus and Aristodemus, both Spartans, being obliged by a violent distemper in their eyes to retire to Alpeni, were there some time in suspence whether they should return to Sparta, or to Thermopylæ, and there die with the rest of their countrymen. At last Eurytus, hearing that the Persians had gained the top of the mountain, called for his armour, and ordered his servant to lead him into the field of battle (for he had almost quite lost his sight) where he was killed. But Aristodemus wanting courage staid at Alpeni, and after the battle returned safe to Sparta. Others say, that both Eurytus and Aristodemus had been dispatched somewhither with orders from the army, and that the latter might have been back before the fight, but delayed on purpose to avoid the danger, whereas his companion arrived in due time and died in the field. It is also said, that another of the three hundred Spartans, by name Pantites, survived this action and returned to Sparta. But not being able to bear the reproaches of the Spartans he laid violent hands on himself. As for the Thebans and their general Leontides, they were obliged for some time to fight against the Persians in conjunction with the other Greeks. But they no sooner saw the Persians descending the hill to attack them in the rear, but they abandoned the rest of their allies, aud approaching the Persians with their arms stretchd out, told them, that they had always favoured the Persians, that they had been the first among the Greeks to present them with earth and water, and that they were come to Thermopylæ against their will, and no ways guilty of the loss they had sustained.

(53) Herodot. ubi supra.

but not long after he made a glorious reparation of his fault in the battle of Platæa, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in an extraordinary manner. Thoſe who ſignalized themſelves moſt among the Lacedæmonians were Alpheus and Maron, both ſons of Oriſiphantus, among the Theſpians Dithyrambus, but above all Leonidas and Dieneces; Diences was a Spartan, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion above all his countrymen, the king excepted. When a Trachinian told him before the battle that the army of the Barbarians was ſo numerous, that with one flight of their arrows they would hide the ſun, he anſwered, without betraying the leaſt fear, that he was glad to hear it, becauſe he liked to fight in the ſhade. Xerxes enraged againſt Leonidas, to the laſt degree, for daring to oppoſe him, cauſed his head to be ſtruck off, and his body to be put upon a croſs, which barbarous treatment redounded more to his ignominy, than to the diſhonour of that great hero. Some time after a magnificent monument was erected at Thermopylæ in honour of theſe brave defenders of Greece, with two inſcriptions, the one general and relating to all thoſe who died on this occaſion, importing, that the Greeks of Peloponneſus to the number only of four thouſand made head againſt the Perſian army conſiſting of three millions: the other related to the Spartans in particular, and was compoſed by the poet Simonides to this purport: Go, paſſenger, and acquaint the Spartans, that we died here in obedience to their juſt commands. At thoſe tombs a funeral oration was yearly pronounced in honour of the dead heroes, and public games performed with great ſolemnity, wherein none but the Lacedæmonians and Theſpians had any ſhare, to ſhew that they alone were concerned in the glorious defence of Thermopylæ [1] (H).

ſuſtained. Thus the Thebans ſaved their lives, though the enemies killed many of them as they advanced to ſurrender themſelves. Many others were by command of Xerxes branded with the royal mark as ſlaves, and among theſe was Leontides their general (54).

(H) There was beſides theſe inſcriptions a third relating to the augur Megiſtias, expreſſed in theſe words: Under this ſtone lies divine Megiſtias ſlain by the Medes; with an undaunted heart he ſaw his fate approaching, and refuſed to live, when the Spartans had reſolved to die (55).

(54) Idem, ubi ſupra. (55) Idem, ibid. & ſeq.

XERXES on this occaſion loſt 20,000 men, and being ſenſible that ſo great a loſs was capable of alarming and diſcouraging his friends, he cauſed all thoſe that were killed, except a thouſand, whoſe bodies he left in the field, to be privately buried, and then proceeded in his march through Bœotia to Attica, where he arrived four months after he had paſſed the Helleſpont.

THE very ſame day, on which happened the glorious action at Thermopylæ, the two fleets engaged at Artemiſium a promontory of Eubœa. That of the Greeks conſiſted of 271 ſail; but the Perſian fleet was the more numerous, though they had loſt a few days before, in a violent ſtorm which continued four days, above 400 ſhips. Notwithſtanding this loſs they ſent 200 ſhips with orders to ſail round the iſland of Eubœa and encompaſs the Grecian fleet, that none of them might eſcape. The Greeks, having intelligence of this deſign, ſet ſail in the night-time in order to attack them by day-break. But having miſſed this ſquadron, they advanced to Aphætæ where the whole Perſian fleet lay, and after ſeveral encounters, in which the Athenians gained conſiderable advantages, they came to a general engagement, which was very obſtinate, and the ſucceſs pretty equal. However, the Greeks found it neceſſary, their ſhips having ſuffered a great deal, to retire to ſome ſafer place to refit, and accordingly ſteered their courſe to the ſtraits of Salamis, a ſmall iſland very near, and over-againſt, Attica. Though the engagement at Artemiſium did not bring matters to an abſolute deciſion, yet it contributed greatly to encourage the Athenians, who were now convinced, that the enemies, notwithſtanding their great number, were not invincible [m].

As Xerxes entered Attica, the Athenians, not being in a condition to make head againſt ſo powerful an army, were prevailed upon by Themiſtocles to put all the citizens on board the fleet, to ſecure their wives and children in Salamis, Ægina, and Trœzene, and to abandon the city of Athens, which they were no ways in a condition to defend. The Perſians, arriving in the neighbourhood of Athens, waſted the whole country, putting all to fire and ſword. A detachment was ſent to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphos, which was exceeding rich, by reaſon of the many offerings and donatives ſent thither from all parts of the eaſt. If we may believe what Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus culus relate of this matter, the Perſians no ſooner advanced near the temple of Minerva, but a violent ſtorm ariſing, accompanied with impetuous winds, thunder, and lightning, two great rocks rolled down from mount Parnaſſus, and cruſhed the greateſt part of that detachment. The main body of the army arriving at Athens found it deſerted by all its inhabitants, except a ſmall number of citizens, who literally interpreting Apollo's oracle, That Athens ſhould be ſaved by wooden walls, had fortified that place with boards and paliſadoes. They defended themſelves with incredible courage and reſolution, and at laſt, as they would hearken to no terms of accommodation whatſoever, were all cut in pieces. Xerxes burnt the city and all its temples down to the ground, and immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to Suſa, with the agreeble news of his ſucceſs, to his uncle Artabanus, in whoſe hands he had left the government during his abſence[n].

In the mean time, the Grecian fleet being reinforced by a great many ſhips, which joined them from ſeveral parts of Greece, to the number of 300 ſail, Eurybiades, commander in chief of the naval forces, ſummoned a council, in order to conſult about the meaſures that ſeemed moſt proper in the preſent ſtate of affairs. In this council a great debate aroſe among the commanders; ſome, and among theſe Eurybiades, were for retiring to the Iſthmus of Corinth, that they might be nearer the army, which guarded that paſſage under the command of Cleombrotus the brother of Leonidas. Others, at the head of whom was Themiſtocles who commanded the Athenian fleet, were for remaining at Salamis, the moſt advantageous place they could chuſe to engage the numerous fleet of the enemies. For in the ſtraits of Salamis the Perſians could not, by reaſon of the narrowneſs of the ſea, extend their line beyond that of the Greeks, and conſequently would be obliged to fight upon equal terms, without reaping any advantage from their numbers. After many warm diſputes, Eurybiades with all the other commanders, came over to the opinion of Themiſtocles, fearing that the Athenians, whoſe ſhips made up above one half of the fleet, would ſeparate from the allies, if they abandoned that poſt, as Themiſtocles in his ſpeech had inſinuated. It was therefore unanimouſly reſolved, that in the ſtraits of Salamis they ſhould wait for the Perſian fleet, and there engage them [o].

A council of war likewise was held on the side of the Persians, in order to determine whether they should hazard a naval engagement, or no. All the commanders were for engaging, because they knew this advice to be most agreeable to the king's inclinations. Queen Artemisia was the only person that opposed this resolution. She was queen of Halicarnassus, and followed Xerxes in this war with five ships, the best equipped of any in the fleet, except those of the Sidonians. This princess distinguished herself on all occasions by her singular courage, and still more by her prudence and conduct; for our author observes, that there was not one who gave Xerxes so good advice as this heroine. She represented, in the council of war we are speaking of, the dangerous consequences of engaging a people that were far more expert in maritime affairs than the Persians, alledging, that the loss of a battle at sea would be attended with the ruin of their army; whereas, by spinning out the war and advancing into the heart of Greece, they would create jealousies and divisions among their enemies, who would separate from one another, in order to defend each of them their own country, and that then the king might, almost without striking a blow, make himself master of Greece. This advice, though very prudent, was not followed, but an engagement unanimously resolved upon. Xerxes, in order to encourage his men with his presence, caused a throne to be erected on the top of an eminence, whence he might safely behold whatever happened, having several scribes about him to write down the names of such, as should signalize themselves against the enemies. The approach of the Persian fleet, with the news that a strong detachment from the army was marching against Cleombrotus who defended the Isthmus, struck such a terror into the Peloponesians, that they could not by any entreaties be prevailed upon to stay any longer at Salamis. Being therefore determined to put to sea and sail to the Isthmus, Themistocles privately dispatched a trusty friend to the Persian commanders, informing them of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their fleet round the island in order to prevent their escape. The same messenger assured Xerxes, that Themistocles, who had sent him that advice, designed to join the Persians, as soon as the battle began, with all the Athenian ships. The king, giving credit to all he said, immediately commanded a strong squadron to sail round the island in the night, in order to cut off the enemies flight. Early next morning, morning, as the Peloponnesians were preparing to set sail, they found themselves encompassed on all sides by the Persian fleet, and were against their will obliged to remain in the straits of Salamis, and expose themselves to the same dangers with their allies. The Grecian fleet consisted of 380 sail, that of the Persian of 2000 and upwards. Themistocles avoided the engagement, till a certain wind, which rose regularly every day at the same time, and was entirely contrary to the enemy, began to blow. As soon as he found himself favoured by this wind he gave the signal for battle. The Persians, knowing that they fought under their king's eye, advanced with great resolution, but the wind blowing directly in their faces, and the largeness and number of their ships embarassing them in a place so strait and narrow, their courage soon abated; which the Greeks observing used such efforts, that in a short time, breaking into the Persian fleet, they entirely disordered them, some flying towards Phalerus, where their army lay encamped, others saving themselves in the harbours of the neighbouring islands. The Ionians were the first that betook themselves to flight. But queen Artemisia distinguished herself above all the rest, her ships being the last that fled, which Xerxes observing cried out, that the men behaved like women, and the women with the courage and intrepidity of men. The Athenians were so incensed against her, that they offered a reward of ten thousand drachmas to any one that should take her alive; but she in spight of their efforts got clear of the ships that pursued her, and arrived safe on the coast of Asia. In this engagement, which was one of the most memorable actions we find recorded in history, the Grecians lost 40 ships, and the Persians 200, besides a great many more that were taken with all the men and ammunition they carried. Many of their allies, dreading the king's cruelty, made the best of their way to their respective countries. Xerxes, being under no small apprehension, lest the conquerors should sail to the Hellespont and there obstruct his return, left Mardonius in Greece with an army of 300,000 men, and marched with the rest towards Thrace, in order to cross the Hellespont. As no provisions had been prepared before-hand, his army underwent great hardships during the whole time of his march, which lasted five and forty days. The soldiers were obliged to live upon herbs, and even the bark and leaves of trees, which occasioned innumerable distempers, that swept off the greater part of them. The king, finding that his army was not in a condition to purſue the march ſo expeditiouſly as he deſired, advanced with a ſmall retinue, leaving the reſt behind; but when he arrived at the Helleſpont, he found the bridge broke down by the violence of the ſtorms, and was reduced to the neceſſity of croſſing over in a fiſhing-boat. From the Helleſpont he continued his flight to Sardis, where he took up his quarters for the enſuing year [p].

THE firſt thing the Athenians took care of after the battle was, to ſend the firſt-fruits of their victory to Delphos, where they enriched the temple with the ſpoils of thoſe who not long before had pillaged it. Their next thought was to reward thoſe who had ſignalized themſelves above the reſt. It was a cuſtom in Greece, that after an engagement the commanding officers ſhould declare, who, in their opinion, had moſt diſtinguiſhed themſelves during the conflict, by writing down the names of the perſon that deſerved the firſt, and of him who deſerved the ſecond prize. On this occaſion each captain, being ambitious of that honour, wrote down his own name in the firſt place, and in the ſecond the name of Themiſtocles, which plainly proved, that he deſerved the preference to all. And accordingly he was diſtinguiſhed with honours, which to that time had never been beſtowed upon any other, as we ſhall have occaſion to relate in the hiſtory of Greece [q].

ABOUT the ſame time that the actions of Thermopylæ and Salamis happened, the formidable army of the Carthaginians, conſiſting of 300,000 men, was entirely defeated by Gelo king of Syracuſe. We ſhall give a particular account of this victory in the hiſtory of the Carthaginians.

ON Xerxes's departure out of Greece, Mardonius, having paſſed the winter in Theſſaly and Macedonia, marched early in the ſpring into Bœotia. From thence he ſent Alexander king of Macedon with very advantageous offers to the people of Athens, in order to draw them off from the common alliance. The offers he made were, to rebuild at the king's charges their city, and whatever other edifices had been demoliſhed the year before in Attica; to ſuffer them to live according to their own laws; to reinſtate them in all their former poſſeſſions, and to add to them whatever other lands they ſhould deſire. Alexander, as being their antient friend, exhorted them in his own own name to lay hold on ſo favourable an opportunity of reſettling their affairs, repreſenting, that they were not in a condition to ſtand out againſt ſo powerful an enemy. But the Athenians could not by any means be prevailed upon to deſert the intereſt of Greece. Whereupon Mardonius marched with all his army into Attica, waſting and deſtroying whatever he found in his way. The Athenians, not being in a condition to withſtand ſuch a torrent, retired to Salamis, Ægina, and Træzene, and the ſecond time abandoned their city. Mardonius entered Athens, and demoliſhed whatever had eſcaped the fury of his forces the preceding year. In the mean time, the joint forces of Greece being drawn together on the iſthmus of Corinth, Mardonius thought fit to march back into Bœotia. For that being an open and level country was more fit for him to engage in than Attica, which was rough, craggy, full of hills and narrow paſſes. On his return into Bœotia, he encamped on the banks of the Aſopus. The Greeks followed him thither under the command of Pauſanias, protector of Pliſtarchus king of Sparta, and of Ariſtides, commander in chief of the Athenians. The Perſian army, according to the computation of Herodotus, conſiſted of 350,000, according to Diodorus of 500,000, men. That of the Grecians did not amount to the number of 110,000. Mardonius, in order to try the courage of the Greeks, ſent out his cavalry, in which the main ſtrength of his army conſiſted, to ſkirmiſh with the enemy. The Megarians, who were encamped on a plain ſuſtained the firſt onſet; but in ſpight of all their reſolution were forced to give way, being over-whelmed with the enemies arrows. As they were giving ground, a detachment of 300 Athenians, with a ſmall number of bow-men, advanced to their relief. Maſiſtius, general of the Perſian horſe, and one highly eſteemed in Perſia, ſeeing them advance in good order, commanded his cavalry to face about and attack them. The ſhock was very violent, both parties endeavouring to ſhew, by the iſſue of this encounter, what might be the ſucceſs of a general engagement. The victory was a long time doubtful, but at laſt, Maſiſtius being killed, the Perſians betook themſelves to flight. The death of Maſiſtius was greatly lamented by the Perſians, who, to ſhew their concern for the loſs of ſo brave a commander, cut off their hair, and likewiſe the manes of their horſes, filling the camp with loud cries and lamentations. After this encounter the two armies continued for the ſpace of ten days only looking at one another.

At last Mardonius, who was of a fiery temper, not being able to bear any further delays, and his provisions being almost consumed, called a council of war, in order to deliberate whether they should give battle, or retire till such time as they were supplied with fresh provisions. Artabazus, a nobleman of great distinction and experience, was of opinion, that they should not hazard a battle, but retire under the walls of Thebes, where they should be in a condition to lay in stores of provisions and forage. He alledged, that by delaying they might cast a damp upon the ardour of the enemies, and in the mean time by sending rich presents to their leaders prevail upon them to betray the common liberty without hazarding a battle. The Thebans were of the same opinion; but that of Mardonius, who was for engageing, prevailed, none of the other commanders daring to contradict him; and the result of their deliberations was, that they should give battle the next day. Alexander, king of Macedon, who in his heart favoured the Greeks, came secretly about midnight into their camp, and informed Aristides of all that had passed [r].

The Greek generals upon this notice ordered their officers to prepare for battle. Before they engaged, Pausanias, thought fit to change the order of battle, and place the Athenians, who were in the left wing, on the right, that they might stand opposite to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly conquered at Marathon, while he with his Spartans engaged the Thebans and other Greeks, who served in the Persian army, and had been often routed by the Spartans. But Mardonius, upon the intelligence he had of this new disposition, make the like change, which obliged the Greeks to return to their former stations; and the Persians likewise ranged their army according to their first disposition. Thus did all that day pass without any action. In the evening the Greeks held a council of war, in which it was resolved that they should decamp, and retire to some other place more conveniently situated for water. Night coming on, and the officers endeavouring, at the head of the bodies they commanded, to make what haste they could, to the new camp that was marked out for them, great confusion happened, some going one way, and some another, without observing any order in their march. At last they stopped near the little city of Platæa. Mardonius, being informed that the Greeks were retired by night, drew up his army in battle-array, and pursued them with with great ſhouts, as if he were not to fight, but to ſtrip and plunder a flying enemy. He did not fail on this occaſion to inſult Artabazus, reproaching him with his cowardly prudence, and the falſe notions he had conceived of the Lacedæmonians, who never fled, as he pretended, before the enemy. Having paſſed the Aſopus, he came up with the Lacedæmonians and Tegæans, who were ſeparated from the body of the army to the number of 53,000 men. Pauſanias, finding himſelf thus attacked by the whole Perſian army, diſpatched a meſſenger to acquaint the Athenians, who had taken another rout, with the danger he was in. The Athenians immediately put themſelves on their march to ſuccour their diſtreſſed allies, but were attacked, and to their great regret prevented, by thoſe Greeks who ſided with the Perſians. The battle being thus fought in two different places, the Spartans were the firſt who broke into the very center of the Perſian army, and after a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance put them to flight. Mardonius, mounted on a white horſe, ſignalized himſelf on this occaſion, and, at the head of 1000 choſen men, made a great ſlaughter of the enemies, but he falling, the whole Perſian army was eaſily routed, which thoſe Greeks who had engaged the Athenians hearing, retired with precipitation, leaving the Athenians maſters of the field. The Perſians fled to their former camp, which they had fortified with an incloſure of wood. The Lacedæmonians purſued them, but were not able to force the entrenchment, not being accuſtomed to beſiege towns or ſtorm fortified places. The Athenians, hearing that the Perſians were thus ſhut up in their camp, gave over purſuing the Greeks, and haſtened to the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians, whom they found buſied in forcing the enemies camp with more valour than ſkill. Wherefore they took upon themſelves that labour, and ſoon made a breach in the wall, through which entering together with the Lacedæmonians, they made ſuch a dreadful ſlaughter of the enemies, that of 300,000 ſcarce 3000 made their eſcape. Artabazus, who from Mardonius's imprudent conduct had but too well foreſeen the misfortune that befel them, after having diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the engagement, made a timely retreat with the 40,000 men he commanded, and being arrived ſafe at Byzantium, from thence paſſed over into Aſia. During the whole engagement, the Spartans loſt but 91 men, the Tegæans 16, and the Athenians 52. When they came to determine who had behaved with moſt courage, they all gave judgment in favour of Ariſtodemus, who was the only one that had ſaved himſelf at Thermopylæ, and had now wiped off the blemiſh of his former conduct by a moſt glorious death. The ſpoil was immenſe, conſiſting in vaſt ſums of money, in gold and ſilver cups, veſſels, tables, bracelets, rich beads, and all ſorts of furniture. They gave the tenth of all to Pauſanias, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very extraordinary manner, and the others were rewarded, each according to his merit. Thus was Greece delivered not only from the preſent, but all future invaſions of the Perſians, who hence-forward never more appeared on the ſide of the Helleſpont [s].

THE ſame day that this battle was fought at Platæa, the Grecian fleet gained as memorable a victory at Mycale, a promontory in Aſia, over the remainder of the Perſian navy. For at the ſame time that the land-forces of Greece rendezvouſed on the Iſthmus of Corinth, their fleet met at Ægina, under the command of Leotychides the other king of Sparta and Xantippus the Athenian. Thither embaſſadors came to their commanders from the Ionians, inviting them into Aſia, to deliver the Greek colonies from the Perſian yoke. On this invitation they immediately ſet ſail for Aſia, ſteering their courſe by Delos, where they were met by other embaſſadors from Samos, who brought them intelligence, that the Perſian fleet, which had wintered at Cuma, was then at Samos, where it might eaſily be deſtroyed, earneſtly entreating them at the ſame time not to neglect ſo favourable an opportunity. Hereupon they ſailed forthwith to Samos, but the Perſian fleet, receiving timely notice of their deſign, retired to Mycale, where the army lay encamped, conſiſting of 100,000 men, the remainder of thoſe Xerxes had brought back out of Greece the year before. Here they drew their ſhips aſhore, and threw up an entrenchment quite round, which they fortified with paliſadoes, being determined to ſuſtain a ſiege. The Greeks, arriving at Mycale, found all their enemies ſhips within the circumvallation, and a numerous army diſpoſed along the coaſt; but, however, did not meet with the leaſt oppoſition in landing their men, and drawing them up in battle-array; which when they had done, they attacked the enemy with ſuch vigour that they obliged them to fly to their intrenchments, and purſued them ſo cloſe that they entered the camp at the ſame time. When the

the enemy ſaw their intrenchments forced, all the auxiliaries betook themſelves to flight; but the Perſians, though reduced to a ſmall number, ſtill continued to diſpute the entrance of their camp againſt the Greeks pouring in on all ſides. But in the mean time the Lacedæmonians, who had taken a wider compaſs, arriving with other troops of the allies, the Perſians likewiſe abandoned their poſt, and ſaved themſelves by flying to the neighbouring hills. Before the engagement they had appointed the Mileſians to guard the narrow paſſages of the mountains, that they might have a ſafe retreat in caſe they were put to flight, and ſure guides to conduct them through the mountains, the Mileſians being well acquainted with the country. But they treacherouſly brought back by other ways to the enemy ſuch as fled to them; by which means a very ſmall number eſcaped the general ſlaughter of that day. The two Perſian generals, Mardontes and Tigranes, died in the field, with many other commanders of great diſtinction. The Greeks, having made a great ſlaughter of the enemies both in the field and in the purſuit, ſet fire to their ſhips, burnt the whole camp, and ſet ſail for Samos loaded with an immenſe booty conſiſting of 70 cheſts of money, beſides many other things of an ineſtimable value [t]. And thus ended all the great deſigns of Xerxes in a moſt miſerable diſappointment, a ſmall number of thoſe millions of men now remaining, with which the year before he marched ſo proudly over the Helleſpont.

The battle of Platæa was fought in the morning, and that of Mycale in the afternoon of the ſame day, and yet all the Greek writers pretend, that the victory at Platæa was known at Mycale before the engagement began there, though thoſe two places were parted by the whole Ægean, a ſea of ſeveral days ſail. But Diodorus Siculus [u] clears up this matter, telling us, that Leotychides, obſerving his troops to be in great pain for their countrymen at Platæa, leſt they ſhould be overpowered by the numerous army of Mardonius, in order to raiſe their ſpirits and courage, cauſed a report to be ſpread in the army, that the Perſians were defeated at Platæa, though at that time he knew nothing of the matter.

Xerxes, upon the news of theſe two overthrows, left Sardis with the ſame hurry and precipitation as he had left Athens after the battle of Salamis, making all the haſte he could towards Perſia, that he might get as far as poſſible out of the reach of the conquering enemy. But before he ſet out he gave orders, that all the temples of the Greek cities in Aſia ſhould be burnt and demoliſhed; and his orders were ſo far executed, that not one temple was left ſtanding, except that of Diana at Epheſus (I).

THE Grecian fleet after the battle of Mycale ſteered their courſe firſt to Samos, and thence to the Helleſpont, in order to poſſeſs themſelves of the bridges, which Xerxes had cauſed to be laid over thoſe ſtraits; but finding them broke by ſtorms, Leotychides with his Peloponneſian forces ſailed home. Xantippus with the Athenians and their allies, the Ionians remaining there, made himſelf maſter of Seſtus and the whole Thracian Cherſoneſus, where the army was enriched with an immenſe booty, which on the approach of the winter they carried home, every one returning then to their reſpective countries. Xantippus finding all the materials of the bridges at Cardia, whither they had been conveyed by order of Xerxes, carried them with him to Athens, where they were preſerved for many years, as a monument of the many victories which the Greeks obtained in this war. From this time the Ionian cities in Aſia, ſhaking off the Perſian yoke, recovered their antient liberty, and maintained it as long as that empire ſubſiſted.

THE Greeks, having ſettled their affairs at home, reſolved to purſue the war, and drive the Perſians out of all the Greek cities in Aſia and the neighbouring iſlands. With this view they equipped a powerful fleet, which ſailing to Cyprus, under the command of Pauſanias and Ariſtides, drove the Perſians out of that iſland, and reſtored the inhabitants to their antient liberty [w].

(I) He was prompted to this, not by any particular diſpleaſure againſt the Aſiatic Greeks, but by the inſtitutions of the Mages, in whoſe religion he had been thoroughly inſtructed by Zoroaſtres. For that religion expreſſing a great deteſtation of worſhipping God by images, its zealots were for deſtroying all idolatrous temples where-ever they came. And to keep Xerxes ſteady in their party, not only ſeveral of the chief doctors of the Mages, but Oſtanes himſelf, who was then at the head of the whole ſect, attended him during the whole time of his expedition (56). At their inſtigation, Tully informs us (57), that all thoſe temples were deſtroyed.

WHILE Xerxes reſided at Sardis, he conceived a violent paſſion for the wife of his brother Maſiſtes, a prince of extraordinary merit, and who had ſerved the king with great zeal and fidelity. As ſhe was a woman of great virtue, and had a ſingular value for her huſband, ſhe could by no ſollicitations be prevailed upon to defile his bed. However, the king, ſtill flattering himſelf that by heaping favours upon her he might at laſt conquer her virtue, married his eldeſt ſon Darius, whom he appointed his ſucceſſor to the crown, to Artaynta this princeſs's daughter. As this was the greateſt favour he could beſtow on the mother, he expected it would engage her to comply with his deſires. But Xerxes, finding her virtue proof againſt all temptations, changed his inclinations for the mother, and fell paſſionately in love with the daughter, who was now the wife of his own ſon, and did not follow the glorious example of her mother's firmneſs and virtue. While this intrigue was carrying on, Hameſtris, wife to Xerxes, having wrought a very rich and curious mantle, preſented it to the king, which he, being wonderfully pleaſed with it, put on when he firſt viſited his miſtreſs. In the converſation he had with her he deſired her to aſk whatever favour ſhe pleaſed, binding himſelf by an oath to deny her nothing. Hereupon Artaynta deſired him to give her the mantle. Xerxes, foreſeeing the bad conſequences that would neceſſarily enſue from his complying with her requeſt, did all that lay in his power to diſſuade her from inſiſting upon her firſt demand. He offered her immenſe treaſures, with cities and an army to be ſolely at her diſpoſal, which was one of the greateſt preſents that the Perſian kings could make. But not being able to prevail upon her, and thinking himſelf bound by his imprudent promiſe and raſh oath, he yielded to her demand, and gave her the mantle, which ſhe immediately put on, and publickly wore, as a trophy of her power over the king's affections. Hameſtris, being now confirmed in the ſuſpicion ſhe had entertained, was incenſed to the higheſt degree; but, inſtead of venting her rage againſt the daughter who alone was faulty, reſolved to be revenged on the mother, whom ſhe looked upon as the author of the whole intrigue, though ſhe was no ways privy to it. For the better executing of her deſign ſhe waited the great feſtival, which was annually celebrated on the king's birth-day; on which occaſion the king, according to the eſtabliſhed cuſtom of the country, uſed to grant his queen whatever ſhe demanded. This day being come, she asked, that the wife of his brother Masistes might be delivered into her hands. Xerxes, who apprehended the queen's design, was struck with horror at this demand, both out of regard to his brother, and because he knew that his wife was quite innocent, and therefore at first withstood her request. But being at last overcome by her importunity, he consented with the utmost reluctancy to her requst, and ordering his guards to seize the innocent princess, delivered her into the hands of the revengeful and enraged Hamestris, impowering her to treat her as she pleased. In consequence of this power, Hamestris caused her breasts, tongue, nose, ears, and lips to be cut off and thrown to the dogs before her face, and then sent her home in that miserable condition to her husband. In the mean time, Xerxes had sent for his brother to prepare him for this melancholy and tragical adventure. He first told him that he must part with his wife, and that he designed to supply her place with one of his own daughters. But Masistes, who was passionately fond of his wife, could not be induced by any offers whatsoever to divorce her. Whereupon Xerxes in great wrath told him, that since he refused his daughter, he should neither have her nor his own wife, and with this inhuman reply dismissed him. Masistes, from this speech apprehending some great misfortune, made all the haste he could home to see what had passed during his absence. On his arrival he found his wife in that deplorable condition we have described, and being exasperated to the highest degree, as the case deserved, he immediately assembled all his family, servants, and dependants, and set out with all possible expedition for the province of Bactriana, of which he was governor, determined, as soon as he arrived there, to induce the Bactrians torevolt and revenge such a barbarous usage in the severest manner. But Xerxes, hearing of his sudden departure, and suspecting from thence his design, sent a party of horse after him, who overtaking him cut him in pieces, with his wife, children, and all his retinue. There is another action no less cruel and impious related of Hamestris. She caused fourteen children of the best families in Persia to be buried alive, as a sacrifice to the infernal gods.

Upon the death of Masistes Xerxes appointed Hystaspes his second son to be governor of Bactria, which obliging him to live at a distance from court, gave his younger brother brother Artaxarexes an opportunity of mounting the throne before him, as will be seen in its proper place [x].

XERXES, being wholly discouraged by a continual series of so many losses and defeats, gave over all thoughts of war and conquests, and never afterwards suffered his ships to appear in the Ægean sea, or his forces on the coasts. He gave himself entirely up to luxury and ease, minding nothing but the gratifying of his lusts and vicious inclinations. This dissolute manner of life drew upon him the contempt and hatred of his subjects, which encouraged Artabanus, a native of Hyrcania, captain of his guards, and who had long been his chief favourite, to conspire against him. He prevailed upon Mithridates, one of the eunuchs of the palace to engage in the conspiracy, and being by him let into the king's bed-chamber, murdered him in the 21st year of his reign while he was asleep. He then went to Artaxerexes the king's third son, and charged Darius his elder brother with the murder, as though an eager desire of ascending the throne had prompted him to that execrable crime. He told him at the same time, that he designed to cut him off next, in order to secure the crown to himself, and therefore he ought to guard himself against all dangers. Artaxerxes, being then a very young man, rashly believed whatever Artabanus told him, and without further examination went immediately to his brother's apartment, and there, being assisted by Artabanus and his guards, murdered him. The next heir was Hystaspes the second son of Xerxes, but, as he was then in Bactriana, of which province he was governor, Artabanus placed Artaxarexes on the throne; but with a design to let him enjoy the sovereignty only till such time, as he had formed a party strong enough to drive him from it, and seized it himself. His great authority had gained him many dependents, and besides he had seven sons, who were all of robust bodies, couragious, and raised to the highest dignities of the empire. His confidence in these inspired him with this design, but while he was hastening to put it in execution, Artaxerxes being informed of the whole plot by Megabyzus, who had married one of his sisters, was before-hand with him in a counter-plot, and killed him before his treason was ripe for execution. His death secured cured to Artaxarexes the possession of the kingdom [z] (K). He is said to have been the handsomest man of the age he lived in, and a prince of a very mild and generous disposition. He is called, or rather nick-named, by the Greeks Macrocheir, that is long-handed, by reason of the more than ordinary length of his hands (L); but in scripture he bears the name of Ahasuerus as well as that of Artaxerxes, and is the same who had Esther for his queen (M).

(K) Whether Artabanus possessed himself of the throne, and held it seven months, as some authors affirm, or was killed by Artaxerxes before he accomplished his design, is no easy matter to determine with any certainty. The seven first months of the reign of Artaxerxes are by Eusebius (58) assigned to Artabanus, perhaps because he ruled so long in his name.

(L) Strabo (59) tells us, that he was so called because his hands were so long, that when he stood upright he could touch his knees with them; but, according to Plutarch (60), he had that name because his right hand was longer than his left. He is named by the Latins Longimanus, which answers the Greek Μακροχειρ.

(M) Some are of opinion, that Darius Hystaspis was the king Ahasuerus who married Esther, and that Atossa was the Vashti, and Artystona the Esther of Scripture (61). But this opinion is quite inconsistent with what we read of these persons in prophane history. For Herodotus tells us (62), that Artystona was the daughter of Cyrus, and therefore she could not be Esther; and that Atossa had four sons by Darius, all born after he ascended the throne (63) and therefore she could not be that queen Vashti, whom the king divorced in the third year of his reign (64), nor he that king Ahasuerus. Besides, Atossa had such an ascendant over the king, that he was influenced by her on his deathbed to disinherit his elder sons by a former wife, and settle the crown on Xerxes her son; whereas the Ahasuerus of scripture divorced Vashti by an unalterable decree, and therefore could never admit her again to his bed (65). What induced the learned primate of Ireland to be of this opinion was, that Ahasuerus in the book of Esther (66) is said to have laid a tribute on the land and on the isles, and the same is said of Darius Hystaspis by Herodotus (67); but this Strabo ascribes to Darius Longimanus

Artaxerxes Longimanus

HAVING by the death of Artabanus removed one dangerous competitor, he had ſtill two great obſtacles in his way, viz. his brother Hyſtaſpes in Bactria, and the party of Artabanus at home, which gave him the firſt trouble. Artabanus, as we have hinted above, had ſeven ſons and many partiſans, who immediately gathered together to revenge his death. Whereupon a bloody conflict enſued, in which many Perſians of diſtinction gimanus (68), as we read in the printed copies; and the ſirname of Longimanus, with the deſcription of the perſon in that place, plainly ſhews, that Darius was there by miſtake of the tranſcribers put inſtead of Artaxerxes, ſeeing no Darius ever bore that name, and what is ſaid there of Darius is applicable to none but Artaxerxes.

Scaliger is of opinion (69), that Xerxes was the Ahaſuerus, and his queen Hameſtris the Eſther of ſcripture, induced thereunto by the ſimilitude he finds between Hameſtris and Eſther. But the diſſimilitude of their characters is a far ſtronger proof that Hameſtris could not be Eſther, as muſt appear from what we have already related of queen Hameſtris, and ſhall have occaſion to add in the ſequel of this hiſtory. A woman of ſo vile a character cannot have been that queen of Perſia, who by the name of Eſther is ſo renowned in holy writ, and is celebrated there as the inſtrument, by whom God was pleaſed in ſo ſignal a manner to deliver his people from that utter deſtruction which was deſigned againſt them. Beſides, we are told by Herodotus (70), that Xerxes had a ſon by Hameſtris, who was marriageable in the ſeventh year of his reign, and Eſther was not till that time married to Ahaſuerus (71).

There being no ſuch objections as to Artaxerxes Longimanus, he muſt, in our opinion, have been the Ahaſuerus who married Eſther. This we find confirmed by the Septuagint, by the apocryphal additions to the book of Eſther, and by Joſephus. The Septuagint throughout the whole book of Eſther tranſlate Ahaſuerus by Artaxerxes. The apocryphal additions to that book conſtantly call Eſther's huſband Artaxerxes, and from ſeveral circumſtances related of him, both in the canonical and aprocryphal Eſther, it is very plain, that this Artaxerxes could not be Artaxerxes Mnemon. Joſephus (72) tells us in expreſs terms, that Eſther's huſband was Artaxerxes Longimanus. Severus Sulpitius and many others, both ancient and modern writers, fall in with Joſephus. The extraordinary favour and kindneſs which Artaxerxes Longimanus ſhewed the Jews, beyond all other kings that reigned in Perſia, is a convincing proof, that they had ſuch a powerful advocate as Eſther to intercede for them.

ction fell on both ſides. But at length Artaxerxes, having prevailed, put to death all thoſe who were privy to the plot. Thoſe eſpecially, who had any hand in the murder of his father, were puniſhed in a moſt ſevere and exemplary manner. The eunuch Mithridates, who betrayed him, was boated, a puniſhment which was in uſe among the Perſians, and we have already deſcribed, where we gave an account of the manners of that nation. Artaxerxes, having thus cruſhed the faction of Artabanus at home, was in a condition to ſend an army into Bactria, which had declared in favour of his brother. But here he was not attended with the like ſucceſs; for the two armies engaging, Hyſtaſpes ſtood his ground, and though he did carry the day, he ſuſtained no conſiderable loſs, both parties retiring with equal ſucceſs to prepare for a ſecond encounter. The next year, Artaxerxes drawing together a far more powerful army, as having thegreater part of the empire at his devotion, overpowered Hyſtaſpes, and by a complete victory ſecured to himſelf the quiet poſſeſſion of the empire. To prevent all further diſturbances, he removed ſuch governors of cities and provinces as he ſuſpected to be affected to either of the factions he had overcome, putting others in their room whom he could ſafely truſt. He afterwards applied himſelf to the reforming of many abuſes and diſorders that had crept into the government; whereby he gained great reputation, and won the hearts of his ſubjects throughout all the provinces of the empire[a]. Artaxerxes, being now ſettled in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the whole Perſian empire, appointed rejoicings and feaſts to be made for the ſpace of 180 days in the city of Suſa, on the concluſion of which he gave a great entertainment to all the princes and people that were then in that city, which laſted ſeven days. Vaſhti the queen at the ſame time made a like feaſt in her apartment for the women; and here the hiſtory of Hadaſſah or Eſther, for which we refer the reader to that book, takes place.

The Egyptians revolt. Year of the flood 2540. Before Chriſt 459.

In the fifth year of Artaxerxes's reign, the Egyptians revolted, and, making Inarus, prince of the Lybians, their king, called in the Athenians to their aſſiſtance, who, having at that time a fleet of 200 ſhips lying off the iſland of Cyprus, laid hold of that invitation, looking upon it as a very favourable opportunity of weakening the Perſian power by driving them from ſo rich a kingdom. Upon the news of this revolt, Artaxerxes, having raiſed an army of 300,000

300,000 men, was resolved to march himself against the rebels. But being dissuaded from venturing his person, he gave the command of all the land-forces to Achæmenides, one of his brothers (N), who, arriving in Egypt at the head of his numerous army, encamped on the banks of the Nile. In the mean time, the Athenians, having defeated the Persian fleet, and either sunk or taken fifty of their ships, sailed up the Nile, and landing their forces, under the command of Charitimis their general, joined Inarus and the Egyptians. They afterwards attacked with joint forces Achæmenides, routed his army, and killed 100,000 of his men with the general himself. The remainder fled to Memphis, whither the conquerors pursuing them took two parts of the town; but the Persians securing themselves in the third called the White-wall, which was by much the best fortified part of the city, there suffered a siege of three years, during which time they made a most vigorous defence, till they were succoured by the forces that were sent to their relief[b].

Artaxerxes, hearing of the defeat of his army in Egypt, and how much the Athenians had contributed to it, sent embassadors to the Lacedæmonians, with large sums of money, in order to engage them to make war upon the Athenians, and by that means oblige them to recal their troops to the defence of their own country. But the Lacedæmonians rejecting his offers, he resolved to make a diversion by sending Themistocles, (who had taken shelter in the Persian court, whither the envy of his enemies at home had driven him, as we shall relate in the history of Greece) at the head of a powerful army to invade Attica. But that great commander, not knowing how to decline the command of a prince, who had heaped so many favours upon him, and on the other hand being unwilling to make war

(N) Herodotus (70) and Diodorus Siculus (74) confound Achæmenides, brother to Artaxerxes, with Achæmenes, brother to Xerxes and uncle of Artaxerxes, telling us, that the management of this war was committed to Achæmenes, who in the beginning of the reign of Xerxes was governor of Egypt. But they were certainly misled by the similitude of names, for Ctesias tells us, that Artaxerxes gave the command of the troops to the son of Hamestris, who could not be Achæmenes.

war upon his own country, resolved to put an end to his life. And according, having invited all his friends to a banquet, and sacrificed a bull, he drank a large draught of the blood, and soon after died[c]. Upon his death Artaxerxes ordered Artabazus, governour of Cilicia, and Megabyzus, governour of Syria, to raise an army for the relief of those who were besieged in the White-wall. These generals soon drew together 300,000 men, but were obliged to wait till the fleet was equipped in order to transport them into Egypt, which could not be got ready till the ensuing year. Inarus, hearing of the formidable preparations that were making by these Persian governours to relieve the besieged, redoubled his attacks on the White-wall, and made his utmost efforts to carry it; but the Persians within defended themselves with such bravery, that the Egyptians and Athenians made no considerable progress towards the reduction of the place[d].

In the third year of the siege, and ninth of Artaxerxes, the Persian fleet being equipped, Artabazus took the command of it, and set sail towards the Nile, while Megabyzus, at the head of the land-forces, marched to Memphis. On his arrival he not only obliged Inarus and his auxiliaries to raise the siege of the White-wall, but in a pitched battle entirely defeated them with great slaughter of the Egyptians, who suffered most in this engagement. After this defeat Inarus, though wounded in the thigh by Megabyzus, retired with the Athenians and such of the Egyptians as were willing to follow him to the city of Biblos in the island of Prosopotis, which being surrounded by the navigable branches of the Nile, the Athenians stationed their fleet in one of them, and held out a siege of a year and a half. In the mean time, the rest of the Egyptians submitted to the conqueror, and returned to their obedience, Amyrtœus alone maintaining a party against him in the fens, where he ruled many years, the Persians not being able to reduce him by reason of the inaccessibleness of the place. Inarus and his auxiliaries in the island of Prosopotis defended themselves with such vigor, that the Persians, despairing to reduce them by the ordinary methods of war, had recourse to an extraordinary expedient, whereby they soon accomplished their design. They quite drained, by cutting many canals, that arm of the Nile, where the Athenian fleet lay, and by that means means opened a paſſage for the whole army to enter the iſland. Inarus, ſeeing all was now loſt, delivered up himſelf, the Egyptians, and about 50 Athenians to Megabyzus, on condition their lives ſhould be ſpared. But the reſt of the Athenians, to the number of 6000, refuſed to ſurrender, and, having ſet fire to their fleet, drew up in battle-array, reſolved to die ſword in hand, and ſell their lives at the deareſt rate, in imitation of the Lacedæmonians that fell at Thermopylæ. The Perſians, perceiving they had taken this deſperate reſolution, did not think it adviſeable to attack them; but rather to offer them reaſonable terms, and come to a compoſition. The terms were that they ſhould leave Egypt, and have a free paſſage home by ſea or land. They accepted the conditions, delivered up the iſland with the city of Biblos to the conquerors, and marched to Cyrene, where they embarked for Greece; but moſt of them periſhed before they reached their native country. Neither was this the only loſs the Athenians ſuſtained on this occaſion. Another fleet of 50 ſail, being ſent by them to relieve thoſe who were beſieged in the iſland of Proſopotis, arrived at one of the mouths of the Nile ſoon after their countrymen had ſurrendered, and having entered the river without knowing what had happened, were at the ſame time attacked by the Perſian fleet, and galled with ſuch ſhowers of darts and arrows by the land-forces from the ſhore, that they were all killed, except ſome few who broke through the enemy's fleet and eſcaped. Thus ended the fatal war, which the Athenians had carried on for the ſpace of ſix years in Egypt, and that kingdom was anew united to the Perſian empire, and continued ſo during the remaining part of the reign of Artaxerxes. Inarus and the other priſoners taken in this war were ſent to Suſa, and Sartamas appointed governor of Egypt[e].

Year of the flood 2546. Before Chriſt 453.

THE Athenians having equipped another fleet of 200 ſail gave the command of it to Cimon, enjoining him to drive the Perſians from the iſland of Cyprus. Cimon in purſuance to his orders took Citium, Malum, and ſeveral other cities of that Iſland, and from thence ſent 60 ſail to the aſſiſtance of Amyrtœus in the fens of Egypt. Artabazus being then in thoſe ſeas with a fleet of 300 ſhips, Cimon

Cimon, aſſoon as his ſquadron returned from Egypt, fell upon him, took 100 of his ſhips, deſtroyed many others, and purſued the remainder to the coaſts of Phœnicia. Being fluſhed with this ſucceſs, on his return landing his men in Cilicia, where he found Megabyzus with an army of 300,000 men, he marched againſt him, and having put him to flight with a great ſlaughter of his men, returned to Cyprus with a double triumph[f].

ARTAXERXES, tired with a war in which he had ſuſtained ſo great loſſes, reſolved with the advice of his counſellors and miniſters, to put an end to ſo many calamities, by coming to an accommodation with the enemy. Accordingly he ſent orders to his generals, who were charged with the management of the Cyprian war, to conclude a peace with the Athenians on the beſt terms they could. Hereupon Megabyzus and Artabazus ſent embaſſadors to Athens to propoſe an accommodation, which was agreed upon by the deputies of both ſides on the following terms. 1. That all the Greek cities of Aſia ſhould be made free, and allowed to live according to their own laws. 2. That no Perſian ſhips of war ſhould enter thoſe ſeas that lie between the Cyanean and the Chelidonian iſlands, that is, from the Euxine ſea to the coaſts of Pamphylia. 3. That no Perſian general ſhould come by land within three days march of thoſe ſeas. 4. That the Athenians ſhould not commit any hoſtilities in the territories of the king of Perſia. Theſe articles being ſworn to by both parties, peace was proclaimed. Thus ended this war, which had laſted from the burning of Sardis by the Athenians fifty one years complete, and deſtroyed numberleſs multitudes both of Greeks and Perſians[g].

ARTAXERXES being continually importuned by his mother, for five years together, to deliver to her Inarus and the Athenians who had been taken with him in Egypt, that ſhe might ſacrifice them to the manes of her ſon Achæmenes, yielded at laſt to her unwearied ſolicitations. Whereupon this inhuman princeſs, without any regard to the conditions which had been with the greateſt ſolemnity ratified, cauſed Inarus to be crucified, and the heads of all the reſt to be ſtruck off. Megabyzus, who had engaged his word that their lives ſhould be ſpared, looked upon this as a diſhonour done him, and therefore retiring to Syria, of which province he was governor, raiſed there an army and openly openly revolted. The king immediately ſent Oſiris, one of the chief lords of the court, with an army of 200,000 men to ſuppreſs this rebellion. But Megabyzus in a general engagement wounded him, took him priſoner, and put his numerous army to flight. Artaxerxes hearing that his general was taken ſent a meſſenger to demand him, and Megabyzus generouſly releaſed him, aſſoon as his wounds were cured [h].

THE next year, Artaxerxes ſent another army againſt him under the command of Menoſtanes, ſon to Artarius the king's brother, and governor of Babylon. This general was attended with no better ſucceſs than the other; for he was in the ſame manner defeated and put to flight, leaving Megabyzus maſter of the field and all the baggage. The king, being ſenſible that he could not get the better of him by dint of arms, ſent his brother Artarius and his ſiſter Amytis, who was wife to Megabyzus, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, to perſwade him to return to his duty. By their mediation the difference being made up, the king granted him his pardon, and he returned to court. But not long after, a lion being ready to fall upon the king as he was hunting, Megabyzus, fired with zeal and affection for his ſovereign, threw a dart at the lion and killed him. But the king ſtill retaining ill-will againſt him, upon pretence that he had affronted him in ſhooting firſt at the lion, commanded his head to be ſtruck off; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty, that Amytis his ſiſter and Hameſtris his mother prevailed upon him to change the ſentence of death into that of perpetual baniſhment. Megabyzus was therefore ſent to Cyrta a city ſtanding on the Red Sea, and ſentenced to lead the reſt of his life there under confinement. However, five years after he made his eſcape from thence, and under diſguiſe got ſafe to his own houſe at Suſa, where by the interceſſion of his wife and mother-in-law, he was reinſtated in the king's favour, and enjoyed it till his death, which happened ſome years after in the 76th year of his age. He was greatly lamented by the king and the whole court, being the beſt counſellor and greateſt general of the whole empire. To him Artaxerxes owed both his life and his crown at his firſt acceſſion to the government. But it is of dangerous conſequence in a ſubject to have too much obliged his ſovereign; for this was the true ſource of all the misfortunes that befel Megabyzus [i]. IN [i] Ctes. 37—39.

In the 34th year of the reign of Artaxerxes a war breaking out between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, commonly called the Peloponnesian war, both parties sent embassadors to the king imploring his assistance [k]. But we do not find, that Artaxerxes returned them any answer before the seventh year of that war, when he sent an embassador to the Lacedæmonians named Artaphernes with a letter written in the Assyrian tongue, wherein he told them, that several embassadors had come to him from them, but the purports of their embassies differed so widely, that he could not comprehend what they requested, and that therefore he had thought proper to send them a Persian to let them know, that if they had any proposals to make they should send a trusty person along with him, by whom he might be informed what they desired him to do. This embassador arriving at Eion on the river Strymon in Thrace, was there taken prisoner by one of the admirals of the Athenian fleet, who sent him to Athens, where he was treated with the utmost civility and respect, the Athenians being extremely desirous to regain the favour of the king his master [l]. The year following, as soon as the season allowed the Athenians to put to sea, they sent back the embassador in one of their own ships at the expence of the public, and appointed some of their citizens to attend him to the court of Persia with the character of embassadors. But when they landed at Ephesus, they there received news of the king's death; whereupon the Athenians, not thinking it advisеable to proceed farther, took their leave of Artaphernes and returned to Athens [m].

Artaxerxes favoured the Jews above all the kings of Persia, but what happened to them during his reign we shall relate in the history of that people as in a more proper place. This prince died in the 41st year of his reign, and was succeeded by Xerxes the only son he had by his queen. But by his concubines he had seventeen, among whom were Sogdianus, or, as Ctesias calls him, Secundianus, Ochus, and Arsites. Xerxes having drunk immoderately at a great entertainment retired to his bed-chamber, to refresh himself with sleep after his debauch. This opportunity Sogdianus laid hold of, and, being let into the bed-chamber by Pharnacyas one of Xerxes's eunuchs, slew him,

Sogdianus. SCARCE was Sogdianus ſeated on the throne, when he put to death Bagorazus, the moſt faithful of all his father's eunuchs. He had been appointed to ſuperintend the interment of Artaxerxes and of the queen, Xerxes's mother, who had died the ſame day as her royal conſort. After he had conveyed both their bodies to the burial-place of the Perſian kings, he found on his return Sogdianus in poſſeſſion of the crown, with whom he had formerly had ſome ſmall difference. This Sogdianus remembered, and, taking for a pretence to quarrel with him ſomething relating to the obſequies of his father, cauſed him to be ſtoned to death. By theſe two murders he became very odious both to the nobility and the army, and being jealous leſt ſome of his brothers might treat him as he treated Xerxes, he ſent for Ochus, whom he chiefly ſuſpected, with a deſign to murder him the moment he arrived. Ochus had been by his father appointed governor of Hyrcania, and being well appriſed of his brother's deſign, under ſeveral pretences put off his coming to court, till he had drawn together a powerful army, with which he advanced to the confines of Perſia, openly declaring, that he deſigned to revenge the death of his brother. This declaration brought over to him many of the nobility and ſeveral governors of provinces, who, being highly diſſatisfied with the cruelty and ill-conduct of Sogdianus, put the tiara on Ochus's head, and proclaimed him king. Sogdianus, ſeeing himſelf thus deſerted, contrary to the advice of his beſt friends, came to an accommodation with Ochus, who having him in his power cauſed him to be thrown into aſhes (O), where he died a cruel death [o].

[o] Ctes. ubi ſupra. Diodor. l. xii. p. 322.

(O) This puniſhment was invented for him, and became afterwards common in Perſia. Ochus had ſwore, that Sogdianus ſhould not die by the ſword, by poiſon, or of hunger. To keep his word he contrived this new ſort of puniſhment; it is deſcribed in the 13th chapter of the ſecond book of the Maccabees, thus: An high tower was filled to a certain height with aſhes, and the criminal being thrown headlong into them, they were by Ochus. Ochus, being ſettled on the throne by the death of Sogdianus, changed his name, taking that of Darius inſtead of Ochus, and is by hiſtorians commonly called Darius Nothus, or Darius the Baſtard (P).

Year of the flood 2575. Before Chriſt 424. Arsites, ſeeing in what manner Sogdianus had ſupplanted Xerxes, and had been afterwards driven from the throne by Ochus, began to entertain thoughts of treating Ochus in the ſame manner. With this deſign, though he was his brother by the ſame father and mother, he broke out into an open rebellion againſt him, being encouraged thereunto and aſſiſted by Artyphius the ſon of Megabyzus. Ochus, whom henceforth we ſhall call Darius, ſent Artaſyrus one of his generals againſt Artyphius, while he marched in perſon againſt his brother Arſites. Artyphius, with the aſſiſtance of his Greek mercenaries, twice defeated the general who had been ſent againſt him. But, theſe being gained over with large bribes, he loſt the third battle; and being reduced to great ſtraits ſurrendered himſelf to Darius, upon hopes given him of mercy. The king was for putting him to death immediately, but was diverted from it by Paryſatis his wife and ſiſter. She was daughter to Artaxerxes by another mother, an intriguing and crafty woman; and by her advice the king was entirely governed in affairs of the greateſt importance. The counſel ſhe gave him on this occaſion was, to treat Artyphius with great clemency, that, by ſuch uſage of a rebellious ſervant, he might the better encourage his brother to throw himſelf upon his mercy, and then diſpoſe of them both as he pleaſed. Darius followed her counſel, and had the ſucceſs he propoſed. For Arſites, being informed of the gentle uſage Artyphius had met with, concluded, that he, as a by a wheel perpetually turned round him till he was ſuffocated. Thus this wicked prince loſt his life and his empire, after he had reigned ſix months and fifteen days (75).

(P) He is placed in Ptolemy's canon as the immediate ſucceſſor of Artaxerxes Longimanus according to the ſtile of that canon, which conſtantly aſcribes to the predeceſſor the whole year in which he dies, and places him as the next ſucceſſor who was on the throne in the beginning of the enſuing year. As the reign of Xerxes and Sogdianus made up but eight months, and theſe did not reach to the end of the year in which Artaxerxes died, they are in the canon caſt into the laſt year of Artaxerxes, and Darius is placed next him, as if he had been his immediate ſucceſſor.

a brother, ſhould be treated at leaſt with the ſame indulgence and good-nature. Flattered with this hope he came to an agreement with the king, and ſurrendered himſelf into his hands. Darius, having him in his power, was very much inclined to pardon him, but was prevailed upon by Paryſatis to put both him and Artyphius to death by ſuffocating them in aſhes [p].

He alſo put to death Pharnacyas for being concerned in the murder of Xerxes; and Monaſthenes, another eunuch, who was the chief favourite of Sogdianus, was condemned to die a cruel death, which he prevented by laying violent hands on himſelf. Theſe executions did not procure him the tranquillity he expected; for his whole reign was diſturbed with violent commotions, raiſed in various parts of the empire. One of the moſt dangerous was that which was ſtirred up by Piſuthnes governor of Lydia, who ſetting up for himſelf raiſed an army of Greek mercenaries, under the command of Lycon an Athenian. Againſt him Darius ſent Tiſſaphernes, appointing him at the ſame time governor of Lydia in his room. Tiſſaphernes, who was an artful and crafty man, found means of gaining the Greeks who ſerved under Piſuthnes, and inducing both them and their general to change ſides. Whereupon Piſuthnes, not being in a condition to carry on the war, ſurrendered upon promiſe of pardon. But the king, the inſtant he was brought before him, ſentenced him to death, and accordingly he was, purſuant to the king's order, ſuffocated in aſhes. But his death did not put an end to the troubles which he had raiſed; for his ſon Amorgas with the remainder of the army ſtill oppoſed Tiſſaphernes, and for two years continued to infeſt the maritime provinces of Aſia Minor, till he was at length taken priſoner by the Peloponneſians at Iaſus a city of Ionia, and delivered by the inhabitants to Tiſſaphernes, who put him to death [q].

Darius had ſcarce quelled this rebellion, when he found himſelf involved in new troubles. His court, and, we may ſay, the whole empire, was governed by the eunuchs. Artoxares, Artibarxanes, and Athous. Theſe he conſulted, and followed their advice, in all the momentous affairs of the government. But Artoxares was the chief favourite, and nothing was tranſacted but by his direction. Intoxicated with this power, he began to entertain thoughts of aſcending the throne; and accordingly formed a deſign of cutting off Darius. With this view, that he might not be thought an eunuch, which was a strong objection to his being acknowledged king, he married and wore an artificial beard, giving out, that he was not what to that time the Persians had taken him to be. But his wife, who was privy to the whole plot, and perhaps glad to get rid of such a husband, discovered the whole matter to the king. Whereupon he was seized and delivered up to Parysatis, who caused him to be put to a cruel and ignominious death [r].

The Egyptians revolt. Year of the flood 2586. Before Christ 413.

But the greatest misfortune that befel Darius, during the whole time of his reign, was the revolt of Egypt, which broke out the same year that Pisuthnes rebelled. For though Darius got the better of the latter rebellion, yet he could never again reduce Egypt. Amyrtœus, who had reigned in the fens of Egypt, ever since the revolt of Inarus, being apprised of the discontents of the Egyptians, and finding them disposed to enter into any measures for the recovery of their liberty, sallied out of his fens, and being joined by the inhabitants, who flocked to him from all parts, he drove the Persians quite out, and became king of the whole country. Being thus in possession of all Egypt by the total expulsion of the Persians, he resolved to attack them in Phœnice too, having the Arabians in confederacy with him for this undertaking. News of this being brought to the court of Persia, the fleet, which the king had equipped with a design to assist the Lacedæmonians, was recalled to the defence of his own dominions [s].

While Darius was carrying on the war against the Egyptians and Arabians, the Medes revolted: but being defeated were forced to return to their former allegiance, and in punishment of their rebellion reduced to harder subjection than before, as is usually the case [t]. Darius seems to have been likewise successful against the Egyptians; for Amyrtæus being dead, after a reign of six years, his son Pausiris succeeded him, as Herodotus informs us [u], in the kingdom with the consent of the Persians, which shews that they were masters of Egypt.

Cyrus the younger appointed governor of Asia Minor.

Darius, having thus settled the affairs of Media and Egypt, invested Cyrus his youngest son with the supreme command
